[8] In the present case, while his honor told the jury that it "was commendable on the part of a detective or sheriff or other officer of the law to use all reasonable and proper means in the apprehension of those who are violating the law of the land, and when they do so, in that spirit, that will enable the law to place its hands upon offenders and violators; it is to the credit, rather than the discredit, of the persons so acting"—he said, further, and in this immediate connection: "But, when one acts in the capacity of a private detective or public officer, it becomes the duty of the jury to scrutinize the testimony of such person, and to say whether or not the testimony of that person so acting is biased, whether the interest he serves has influenced him to an extent that would reflect upon or affect his testimony." And we are of opinion that this was all the caution that the facts of the present case required. State v. Black, 121 N. C. 578, 28 S. E. 518; State v. Barber, 113 N. C. 711, 18 S. E. 515. Defendant excepted, further, that the court told the jury: "If you are a prohibitionist, you must try this man as you would try an anti-prohibitionist; and, if you are an anti-prohibitionist, you must try him under the law and the evidence as if you were a prohibitionist." While this statement, taken by itself, might be to some extent misleading, the excerpt does not give a correct impression of his honor's charge, nor of this particular portion of it. In connection with this matter, the entire charge of the court was as follows: "In passing upon the guilt or the innocence of the defendant, it is not a question of privilege with the jury as to what they will do, but it is a matter of duty and obligation which rests upon them to try the defendant under the evidence, and convict or acquit him, as you shall find. Juries sitting in the trial of a case of this kind, involving an investigation into the illicit sale of spirituous liquor, are not privileged to try the case upon any individual ideas which they may have, as bearing upon the question of the sale of spirituous liquor. In other words, the ideas of any individual juror, as to whether the law is wise or unwise, is not to be considered. If you are a prohibitionist, you must try the man as you would try him if you were an anti-prohibitionist; if you are an anti-prohibitionist, you must try him under the law and evidence as if you were a prohibitionist. In other words, you cannot ingraft upon your verdict any personal or individual views you may entertain upon the liquor law, but you must try him (defendant) as you would any other person for the violation of any statute law which we find upon the books of our state, divesting yourself of any prejudice, and take the evidence as it comes from the witnesses and the law as it is given to you by the court, and determine the guilt or the innocence of the defendant. Now in that spirit you go about this investigation, and return a verdict, as you are in duty bound to do, of guilty or not guilty, as you shall find." (9, 10) Considering the statement as a whole—and it is right so to consider it (State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283; Thompson on Trials, § 2407)—it directs the jury, in apt and forceful language, to divest themselves of all prejudice and give the defendant a fair and impartial trial under the law and on the testimony and on that alone, and the jury must have so understood it. After giving the case most careful consideration, we find no reversible error, and the judgment against the defendant is affirmed.

No error.

SMATHERS et al. v. WESTERN CAROLINA BANK et al.

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 47*)—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—STATUTORY LIABILITY.

The liability of stockholders of banking corporations is statutory, and imposed for the benefit of creditors, and attaches by virtue of the statute to the owners of the stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 64-68; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 98*)—LIABILITY OF MARRIED WOMEN—STOCKHOLDERS IN BANKING CORPORATIONS.

A married woman who owns stock in a banking corporation is not on account of coverture exempt from the liability imposed on stockholders by Pub. Laws 1897, c. 298, and Revisal 1906, § 2094, prohibiting a married woman from making any contract affecting her real or personal estate, except for necessary personal expenses or for the support of the family, is inapplicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 374; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 47*)—STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY—STATUTES.

Under Pub. Laws 1893, c. 471, § 1, providing that no holder of corporate stock as trustee shall be subject to any liability as stockholder, a holder of bank stock as trustee is not subject to the stockholders' liability imposed by Pub.

Laws 1897, c. 298, but the beneficiary is subject thereto.

Appeals from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Council, Judge.

Action by George H. Smathers and others against the Western Carolina Bank and others. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Reversed.

Chas. E. Jones, for W. W. Jones. J. H. Merrimon, T. F. Davidson, and Bourne, Parker & Morrison, for Mrs. Lauretta Maddux.

CLARK, C. J. This action was begun against the Western Carolina Bank, which was chartered by the state, for a receiver, and to wind up the affairs of the bank, which had become insolvent. The present plaintiff, receiver of the bank, appealed from so much of the judgment as adjudged that Lauretta Maddux and L. P. McLoud were not liable to the creditors for double the amount of their stock, as provided by the statute (chapter 298, Pub. Laws 1897), by reason of the fact that they were married women. The administrator of Lewis Maddux appealed from the ruling of the court that his estate was responsible for the stock liability upon the shares which stood in his name as trustee.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

Pub. Laws 1897, c. 298, entitled "An act to regulate the liabilities of stockholders in banks chartered by the state," etc., provides: "Section 1. The stockholders of every bank or banking association now operating by virtue of any charter or law of North Carolina, or that may hereafter operate by virtue of any charter or law of North Carolina shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably and not for one another, for all contracts, debts and agreements of such association to the extent of the amounts of the stock therein at the par value thereof in addition to the amount vested in such share." This statute was construed in Smathers v. Bank, 135 N. C. 410, 47 S. E. 893.

[1] The liability of stockholders is statutory, and attaches by virtue of the statute to the owners of the stock. There is no exemption as to married women. A married woman incurs liability by virtue of the statute as owner of the stock, and not by contract. The liability is imposed by statute for the benefit of depositors and creditors.

[2] Married women consequently are liable out of their individual estate just as they are for debts contracted for necessities, or for the support of the family or to obtain money to pay antenuptial debts, as to which execution would be issued against and collected out of her individual property as if she were a feme sole. Revisal 1905, § 2094. The provision of our statute of 1897 (chapter 298), above quoted, is copied verbatim from Rev. St. U. S. § 5151 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3465), originally National Banking Act 1864, § 12 (Act Cong. June 3, 1864, c. 106, 13 Stat. 103), under which it was held that "a married woman who owns stock in a national bank is not exempt on account of coverture from the liability imposed upon all stockholders in such banks." Anderson v. Lline (C. C.) 14 Fed. 405; Witters v. Sowles (C. C.) 32 Fed. 767. In the latter case the stock was owned by a married woman in Vermont, in which at that time the contract of a married woman was wholly void. The above cases and others hold that this liability is not contractual on the part of the stockholder, but is statutory and imposed for the benefit of creditors, and hence a married woman, when she becomes the owner of the stock, assumes the same liability as all other stockholders. Scott v. Latimer, 89 Fed. 843, 33 C. C. A. 1; Aldrich v. Skinner (C. C.) 98 Fed. 378. Even if the liability of the stockholder had been contractual, our Constitution contains no provision imposing any disability upon a married woman to contract. And the disability imposed, with certain exceptions by statute (Revisal 1905, § 2094), would not apply to this case where the statute imposes liability upon all owners of stock without excepting married women. The liability of the bank in creating the debt is contractual, but the liability of the stockholder is statutory. Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 533, 27 Sup. Ct. 755, 51 L. Ed. 1163.

Defendant's Appeal.

[3] Certificate for $14,000 stock was issued to "Lewis Maddux, trustee for Lauretta Maddux, his wife." This stock was subscribed for by Lewis Maddux, but the certificate therefor was issued to Lewis Maddux, "trustee for Lauretta Maddux," and was so held up to the time of the insolvency of the bank. There is no evidence of fraud, and nothing to rebut the beneficial ownership thereof being in Lauretta Maddux, as appears upon the face of the certificate. It nowhere appears that she did not receive the dividends, and that it was not in all respects her property. The mere fact that her husband voted the stock, and was president of the bank, is no evidence of fraud. Nothing would have been more natural and in the ordinary course of events than that as her proxy or as her agent he so voted it. Pub. Laws 1893, c. 471, § 1, provides: "No person holding stock in any corporation in this state as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, and no person holding such stock as collateral security shall be personally subject to any liability as a stockholder in such corporation (but the person pledging such stock shall be construed as holding the same and shall be liable as a stockholder accordingly) and the estate and funds in the hands of such executor, administrator, guardian or trustee shall be liable in like manner and to the same extent as the testator or intestate or the ward or the person interested in such fund would have been had he been living and competent to act and hold the stock in his own name." This act is conclusive as to the nonliability of the trustee, Lewis Maddux, for the stock liability upon the shares of which his wife was the beneficial owner. There being no evidence to rebut the ownership of the stock being in Mrs. Maddux, according to the tenor of the certificate, the holding of the court that Lewis Maddux was the owner, viewed as a finding of fact, is reviewable, and, considered as a conclusion of law, is erroneous. Bank v. Cocke, 127 N. C. 467, 37 S. E. 507, to which we were cited by counsel, does not conflict with what we have just said. In Bank v. Cocke the stockholders in a meeting assumed liability for $75,000, for which they agreed to become liable. The court held that this was a contractual liability for which the guardian became individually liable, and could not bind his wards, for he had no authority to create such debt for them or to charge their stock. But the liability which attaches to the ownership of the stock, which was held by him as a guardian, is statutory, and therefore would bind the estate of the wards in his hands. The court in that opinion points out this very distinction in the nature of the two liabilities.

In both appeals the judgment below is reversed.

(155 N. C. 260)

WILLIAMS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. CARRIERS (§ 113*)—BAGGAGE—CONDITIONS OF LIABILITY—ACCEPTANCE.

To make a railroad company liable as a common carrier or warehouseman for baggage lost, it must have been delivered to and accepted by the carrier, either actually or constructively.

2. CARRIERS (§ 393*)—BAGGAGE—DELIVERY—NOTICE.

As a rule, notice must be given to an authorized agent of a carrier when baggage is taken to a railroad station or other place where baggage is usually received, in order to make the carrier liable, but the carrier may bind itself by a custom of treating baggage as received when left at a given place, without other notice.

3. CARRIERS (§ 408*)—BAGGAGE—ACTIONS FOR LOSS—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for loss of a trunk claimed to have been delivered to it as baggage, a witness testified that he took the trunk to the baggage room on Sunday afternoon, and asked a man there who was the only one in the office and who had on citizen's clothes, except for a railroad employe's vest, if he could put the trunk in the baggage room, and the man told him to put it in the alleyway where they put the trunks, which witness did. He also testified that he had seen the man once before at the baggage room, and that he came out of the place where the baggage agent checked the baggage. The baggage agent and his assistant testified that they had charge of the baggage room, and had not received plaintiff's trunk or authorized any one else to accept it, but the agent also testified that he was temporarily out of the office at times. Plaintiff requested a charge that, if it was the custom of the railroad company that baggage should be left at the station in care of the company's agent or of "any one whom the company held out to the public to be in charge of the baggage room," and plaintiff's trunk was left in the baggage alley with the knowledge and consent of an agent in charge of the baggage room, there was an acceptance of it as baggage. The court modified the requested charge by instructing that, if the trunk was left at the station at the customary time and place with the knowledge and consent of a baggageman or other "authorized agent," the company should be held to have accepted it, etc., and afterwards, in response to a request from the jury for a further charge on the question of delivery, instructed that plaintiff must show that some person authorized by the company to act for it was acting for it when she claimed she delivered the trunk to it, and that nothing short of a delivery to some person authorized to act for the company would suffice. Held, that the evidence required that the charge as requested be given, and the modification of the requested charge was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 408.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—HARMLESS ERROR—MODIFICATION OF INSTRUCTIONS.

The modification of the requested instruction was error prejudicial to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

5. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 137*)—AGENCY BY ESTOPPEL.

As a rule, one who knows of or negligently permits another to act for him in a particular transaction, so as to clothe him with apparent authority, is estopped from denying his authority as against a third person, who, in good faith and with reasonable prudence, relies upon such apparent authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 492-494; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 352*)—SPECIAL ISSUES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The framing of special issues is largely in the trial court's discretion, so long as they are responsive to the pleadings, and determine the questions involved.

7. CARRIERS (§ 408*)—ISSUES—"IMMEDIATE."

To make a carrier liable for baggage delivered to it, it must be delivered and accepted for transportation within a reasonable time before departure of the train, so that, if an issue was submitted in an action for loss of baggage as to whether the trunk was received for "immediate" transportation, the court should have instructed that the term "immediate" did not have its usual meaning of "instantly, forthwith, nothing intervening either as to place, time, or action," but rather meant within a reasonable time having due regard to the circumstances (citing 4 Words & Phrases, 3393).

8. CARRIERS (§ 393*)—BAGGAGE—LIABILITY AS CARRIER—TIME OF DELIVERY.

If a trunk was accepted by a carrier for transportation on the following morning pursuant to custom, the carrier would be liable as such if the trunk was lost before it was forwarded, though, if it was only received for storage for an intending passenger until he had it checked, the carrier would be only a bailee for hire with the duty of exercising ordinary care for its safety.

9. CARRIERS (§ 408*)—BAGGAGE—ACTIONS FOR LOSS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is on the carrier to show legal excuse for failure to deliver on demand baggage received by it, whether held as carrier or warehouseman.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 408.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Long, Judge.

Action by Susie E. Williams against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

There was evidence on part of plaintiff tending to show: That on or about August 30, 1908, on Sunday afternoon, at Charlotte, N. C., plaintiff, having purchased a ticket over defendant's road, via Statesville, N. C., sent her trunk to the station of defendant company in Charlotte, to be received as baggage for transportation over defendant's road, plaintiff intending to take the train leaving Charlotte on Monday morning following, August 31st. The trunk was first given in custody to Robert Ramsaur, a drayman working for the Black Transfer Company, at the house where plaintiff was then staying, with directions to take same to the station for the purpose indicated, and no check or receipt for same was given by Ramsaur; that not being the custom. That the trunk was taken to the station, as directed, the defendant company duly notified, and same was left at the accustomed place and by direction of an agent of defendant company in apparent charge of the baggage room and baggage business at the station. Plaintiff went to station Monday morning for purpose of taking the train and to baggage room to check her trunk, and she and the baggage agent walked immediately to a new steamer trunk, and check was placed on same and duplicate given plaintiff. As this was handed plaintiff, the agent asked her if she was positive that it was hers, and witness said: "No; I am not positive. I borrowed the trunk from Mrs. Hook." He said: "Is there a name on it?" "I looked over the trunk, and found no name on it. Then he said, 'Well, just open the trunk, and see if it is yours.' I took my key and opened the trunk, and it contained a gentleman's clothes. He said, 'This won't do. It can't be yours.' And, of course, I knew it was not mine, and I said, 'What will I do? I am going to Blowing Rock, and will need my clothes.' And he said: 'I will send your trunk to you just as soon as it comes.' I said, 'Suppose this is not my trunk that you send to Blowing Rock to me; what will I do? I will need my clothes.' I said: 'If my trunk is lost, what will I do?' And he said they very rarely lost a trunk. He said, 'If a gentleman has your trunk, he will send it back here, and I remember distinctly shipping a new steamer trunk Sunday afternoon.' He said there was an overflow of baggage from the flood, and he said, 'Where are you going?' And I told him I was going to Green Park Hotel, Blowing Rock, and he gave me a check, and I put it in my purse. When I took the train, I had the check given me by Mr. Harrill. I went to Blowing Rock. I have not received the trunk or the contents or the value thereof from the Southern Railway Company. I made a list of the contents about 10 days after my trunk was lost." There was evidence offered, also, tending to show that the trunk was left at the place where unchecked baggage for transportation was usually placed, a covered archway, between the baggage room proper and Gresham's Dining Room, in the main station building, and that it was customary to receive baggage for transportation on Sunday afternoon for trains leaving Monday morning from station. It was proven or admitted that neither the trunk nor its contents had ever been restored to plaintiff, and that check given by company for same had been destroyed or lost. Percy Shaw, the agent of defendant company, having charge of baggage room and business concerning baggage at the Charlotte station and attending to same usually in the daytime, and J. H. Harrill, his assistant, having like charge usually at night, were examined for defendant company, and on matters more directly relevant to the questions presented testified that the trunk claimed by plaintiff was never delivered to them at the time nor for the purpose stated, either by Ramsaur or any other person.

Percy Shaw, as witness, speaking especially to this question, testified: "I live in Charlotte. I am baggage agent at the Southern Depot. Yes; I was baggage agent in August, 1908. I went on duty at 7 a. m. and left at 7 p. m. I was succeeded at night by Mr. Harrill. No one else there had authority to receive trunks. No; I did not at any time receive a trunk belonging to Miss Susie Williams. No; on August 30th, I did not leave any employé there at the baggage room with a blue vest on, with brass buttons, to take my place. Conductors running on the trains are the only employés on the Southern Road who wear such a uniform." Cross-examination of Percy Shaw: "On August 30th I came on duty at 7 a. m. I suppose. I can't remember whether I came exactly at 7 o'clock or not. No; I did not leave any conductor in my place that day. No; I did not leave any one in my place that day."

J. H. Harrill testified to like effect, and gave evidence tending to contradict plaintiff's account of the circumstances under which he gave the check.

On the question of whether the trunk was actually delivered to defendant company by Robert Ramsaur, he testified as follows: "I live at 810 East First street, Charlotte. I work on transfer wagon. Yes; I know Miss Susie Williams. Yes, on or about August 30, 1908, I took her trunk from Mrs. Hook's house—305 East Morehead street—to Southern Railway Station. I took the trunk to the Southern Station, and asked some railroad man there. No; I don't know who I was talking to. It was a man in the baggage room. No; I don't know who the man was I had the talk with. He was a tall slim looking man. No; I don't think he had charge of the baggage room there. Yes; I know Mr. Percy Shaw. Q. What took place between you and a man in the baggage room? A. I asked him could I set the trunk inside the baggage room. He said 'No,' to put it in the alleyway, where they put trunks. I put it in the alleyway. There is a gate there now, but there wasn't none there then. I have worked for Black about two years in all. Q. Do you know what the custom is about placing trunks there for next morning's trains? Did you put that trunk there? A. Yes." Cross-examination of Robert Ramsaur: "Yes; I have been hauling trunks for about two years. Yes; I was working for the Black Transfer Company at that time. Yes; Black sent me to Miss Williams to get the trunk. No; I don't carry claim checks for trunks. The transfer man at the depot has them. Yes; I went there some time in the evening, before sunset. Yes; I got this trunk and loaded it on the wagon. Yes; I know Mr. Percy Shaw. No; he was not the man I was talking to in the station—in the baggage room there. Yes; Mr. Shaw was the baggage master there. No; I did not see him there at that time. No; I did not say anything to him. Yes; he was the baggage master. Yes; he was the man who received the trunks at the station, if you could find him when you took trunks there. Yes; this tall slim man was a white man. He was standing just beyond the scales in the baggage room. I put the trunk in the passage-way, between the baggage room and Gresham's Dining Room. Gresham has a dining room there. Q. And wagons drive up next to the kitchen? A. Yes; I first pulled the trunk inside the baggage room, and the man in the baggage room told me 'No,' to put it back there where trunks belong. Yes; I put it back out there. No; I said nothing to any one about it. No; I did not tell whose trunk it was. If the baggageman had been there, I would have told him." And, being recalled, this witness testified further: "The man I saw there in the baggage room had on citizen's clothes, all but his vest. He had on a railroad vest—a railroad porter's or something's vest. When he told me to take the trunk out of the baggage room, he walked out of the place where Mr. Shaw and them checked the baggage. I asked him if I could put it there, and he said 'No,' to put it outside where the trunks belonged. He came from the office where Mr. Shaw stayed. He was doing business, and I asked him if I could put the trunk there, and he said 'No.' I don't know whether any one except the baggage agents come from there. Yes; the baggage room door was open when I went in there. Yes; he was doing the things what the baggageman does. When I seen him, he was coming out the gate, and he had got beyond the scales when I saw him. I seen him doing nothing. Q. So all you know is that you saw a man in there, who had on a blue vest with brass buttons, with 'Southern' marked on the buttons, and you asked him if you could put the trunk in there, and he said 'No,' to put it out there. Had you ever seen the man before? A. I think I had seen him once before. I have never seen him since. No; it was not Mr. Percy Shaw, nor Mr. Harrill. Q. State whether or not when you took trunks there to the station Mr. Shaw or Mr. Harrill were always there, or whether they got other people to stay in their places sometimes? A. There were other men in there besides Mr. Harrill and Mr. Shaw. I have seen baggage agents on the Southern Railway in there checking baggage."

A paper writing, containing a written statement of this witness in direct contradiction of the principal portion of his testimony as to delivery of the trunk, was introduced by defendant.

The jury rendered the following verdict: "(1) Did the defendant company receive the trunk of the plaintiff on Sunday evening, August 30, 1908, as alleged in the complaint as baggage for transportation? Ans. No. (2) Was said trunk received by defendant company for immediate transportation? Ans. No. (3) Was the trunk delivered by the defendant company to the plaintiff? Ans. No. (4) What amount, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover from defendant on account of the alleged loss of said trunk? Ans. Nothing."

Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

E. R. Preston and Neill R. Graham, for appellant. W. B. Rodman, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] To fix responsibility for lost baggage on a railroad company, either as common carrier or warehouseman, there must have been a delivery of same, including an acceptance by the company, either actual or constructive, and, in order to a valid delivery, the general rule is that when baggage is taken by others to a railroad station, and even to the place where baggage is usually received, some kind of notice must be given to some agent of the company authorized to accept the same. Hutchinson on Carriers, § 105; Fetter on Carriers, § 610; So. Ry. v. Bickley, 119 Tenn. 528, 107 S. W. 680, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 859, 123 Am. St. Rep. 754; Gregory v. Webb, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 360, 89 S. W. 1109; Wright v. Caldwell, 3 Mich. 51; *Merriam v. This rule is at times modified where a custom of the company is established to consider and treat baggage as received when left at a given place and without further notice. Fetter on Carriers, supra; Green v. Railroad, 41 Iowa, 410; Green v. Railroad, 38 Iowa, 100; Lake Shore Ry. v. Foster, 104 Ind. 293, 4 N. E. 20, 54 Am. Rep. 319.

[3] There is no objection open to plaintiff by reason of his honor's charge on the last position, for it was dealt with as plaintiff requested, but, in reference to the first plaintiff, admitting that his honor stated the rule in general terms, sufficiently correct, insists that there was reversible error committed to his prejudice in so modifying a prayer for instructions on the first issue as to exclude from consideration a view in his favor properly arising on the evidence, and this in especial reference to the testimony of the witness Robert Ramsaur and corroborative facts tending to show a delivery of the baggage at the proper place and notice duly given. As heretofore shown, Robert Ramsaur, in effect, testified that, having taken charge of the trunk, he took it to the passenger station on Sunday afternoon and to the baggage room, and asked a man in there if he could put it in the room, and the man replied, "No; put it in the alleyway where they put the trunks." And witness then placed the trunk as directed. The man was a white man in citizen's clothes, except that he had on a railroad company vest; that he was the only man there in the office. Recalled on this point, the witness testified further: "When he told me to take the trunk out of the baggage room, he walked out of the place where Mr. Shaw and them checked baggage. He came from the office where Mr. Shaw stayed. He was doing business, and I asked him if I could put the trunk in there, and he said, 'No.' He was doing things what the baggageman does." The witness further said that he had seen this same man once before, and that there were at times other men in there besides Mr. Shaw and Mr. Harrill, and the witness had seen baggage agents on the Southern Railway in there checking baggage. On the part of the defendant Mr. Shaw and Mr. Harrill testified that they had charge and control of the baggage room, and that neither of them had received the trunk claimed by plaintiff nor had they authorized the man referred to by the witness, Ramsaur, nor any other man, to receive it or to accept notice concerning it; the witness Shaw, however, stating that he was at times temporarily out of the office. In view of this testimony and supporting facts on either side, the plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury: "That if it was the custom of the railroad company to receive baggage Sunday afternoon or evening before for transportation on the next morning train, and that trunks or baggage should be left at defendant's passenger station at such times, in care of the baggageman in charge of defendant's baggage room or of any agent or servant of the company in charge of defendant's baggage room or in care of any one whom the company held out to the public to be in charge of the baggage room, and should the jury find that the trunk, having been put in charge of the drayman for the purpose, was left by him at defendant's baggage room, or in what was known as the baggage alley, with the knowledge and consent of the agent or servant in charge of defendant's baggage room, as aforesaid, then, in any of those events, the court instructs the jury the compliance with such a custom existing at the time by the transferman, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant's baggageman or other agent of the defendant as aforesaid, would be an acceptance of plaintiff's trunk, and such acceptance would be a delivery of plaintiff's trunk to defendant." The court gave the prayer generally as requested, but modified same by saying that if the plaintiff's trunk was left at defendant's station at the customary time and place, with the knowledge and consent of defendant's baggageman or other authorized agent of the company, etc. The case further states that the jury, having received the charge in the forenoon of Wednesday, October 5, 1910, considered of the case, and on Thursday morning stated they had been unable to agree on what was a legal delivery of the trunk, and at their request and without objection the typewritten instructions of the court were given them. The jury, having further considered of the case until Friday morning, again came into court, when his honor gave them further charge on the question of delivery as follows: "As I understand you, you say you are troubled as to what constitutes an agent at the depot of the defendant to receive baggage. The defendant is a corporation. The defendant, therefore, conducts its business through and by its employés or agents. As the plaintiff in this case has alleged that she caused her trunk to be delivered to the defendant company, it is necessary for her to offer evidence that satisfies the jury by the greater weight of the evidence that some person authorized by the defendant corporation to act for it was acting for it at the time that she alleges she delivered her trunk or caused it to be delivered through her agent. Nothing short of a fair delivery of the baggage to the carrier or its agent will render the carrier liable for a nondelivery. That is to say, the plaintiff in this case upon all of the evidence must satisfy the jury by the greater weight of it that the trunk was delivered to some person authorized to act for the defendant company as baggage to be transported over the defendant's line as such, and the agent of the defendant company must have received the baggage." Plaintiff duly excepted to the modification of this prayer and to the additional charge as given.

[4] In thus modifying plaintiff's prayer for instructions and more emphatically in the additional charge as given, the court intended to, and did, withdraw from the jury the view arising on the testimony that, if the baggage was placed at the customary time and place with the assent and knowledge of "one held out by the company as being in charge of its baggage room," there was a proper delivery to the company; and in this we think there was reversible error, to plaintiff's prejudice, which entitles her to a new trial of the issue. True, the witness Ramsaur testified that he knew both Percy Shaw and J. H. Harrill, and knew, also, that they were the baggage agents at defendant's station, but a perusal of the entire testimony of this witness presents a permissible interpretation for the consideration of the jury that, while he knew Shaw and Harrill were the company's agents in general charge and control of the baggage business, yet the man he found in sole occupation of the baggage room when he asked to place the trunk in the room was the company's agent then in charge for the time being, and, if not so in fact, he was allowed by defendant company to hold himself out as such, and for that reason a notice to him may have been sufficient evidence of delivery. This agency by allowing one to appear as such or agency by estoppel, as it is usually termed, has an important place in this branch of the law.

[5] It is very well stated in Clark and Skyles on the Law of Agency, § 55, p. 140, as follows: "It is a well-established doctrine that if a person by his words or conduct expressly or impliedly represents to another that a certain state of facts exists, and thereby induces the other to act in reliance on such representation, he will be estopped to deny the truth of the representation, to the other's prejudice. And by the application of this doctrine an agency may be created or arise by estoppel, irrespective of the actual intention, and even though it may be conceded that there was no agency in fact. The general rule is this: If a person knowingly permits another to act for him in a particular transaction, or otherwise clothes him, either intentionally or by negligence, with apparent authority to act for him therein, he will be estopped to deny the agency as against third persons who, in good faith and in the exercise of reasonable prudence, deal with the apparent agent in the belief that his apparent authority is real." Tiffany on Agency is to like effect, and innumerable decisions here and elsewhere recognize and apply the principle. Gooding v. Moore, 150 N. C. 195, 63 S. E. 895; Bank v. Hay, 143 N. C. 326, 55 S. E. 811; Morrow v. Railroad, 134 N. C. 92-96, 46 S. E. 12; Harrell v. Railroad, 106 N. C. 258, 11 S. E. 286; Oulmit v. Henshaw, 35 Vt. 605, 84 Am. Dec. 646; Minter v. Railroad, 41 Mo. 503, 97 Am. Dec. 288; Battle v. Railroad, 70 S. C. 329, 49 S. E. 849; Rogers v. Railroad, 2 Lans. (N. Y.) 269, affirmed 56 N. Y. 620; Insurance Co. v. Railroad, 144 N. Y. 200, 39 N. E. 79, 43 Am. St. Rep. 752. Some of these decisions (and many others could be cited) were on facts very similar to those presented here, making them apt authorities in support of plaintiff's position as embodied in his prayer. In Morrow's Case, on a question whether defendant company knew that one had entered its trains for the purpose of assisting a passenger, the fact that an employé of the company was standing near in a position to observe and note the circumstances was held evidence from which knowledge on the part of the company could be inferred. Associate Justice Walker, speaking for the court, said: "Whether the person who stood near the steps of the coach was the conductor or some other employé charged in law or fact with the duty of providing for plaintiff's safety while exercising the lawful right of assisting the company's passengers is a proper subject of inquiry for the jury," etc. In Battle's Case, supra, it was held: "That delivery of baggage to the only person in charge of the station who is at the time engaged as a telegraph agent depositing it at a place indicated by him, description of trunk and directions as to checking, and that owner would soon appear and attend to it, is delivery to the carrier." In Oulmit's Case, supra, it was held that "a passenger has a right to regard as agent of a railroad company a person who handles and takes charge of baggage upon arrival of train at a station, and notice to such person by a passenger is notice to the company." And in case of Rogers v. Railroad it was held as follows: "The owner of a trunk sent it to the defendant's depot by an expressman, who placed it within the depot, beside the baggage crate, which was locked, and, upon inquiring of persons there engaged in handling freight, was referred to the ticket agent as the person who took charge of baggage. He went to the ticket agent's office and told him that there was a trunk outside. The agent said that it was right, and immediately sent two men to take care of it. When the owner inquired for the trunk on purchasing his ticket later in the day, it could not be found, though the ticket agent said he had seen one a short time before answering to its description. Employés of the defendant also said that it had been delivered upon presentation of a check. In an action to recover the value of the trunk and its contents, held, that there was sufficient evidence of delivery, and a nonsuit was wrong." Stating the proposition in a negative way in 6 Cyc. p. 671, it is said: "But the carrier will not be liable for the acts of its servants not authorized nor held out as authorized to receive baggage." On authority, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to have this latter view presented to the jury, and to have his prayer for instructions given substantially as requested.

[6] Plaintiff excepted, further, that the court submitted the second issue as to the receipt of the trunk for immediate transportation. We have frequently held that the framing of issues is a matter which is left very largely in the discretion of the trial judge; the limitation being that the issues must be sufficiently responsive to the pleadings and determinative of the rights of the parties involved therein. And the statement is not infrequently made in the books that in order to charge transportation companies as common carriers, making them liable as carriers, the goods or baggage must be left with them for "immediate" transportation.

[7] If it becomes necessary, therefore, in order to make full determination of the rights of these litigants, that decision should be made whether this trunk was received and held as common carrier or warehouseman, it is well enough to submit the issue as framed. If this is done, however, the jury should be instructed that the term "immediate," in this connection, does not have its more usual meaning of "instantly, forthwith, nothing intervening either as to place, time or action," given in 4 Words & Phrases, p. 3393, as Worcester's definition, but it means rather "reasonable time," having due regard to the nature and circumstances of the case, cited in Words & Phrases as Bouvier's definition; the controlling idea being that, in order to fix upon a company responsibility for baggage as a common carrier, the same must be delivered by the passenger and accepted for transportation within a reasonable time before taking his intended train.

There is a decision—Goodbar v. Railroad Company, 53 Mo. App. 434—which tends to hold that this must be the next train, but we doubt if this is a correct statement of the general rule, and certainly not where a custom is established on the part of the company to accept baggage for transportation on a subsequent or later train. The true rule, we think, is very fully stated by Messrs. Elliott in their valuable work on Railroads (2d Ed.) § 1351, as follows: "The liability of the company as a common carrier begins as a rule at the time the baggage is delivered to it for transportation, unless the time of such delivery be an unreasonable length of time before the owner's intended departure. In order that the liability as a common carrier should exist, it is not always necessary that the passenger should have purchased a ticket, nor that he should even make the journey which he intends to make. As persons often become entitled to the rights of passengers before the purchase of a ticket, so the liability of a carrier for baggage sometimes begins before the purchase of a ticket, or even before the company becomes liable to the owner of the baggage as a passenger. Where a person in good faith intends to take passage on a railway train or the like and delivers his baggage to the company a reasonable time in advance of the anticipated journey, it seems that the company will be liable for such baggage as a common carrier from the time of such delivery and acceptance. And in such cases the company may be liable, although the person does not purchase a ticket or make the proposed journey as for instance, where he is prevented from so doing by the fault of the carrier and the loss or destruction of the baggage before the journey begins." And well-considered decisions are in support of the statement. Hickox v. Railroad, 31 Conn. 281, 83 Am. Dec. 143; Manufacturing Co. v. Ullman, 89 Ill. 244; Lake Shore & Mich. R. R. v. Foster, 104 Ind. 298, 4 N. E. 20, 54 Am. Rep. 319; Insurance Co. v. Railroad, 144 N. Y. 200, 39 N. E. 79, 43 Am. St. Rep. 752; Woods v. Devin, 13 Ill. 747, 56 Am. Dec. 483. And as relevant to the question more directly involved in this position, the case of Hickox v. Railroad, supra, holds as follows: "A railroad company is presumed to receive baggage for transportation and not for storage, and its liability commences as soon as the baggage is delivered to, and is received by, the agent, notwithstanding the fact that it was not checked at the time it was received and would not be for several hours nor until 15 minutes before the train started, and that the passenger was so informed. Delivery or nondelivery of check for baggage is of no importance as affecting the liability of the carrier; it being merely in the nature of a receipt and intended as evidence of the ownership and identity of the baggage, and this is the rule generally obtaining in the absence of some specific and reasonable regulation, restrictive of its liability." As the cause goes back for a new hearing, we consider it well to advert to another exception insisted on for plaintiff that his honor charged the jury, as requested by defendant, as follows: "If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff, Susie E. Williams, purchased a ticket over the defendant's line from Charlotte to Statesville on Saturday morning, and on the following Sunday evening sent a trunk to the depot, giving no instructions for shipment, and no instructions for it to be checked, and did not intend for the same to be checked until the following morning, then the company, even if it received the trunk for storage, was merely a gratuitous bailee, and liable only for its gross negligence. There being no evidence that the trunk was lost by the gross negligence of the defendant company, the jury will answer the fourth issue nothing."

[8] As heretofore stated, if the trunk was delivered and accepted by the company in the afternoon for transportation on the following morning, and it was customary to receive baggage for transportation in that way, in the absence of some reasonable regulations, restrictive of the company's liability, they would take as common carriers, and could be held as insurers, in case the trunk is lost, but if no such custom existed and the trunk was only received for storage for one intending to become a passenger, and until he claims the trunk and has the same checked, in such case the company is ordinarily regarded as bailee for hire, and is responsible for ordinary care. It is the same rule of responsibility obtaining where baggage reaches its destination, and is not called for in a reasonable time. After such time the carrier holds the baggage as warehouseman, and is responsible for lack of ordinary care. Elliott on Railroads, §§ 1463-1533. In making this charge the court was no doubt influenced to some extent by expressions in the opinion in Kindley v. Railroad, 151 N. C. 207, 65 S. E. 897, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 634, to the effect that in certain aspects of that case the defendant company was a gratuitous bailee, and as such responsible only for gross negligence. But the statement of the law and expressions referred to must be considered and construed in reference to the facts presented and in view of the rights there involved. In Kindley's Case a passenger took the train at Fayetteville, N. C., intending to go through to Charlotte; the route lying over the Atlantic Coast Line to Maxton, and over the Sea Board from Maxton to Charlotte. At Maxton the passenger determined to return to Fayetteville, and notified the Coast Line conductor of such an intent, with a request that the baggage be also returned. The trunk was carried on to Charlotte, and when it was returned to the owner, some time thereafter, it was found to have been entered, and some of the contents stolen. The appeal involved only the liability of the second carrier, and the decision in Kindley's Case was placed on the ground that the intended passenger had never become such in reference to the second or connecting carrier, and that nothing had ever been paid or tendered such carrier, either for carrying the passenger or storing the trunk, and in that view only was the second carrier considered and dealt with as gratuitous bailee. In Kindley's Case, too, weight was given to the language of the statute bearing on the subject (Revisal 1908, § 2624), which makes carriers responsible "for baggage of passengers from whom they have received fare." The principle, however, does not apply to the facts presented here in any aspect of them, for, if it should be established under proper ruling that until the trunk was claimed and checked for baggage it was held for storage only and not for immediate transportation, as heretofore explained, on authority, the company is chargeable as bailee for hire and responsible for ordinary care.

[8] If received and held, either as common carrier or warehouseman, on failure to deliver, the burden is on defendant to render legal excuse for the failure. In Fetter on Carriers, at page 1557, it is said: "With respect to baggage in possession of a railroad company as warehouseman, evidence that it failed to deliver the property to the owner, when demanded, prima facie establishes negligence and want of due care, and the onus of accounting for the default lies with the carrier." There is error, which entitles plaintiff to a new trial, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

SMITH v. MILLER.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 80*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINAL JUDGMENT.

Where an order of reference has been made in a proceeding to sell contingent interests in land, as provided by Revisal 1905, § 1590, and there has been an appeal therein and the case remanded, with directions to make a sale of certain lands and a restoration to certain heirs, and to proceed with the cause, reserving all other questions then presented and preserved by exceptions noted of record until the sale of the land and a final hearing on the report of commissioners, an application by one of the appellants in the former appeal, claiming a lien against the heirs having priority over their rights to a restoration of proceeds, that the court consider and pass upon his exceptions will not be considered while the proceeding is in the lower court, before final judgment therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 494-509; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

Action by Elizabeth A. Smith against O. H. Miller, a Commissioner, to sell contingent interests in land, and others, and from a decree ordering the sale of a contingent remainder, certain parties appealed, and the decree was modified and affirmed (151 N. C. 620, 66 S. E. 671), and thereafter Miller's petition for a rehearing of that judgment was dismissed (152 N. C. 314, 67 S. E. 746), and he now makes application to have the court consider and pass upon certain exceptions noted by him in the proceedings in the court below. Motion denied.

See, also, 71 S. E. 355.

A. S. Barnard, for defendant.

HOKE, J. This is an application by C. H. Miller, a former commissioner, to have the court consider and pass upon certain exception noted by him in the progress of the case in the court below, on the ground that on appeal the cause had been retained and was now in this court for the purpose indicated.

The appeal referred to is reported in 151 N. C. 620, 66 S. E. 671, and again in 152 N. C. 314, 67 S. E. 746, on a petition to rehear, filed by the present applicant, and, from a perusal of the record and the opinions in the case, it appears that this was a proceeding, under section 1590 of the Revisal, to sell land for reinvestment, the sale involving the disposition of contingent interests, and in which all the parties in esse were before the court. That during the progress of the cause in the court below decrees and orders were made, directing present applicant, C. H. Miller, who was at that time commissioner, to sell a portion of the land in question and to construct and equip a hotel on another portion, a lot in the city of Asheville. That the costs of the hotel, authorized and estimated, was to be not less than $193,350.53, with an additional expenditure recommended, increasing the cost of the proposed building to $225,000. Commissioner, having sold a part of land, proceeded with the construction of the hotel, expended thereon something like $30,295.28, and contracted a large indebtedness to various parties for labor and material, etc., and the enterprise, having come to a standstill, and various creditors having filed accounts, claiming liens, etc., on the structure, the cause was referred and report made to June term, 1908, Buncombe superior court, where it was heard, on exceptions, before his honor, R. B. Peebles, judge presiding.

On the hearing, among other things, it was made to appear that it would require at least $100,000 in addition to what had been already spent and contracted to complete the hotel, and, for various reasons stated, it was not to the interest of the owners that any further sale of land be made; and the judge held that this being a proceeding involving the disposition of contingent interests the power of the court was only that contained in the statute, and the law contained no provision authorizing any such scheme of expenditure as had been made in this case, and that such lack of power, appearing of record, all creditors were affected with notice, and judgment was entered that the hotel in question, or so much of it as was then built, together with the lot, be sold, and out of the proceeds the original value of the lot, together with the amount of the heirs' money, improperly invested in the improvement, be restored to them; and the court, having ruled on exceptions filed by various claimants and others, including some filed by the present applicant, adjudged that the surplus, if there was any, should be distributed among the claimants according to the rulings made.

On appeal to this court, 151 N. C. 620, 66 S. E. 671, supra, the construction of the statute, as made by his honor, was approved and the judgment affirmed, in so far as it directed a sale of the property and a restoration of the money belonging to the heirs. It appearing probable, however, as it subsequently turned out that the proceeds of sale would no more than suffice for this payment to the heirs, and that there would therefore be no surplus to distribute, this court, reserving all other questions which were presented and preserved by exceptions noted of record, directed the decision to be certified down that the sale should be had and the cause proceeded with. When this order had been duly complied with, the present applicant conceiving that the decision might be construed as a final disposition of the case so far as his rights were concerned, filed a petition to rehear, and the court in denying the petition (152 N. C. 314, 67 S. E. 746), again distinctly declared that the cause was in the court below, that a sale should be had and final judgment entered, and that all rights or questions properly noted by exceptions for review would be preserved and dealt with on appeal from such final judgment.

Speaking to this question, Associate Justice Walker said: "The only question to be decided by us at the last term (151 N. C. 620, 66 S. E. 671) was as to the power of the court to order an investment of the proceeds of sale before any sale of the property had been made, and before it could be ascertained, with any degree of certainty, whether the said proceeds would be sufficient for the improvement of the other property, as contemplated by the former order of the court. We therefore merely directed a sale of the property by the commissioner, W. R. Whitson, and a report of the sale to the court, and it was not our purpose to deprive the petitioner in this case of any rightful claim or lien he has upon the fund to be realized, as between him and the heirs or the owners of the property which is to be sold. Our decision was, it is true, that the heirs should be reimbursed; but if, as contended by the petitioner, he is entitled to a lien upon the fund, as against the heirs, or to be preferred in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale, on account of commissions justly due him, or by reason of any other claim he has preferred and which constitutes a prior lien upon such proceeds, he is not deprived by that decision of asserting such prior lien, and his exceptions, as we said in the former opinion, will be considered without reference to the fact that we have merely ordered a sale of the premises and a report to the court, and refused to pass upon the exceptions until the clear amount of the proceeds of the sale could be ascertained." And further: "Our conclusion is that the former decision is sufficiently explicit to show that the petitioner and the other parties, who claim that they have a lien upon the fund, will not be prejudiced hereafter by reason of our refusal to pass upon their exceptions at the time we made the decision. If the property in the hands of the heirs is, as between them and any of the claimants, subject to a charge or lien for its preservation, or for the payment of taxes or any other incumbrance of a like nature, this question will be open for consideration and decision in the court below, when the report of the commissioner, W. R. Whitson, is made to the court." And again: "We do not reverse or modify our former decision, but simply declare, by this opinion, that the legal rights of the claimants who have excepted shall be preserved until the land is sold and the final hearing is had upon the report of the commissioners."

It will thus be seen that the position now contended for by defendant was directly presented and passed upon in the petition to rehear, and it was expressly decided that the cause was in the court below, and that the exceptions of present application were preserved for consideration on appeal from the final judgment. This is the orderly course which should obtain in these reference proceedings, and is in accord with numerous decisions in our court on the subject. Riley v. Sears, 151 N. C. 187, 65 S. E. 912; Pritchard v. Spring Co., 151 N. C. 249, 65 S. E. 968; Brown v. Nlmoocks, 126 N. C. 808, 36 S. E. 278; Halley v. Gray, 93 N. C. 185; Jones v. Call, 89 N. C. 188.

In the Pritchard Case, supra, it was held: "An appeal is premature from the judgment of the lower court modifying the report of a referee, declaring the indebtedness and priorities among defendant's creditors, and ordering a reference as to one of them, and it will be dismissed without prejudice; for when a reference has been entered upon, it must proceed to its proper conclusion, and an appeal will only lie from a final judgment, or one in its nature final." And delivering the opinion the court said: "If a departure from this procedure is allowed in one case, it could be insisted upon in another, and each claimant, conceiving himself aggrieved, could bring the cause here for consideration, and litigation of this character would be indefinitely prolonged, costs unduly enhanced, and the seemingly and proper disposition of causes prevented."

In Brown v. Nlmoocks, 126 N. C. 808, 36 S. E. 278, it was held: "The intent and policy of the statute allowing appeals (the Code, § 548), are to present for review the exceptions taken and questions of law arising upon the whole case, and fragmentary appeals will not be entertained, when no substantial right is put in jeopardy by such refusal." "(2) A party can preserve his rights by having his exceptions noted in the record and bringing them forward on the final hearing."

And in the Jones Case, supra, it was held: "An appeal from an order sustaining some of the exceptions to a referee's report and overruling others, and recommitting the report, with instructions to correct the same in conformity to the ruling of the court, is premature, and will be dismissed. Upon the coming in of the report and the rendition of a final judgment, all the exceptions can be noted and passed upon in one appeal." And Merrimon, J., delivering the opinion, said: "It is settled that an appeal does not lie at once from every order or judgment that may be made in the progress of an action. Generally, in the order of procedure, it lies from the final judgment, and then it brings up altogether the exceptions that may have been taken and noted in the record from time to time, and the whole are heard together. An action might easily be protracted indefinitely, if an appeal could be taken at once from every order or judgment, however unimportant or inconclusive, entered in the course of its progress, suspending unnecessarily its progress pending the determination of successive appeals in this court. The due administration of justice does not require such a course of practice, even if a fair construction of the statute providing for appeals to this court would allow it, as it certainly does not."

It will thus be seen that every question raised by exceptions, on the part of the applicant, were and are preserved to him, that they are open for consideration on appeal from the final judgment, and that the court acted by analogy to approved precedents, and on express authority with us (Gray v. James, 147 N. C. 139, 60 S. E. 906), in remanding the case on the original appeal and in holding, on the petition to rehear, that the entire cause was in the court below, to be proceeded with to final judgment. It is no answer to this position that the price realized at the sale is without result on claims of plaintiff, and that the final judgment in no way affects them. This may be true, as a matter of form; but in entering the final judgment the right of appeal at once arises, and the applicant is entitled to have the positions indicated by his exceptions reviewed on such appeal.

For the reasons stated the application on the part of C. H. Miller must be denied, and it is so ordered.

Motion denied.

SMITH v. MILLER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 17, 1911.)

1. CERTIORARI (§ 6*)—GROUNDS—ERROR OF COUNSEL.

Error of counsel, whereby a party fails to appeal from a final judgment, is not ground for certiorari, except under very exceptional circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-11; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. CERTIORARI (§ 16*)—FINALITY OF DETERMINATION—INTERLOCUTORY JUDGMENT.

Where the judgment against a party is retained for further orders, and there is no judgment disposing of the costs or directing payment of them, the judgment is interlocutory and not appealable, and certiorari will not be granted as a substitute for an appeal.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 514*)—RECORD—SPECIAL ORDERS AS TO CONTENTS—PRINTING.

On appeal from final judgment, in an action from which a former appeal has been taken and in which the record fully presented the appellant's exceptions, it will only be necessary in making up the record to set out so much of the proceedings since the former appeal as present such orders as affect the appellants, and to print such additional record.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 460*)—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS—APPEAL FROM FINAL JUDGMENT—UNDERTAKING.

Upon compliance with Revisal 1905, § 598, relating to the giving of an undertaking to stay proceedings, there will be a stay of execution as to parties appealing from a final judgment.

Action by E. A. Smith against C. H. Miller and others. Decree for plaintiff, and C. H. Miller petitions for certiorari to bring up his appeal. Petition denied.

A. S. Barnard, for petitioner.

CLARK, C. J. This is a petition for certiorari by C. H. Miller. The facts have been fully stated in an opinion just filed by Mr. Justice Hoke (71 S. E. 353), denying Miller's motion to consider his exceptions, without the necessity of an appeal. He now asks for a certiorari to bring up his appeal, alleging that he failed to appeal from the final judgment rendered at the December term below on account of the error of his counsel.

[1] The court has often held that this would not be ground for a certiorari, except possibly under very exceptional circumstances. Barber v. Justice, 138 N. C. 21, 50 S. E. 445; Cozart v. Assurance Co., 142 N. C. 524, 55 S. E. 411; Harrill v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 544, 57 S. E. 382.

[2] Besides we find upon examination of the judgment at December term, 1910, below that it is not a final judgment, but the cause is "retained for further orders," and there is no judgment disposing of the costs or directing payment of them. If the ground for a certiorari was sufficient in other respects, it could not be granted as a substitute for an appeal when the judgment was interlocutory, and no appeal lay.

[3] At the next term of the court below, the petitioner can move for final judgment in the action, and on his appeal therefrom the exception heretofore taken by him will be brought up and reviewed. As it will be expensive and entirely unnecessary to reprint the voluminous record which was here on the former appeal, on the appeal from the final judgment, the record which was brought here on the former appeal (151 N. C. 629, 66 S. E. 671), and which fully presented the petitioner's exceptions, can be used without reprinting. It will only be necessary in making out the record on the appeal from the final judgment to set out so much of the proceedings since the former appeal as is necessary to present such orders as affect C. H. Miller, and other appellants, if there shall be others. And it will only be necessary to print such additional record.

[4] Should there be an appeal from the final judgment, there will be a stay of execution as to such of the parties as appeal, upon compliance with the requirements of Revisal 1905, § 598.

(39 S. C. 34)

SOUTHERN POWER CO. v. WALKER.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 274*)—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—CONTEST—PROCEDURE.

When the right to institute condemnation proceedings is contested, the proper remedy is to bring an action in the court of common pleas, that the court may, in the exercise of its chancery powers, determine such right.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 35*)—POWER OF CORPORATIONS—STATUTES—REPEAL.

Civ. Code, § 1895, providing that corporations shall have no power to condemn lands except for certain purposes, was repealed by necessary implication by Act Feb. 25, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 489), conferring on electric lighting and power companies, whether incorporated under the laws of the state or thereunder domesticated, the right to resort to condemnation proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 113*)—TITLE AND SUBJECT OF ACT—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Act Feb. 25, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 489), entitled, "An act to grant unto electric lighting and power companies all the rights, etc., subject to the same duties and liabilities, as are conferred on telegraph and telephone companies under section 2211, etc., of the Civil Code, and to amend said section 2211, by adding another provision at the end thereof," does not violate Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that every act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, the subject of the act being the granting of certain rights, etc., to electric lighting, etc., companies and that part of the title describing those rights not being another subject, but merely explanatory of the nature of the powers conferred, and that portion of the title amending section 2211, by adding a proviso at the end thereof, not being another subject, but being merely intended to provide a method to achieve the object expressed in the title, and therefore being germane to that object.

4. STATUTES (§ 170*)—RE-ENACTMENT.

To the extent that the Legislature may refer, even to the provisions of a repealed statute and adopt them, the repealed statute is thereby re-enacted, and to that extent is as much the law as if its provisions were set out in the new statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 245, 248, 249; Dec. Dig. § 170.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Condemnation proceedings by the Southern Power Company against L. P. Walker. From the decree, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

The exceptions referred to in the opinion are as follows:

"(1) Because his honor erred in holding that the fact that the state of New Jersey did not give to the respondent corporation the right and power to condemn lands would not prevent this state from so doing if it should see proper to do so; it being submitted that a foreign corporation coming into this state cannot exercise larger powers than those conferred upon it by the parent state.

"(2) Because his honor erred in holding that the act of the Legislature of the state of South Carolina found in the Acts of 1904, p. 489, is not in violation of article 3, § 17, of the Constitution, which provides that 'every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title'—it being submitted that the title to said act gives no intimation of what is in the act itself—and the real subject and the real contents thereof are the right given to electric light and power companies to condemn private property, when no such drastic or unusual power is even hinted at in the title. The act is therefore unconstitutional, because not complying with the provisions of the section just herein mentioned.

"(3) Because his honor erred in holding that the title of the act just mentioned, to wit, the act of 1904, shows that 'electric light and power companies' is the subject, when he might as well have held that 'telephone and telegraph companies' is the subject, and, if this is true, then the act in question relates to two subjects, and is therefore unconstitutional.

"(4) Because his honor erred in not holding that it is not a compliance with the constitutional provisions above referred to to refer to the original act merely by the number of sections of the published laws, and that the true and actual subject of any act must be expressed in its title, and not by way of reference to some other law, in order to make it constitutional and valid.

"(5) Because his honor erred in not holding that the act referred to refers to two subjects, and is therefore unconstitutional, it being submitted: (1) That it attempts to confer upon electric light and power companies certain rights and powers theretofore enjoyed by telephone and telegraph companies. (2) It attempts to amend the then existing law, with regard to the powers of telephone and telegraph companies.

"(6) Because his honor erred in holding that the Southern Power Company comes under that class of corporations known as quasi public corporations when he should have held that under the terms of its charter and the laws of the state of South Carolina the said corporation is a private corporation, and therefore has no right to condemn private property for its own use, as section 17, art. 1, of the Constitution of South Carolina, forbids this.

"(7) Because his honor should have held that since the state of South Carolina has no power of regulation or control over the affairs of the said corporation, Southern Power Company, with respect to the manner in which it shall do business—the rate it shall charge the people whom it shall serve—it is therefore a private corporation, and cannot have given to it the power to condemn private property for its uses.

"(8) Because his honor erred in not holding from the undisputed evidence shown by the several contracts introduced in evidence that the petitioner, Southern Power Company, has been making, and does make, with its various patrons contracts differing in rates of charges and in other particulars and that it thereby establishes itself as a private corporation with the right to furnish its power and other products to such persons and on such terms as it may choose.

"(9) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not holding that certain of the powers and privileges named in its charter at least, if not all of them—with the exception of the power to light the streets of municipalities—were, and are, private and in no sense public, and, inasmuch as the public uses and the private uses for which the said power company has sought to condemn appellant's lands cannot be separated so that condemnation may be had for the one and not for the other, the said Southern Power Company cannot, under the law, have any right to condemn at all, and the circuit judge should have so held.

"(10) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not holding that inasmuch as very nearly all, if not quite all, of the powers given to the respondent Southern Power Company are for private uses and purposes, and in no sense public, the said corporation did not have the power to condemn for any of these uses, and its power to condemn should have been, and should be limited to the condemnation for those of the uses and purposes named in its charter, which are clearly public.

"(11) Because his honor erred in dismissing each and every of the grounds of appeal of this defendant, and in not holding that each and every of the said grounds should be sustained.

"(12) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in sustaining all grounds of the appeal of the original petitioner, Southern Power Company, when it was distinctly understood and agreed between the parties to this proceeding that all questions affecting the condemnation money to be paid and the methods of reaching the amount thereof should be postponed until after the determination of the legal questions now raised, with the exception that, if the right to condemn should be established in this proceeding, the amount of compensation to be paid to the defendant should then be fixed by a new jury in the court of common pleas."

J. W. Nash and Simpson & Bomar, for appellant. Osborne, Lucas & Cocke, Nicholls & Nicholls, and John Gary Evans, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The petitioner herein seeks a right of way through the land of the defendant under condemnation proceedings. In accordance with the practice in such cases, a jury was impaneled, and assessed the damages, to be paid by the petitioner, to the defendant. Both the petitioner and the defendant appealed to the circuit court. The petitioner's grounds were sustained, but those of the defendant were overruled. The defendant then appealed to this court upon exceptions, which will be reported.

[1] "When the right to institute condemnation proceedings is contested, the proper remedy is to bring an action in the court of common pleas, in order that the court may, in the exercise of its chancery powers, determine such right." Water Co. v. Nunamaker, 73 S. C. 550, 53 S. E. 996. In the case under consideration the defendant did not bring an action to contest the petitioner's right to condemnation proceedings, but raised the questions involved on an appeal from the verdict of the jury. As no objection has been interposed to the manner in which the questions are presented, we will not decline to consider them, especially as they are of public interest.

[2] The first question that will be considered is whether the petitioner, being a foreign corporation, without the power to condemn in the state of its origin, was empowered under the laws of this state to exercise the right of condemnation. The petitioner's certificate of incorporation under the laws of the state of New Jersey contains this provision: "Nothing herein shall empower the said corporation to construct, maintain or operate railroads, telephone or telegraph lines, canals, turnpikes, or any other business which shall need to possess the right of taking and condemning lands, within the state of New Jersey; but nothing herein contained, shall prevent the taking and condemnation of lands, without the state of New Jersey." Section 1790, c. 44, Code Laws, is as follows: "All and every such foreign corporation, carrying on business or owning property in this state, shall be subject to the laws of the same, in like manner as corporations chartered, under the laws of this state. * * * Section 1895, c. 48, Code Laws, is as follows: "Corporations organized for any purpose, under the provisions of this article, shall have power to construct and operate a railroad, electric railway, tramway, turnpike or canal, for their own use and purposes, and shall have the right to effect a crossing, with any existing railroad or public roads, as is now provided by law for railroad corporations; but they shall have no power to condemn lands, except for crossing any existing railroad or public road, as herein provided." Acts 1904, p. 489, is as follows:

"An act to grant unto electric lighting and power companies all the rights, powers, and privileges, subject to the same duties and liabilities, as are conferred upon telegraph and telephone companies, under sections 2211, 2212, 2213, 2214, 2215, 2216, 2217, 2218, and 2219, of the Civil Code of South Carolina, and to amend said section 2211, by adding another proviso, at the end thereof.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, that, subject to the same duties and liabilities, all the rights, powers and privileges conferred upon telegraph and telephone companies, under sections 2211, 2212, 2213, 2214, 2215, 2216, 2217, 2218, and 2219, of the Civil Code of South Carolina, be, and the same are hereby granted, unto electric lighting and power companies, incorporated under the laws of this state, or any other state, upon complying with the laws of this state, regulating foreign corporations, and by becoming a domestic corporation.

"Sec. 2. That section 2211 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following additional proviso at the end thereof, to wit: Provided, further, that no telegraph, telephone, electric light or power wire, shall be erected or maintained, within fifty yards of any public road or highway in this state, unless the same, shall be so constructed, erected and maintained and provided, with sufficient lightning guards or arresters (and in case of electric light or power wires, with such automatic cut-offs, and other devices), as may be necessary for the protection of the persons and property."

Then follows the penal clause. It will thus be seen that section 1790 of the Code of Laws shows that the petitioner was subject to the laws of South Carolina in like manner as corporations chartered under the laws of this state. And the act of 1904 not only confers upon electric lighting and power companies incorporated under the laws of this state the privileges therein mentioned, but also, upon those companies incorporated under the laws of any state, which have complied with the laws of this state, regulating foreign corporations, by which they become domestic corporations. The petition alleges, and it is not denied, that the petitioner became a domestic corporation under the laws of this state regulating foreign corporations. As it is clearly the intention of the act of 1904 to confer upon electric lighting and power companies, whether incorporated under the laws of this state, or domesticated under its laws, the right, to resort to condemnation proceedings, and, as the provisions of this act are inconsistent with section 1895 of the Code of Laws, it must be regarded as repealed by necessary implication. The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

[3] The next question for consideration is whether the presiding judge erred in ruling that the title of said act was not obnoxious to article 3, § 17, of the Constitution, which is as follows: "Every act or resolution, having the force of law, shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." The purpose of this provision is stated in Cooley's Con. Lim. pp. 171, 172, to be: "First, to prevent hodge-podge, or log-rolling legislation; second, to prevent surprise or fraud upon the Legislature, by means of provisions in bills, of which the title gave no intimation, and which might therefore be overlooked, and carelessly and unintentionally adopted; and third, to fairly apprise the people, through such publication of legislative proceedings, as is usually made, of the subjects of legislation, that are being considered, in order that they may have opportunity, of being heard thereon, by petition or otherwise, if they shall so desire. The generality of a title is, therefore, no objection to it, so long as it is not made a cover to legislation, incongruous in itself, and which, by no fair intendment, can be considered as having a necessary or proper connection." On page 175 the author also says: "There has been a general disposition, to construe the constitutional provision liberally, rather than to embarrass legislation by a construction, whose strictness is unnecessary, to the accomplishment of the beneficial purpose for which it has been adopted." "When an act of the Legislature expresses in its title the object of the act, the title embraces and expresses any lawful means to achieve the object, thus fulfilling the constitutional injunction that every law shall embrace but one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title." This language was used by the court in San Antonio v. Lane, 32 Tex. 402, and adopted in Charleston v. Oliver, 16 S. C. 47, and San Antonio v. Mehafeey, 96 U. S. 315, 24 L. Ed. 816. In Connor v. Railway, 23 S. C. 427, the court had under consideration the constitutionality of an act, entitled, "An act to incorporate the Green Pond, Walterboro & Branchville Railroad Company," by which power was conferred upon the county commissioners to issue bonds in subscription to the capital stock of this railway. The act was declared to be constitutional. In commenting on that case the court in Floyd v. Perrin, 30 S. C. 1, 8 S. E. 14, 2 L. R. A. 242, used this language: "The principle upon which it was held that the act was constitutional was that the authority granted to the county to subscribe to the railway was a means to achieve the object expressed in the title of the act, and therefore was germane to that object. So it appears to us that declaring the township a corporate body, with power to tax in aid of the Greenville & Port Royal Railroad, was contributory to, and furnished means to achieve, the object of the act, as expressed in the title." See, also, Riley v. Union Station Co., 71 S. C. 457, 51 S. E. 485, 110 Am. St. Rep. 579; State v. O'Day, 74 S. C. 448, 54 S. E. 607; Park v. Cotton Mills, 75 S. C. 560, 56 S. E. 234; Aycock Little Co. v. Railway, 76 S. C. 331, 57 S. E. 27; Bulst v. Charleston, 77 S. C. 260, 57 S. E. 862; State v. Hunter, 79 S. C. 91, 60 S. E. 226; Jelico v. Commissioners, 83 S. C. 481, 65 S. E. 725.

The subject of the act is the granting of certain rights, powers, and privileges to electric lighting and power companies. That part of the title describing those rights, privileges, and powers to be such as are conferred upon telegraph and telephone companies under the sections of the Code of Laws therein mentioned was not another "subject," but was intended merely to explain the nature of the powers conferred upon those companies, and really was unnecessary. Nor was that portion of the title amending section 2211, by adding a proviso at the end thereof, another "subject," but was merely intended to provide a method to achieve the object expressed in the title of the act, and therefore was germane to that object.

[4] To the extent that the Legislature may refer, even to the provisions of a repealed statute and adopt them, the repealed statute is thereby re-enacted, and, to that extent, is as much the law as if its provisions were set out in the new statute. Lyles v. McCown, 82 S. C. 127, 63 S. E. 355. Therefore it cannot be successfully contended that the act was rendered invalid by reason of the fact that the title referred to the provisions in another statute, which could be adopted, without setting them out, in the body of the act. The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

The next question that will be considered is whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge in ruling that the land was subject to condemnation for a right of way, other than for a public purpose. This question has lately undergone judicial discussion so frequently that we deem it only necessary to cite the following cases to show that the exceptions raising this question cannot be sustained: Boyd v. Granite Co., 66 S. C. 433, 45 S. E. 10; Wilson v. Alderman, 69 S. C. 176, 48 S. E. 81; Riley v. Union Station Co., 71 S. C. 457, 51 S. E. 485, 110 Am. St. Rep. 579; Alderman v. Wilson, 77 S. C. 165, 57 S. E. 756; McMeekin v. Power Co., 80 S. C. 512, 61 S. E. 1020, 128 Am. St. Rep. 885; Williams v. Gold Mine Co., 85 S. C. 1, 66 S. E. 117, 1057. The appellant's attorneys were granted permission to review these cases in so far as this question was involved, but, after careful consideration, the court adheres to the doctrine therein announced. These views practically dispose of all the questions, now presented to the court for determination.

Appeal dismissed.

HARRELL et al. v. COLUMBIA ELECTRIC ST. RY., LIGHT & POWER CO.

1. TRIAL (§ 63*)—ORDER OF PROOF—JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

It was not an abuse of discretion to permit plaintiffs to introduce cumulative testimony at the close of defendant's case, though it did not reply to defendant's evidence.

2. TRIAL (§ 312*)—RECALLING JURY FOR INSTRUCTION—PROPRIETY.

Recall of the jury for proper instruction is not error.

3. CARRIERS (§ 318*)—STREET RAILWAYS—INJURY TO BOARDING PASSENGER—WANTON NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to sustain a finding that injury to a boarding street car passenger caused by suddenly starting the car resulted from wanton negligence.

4. CARRIERS (§ 341*)—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE—WANTONNESS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Contributory negligence was no defense to suit for wanton negligent injury to a street railway passenger.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; J. W. De Vore, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by R. E. Harrell and another against the Columbia Electric Street Railway, Light & Power Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Elliott & Herbert, for appellant. Weston & Aycock and E. J. Best, for respondents.

JONES, C. J. The plaintiff Mattie Harrell, joining her husband, R. E. Harrell, in this suit, recovered of the defendant company a judgment of $5,000 for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by her on October 30, 1907, in the city of Columbia, S. C., at the intersection of Main and Taylor streets, by being thrown from the running board of defendant's car, through the negligence and wanton conduct of defendant (1) in failing to have the guard rail down on the west side of its car going north up Main street, at that time unusually crowded because the State Fair was being held in the city; (2) in suddenly and recklessly and without warning starting said car before plaintiff had sufficient time to get into the car and be seated.

[1] The first and second exceptions of defendant appellant assign error in permitting the plaintiff Mrs. Harrell and a witness, Harry Olstein, to testify after the close of defendant's testimony as to matters not in reply to any testimony brought out by defendant. The testimony was merely cumulative, and its admission was within the discretion of the trial court, which does not appear to have been improperly exercised. Wilson v. Moss, 79 S. C. 120, 60 S. E. 313.

[2] After the jury had been charged and had retired to their room, Judge De Vere discovered that he had inadvertently failed to instruct them as to punitive damages, and called the jury back and charged them on that subject. This is made the basis of the fourth exception. There was no error. On the contrary, it is a proper exercise of the judicial function to cure an omission to give proper instruction, as well as to withdraw an improper instruction, as was done in State v. Lightsey, 43 S. C. 114, 20 S. E. 975.

[3] The third exception alleges error in refusing defendant's request to charge that there was no evidence in the case to support a verdict for punitive damages, and the fifth exception, in part, alleges error in the refusal of motion for new trial made on the same ground. We are unable to say that there was no testimony whatever tending to show wantonness, since there was testimony that the car was moved suddenly with a violent jerk without warning, while plaintiff was upon the running board of the car and before she had time to take her seat. Whether the conductor or motorman knew, or should have known, of plaintiff's exposed position at the time, whether due warning was given, or whether the sudden jerk was due to some peculiar or unpreventable action of the electric power, were matters of explanation for the jury.

[4] The fifth exception also contends there was error in refusing new trial because the evidence showed contributory negligence of plaintiff. After a careful reading of the testimony, we cannot say that the cause of action for mere negligence was conclusively overthrown by the testimony tending to show negligence on the part of plaintiff, and, as to the cause of action based on willfulness, the matter of contributory negligence is inapplicable.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

FORT v. CALDWELL et al.

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

Defendants contracting with the purchasers of timber rights on land for the cutting of the timber and expending time and money and assuming financial obligations in carrying the contract into effect, before they had notice that the deed to such timber was void, were purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice.

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF TIMBER—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

Where purchasers of timber rights from one holding under a deed subsequently declared void were allowed to continue operations for a part of the time of the contract, and thereafter voluntarily removed such parts of their mill as rendered its further operation impossible, they were not entitled to damages.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Leslie H. Fort against Howard Caldwell and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Judgment modified.

The decree and exceptions referred to in the opinion are as follows:

"On and for many years prior to the 12th day of September, 1907, the plaintiff was the owner in fee of a large body of timbered land situated in Lexington county. That at said time the defendant Howard Caldwell was a real estate dealer living in the city of Columbia. That said Caldwell opened up negotiations with the plaintiff and her husband to acquire a license to cut and market the timber on said premises, and, as a result, the plaintiff in consideration of $500, on that date paid to her by said Caldwell, executed and entered into a written agreement with the defendant Caldwell, wherein she agreed to sell to the said Howard Caldwell all the saw timber on the said premises for a space of six years, the said agreement by its terms expressly authorizing the said Howard Caldwell to cut and saw and take and carry away and sell all the saw timber now standing on said land, and other privileges not material to this issue are fully set out in said agreement.

"It is also stipulated in said agreement that the defendant Howard Caldwell, in consideration of the covenant above set forth, would pay to the plaintiff $2,500 upon the execution and delivery to him by the plaintiff of a proper conveyance carrying out the terms of said agreement, including a deed to a mill plant and its equipments, already erected on said premises, also $6,000 to be paid 9 months from the date of the bargain and sale of said timber, with interest from date until paid at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; also $3,000 12 months from the date of said deed and sale, with the same rate of interest (6 per cent. until paid). Subsequently to the execution of this agreement, and on the 19th day of September, 1907, the plaintiff executed to the defendant Howard Caldwell an instrument in the nature of a deed, but in effect a license, conveying the saw timber on said premises with full power to cut, saw, and take and carry away and sell all the saw timber standing upon the said land. This deed by its terms conveys to the said Howard Caldwell the land as well as the timber for a period of six years. The consideration expressed in said deed is $12,000. The real consideration, however, was the execution and delivery by Caldwell of two promissory notes, the one for $3,000, dated 19th of September, 1907, payable 12 months after date to the order of the plaintiff; the other executed at the same time for $6,000 and payable 9 months after date, together with the $500 paid at the time of the execution of the agreement for the license, and the sum of $2,500 paid at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed. That immediately after the execution and delivery of said deed, to wit, on the 19th day of September, 1907, said defendant Howard Caldwell went into possession of said real estate and commenced his operations cutting, sawing, and marketing the timber on said premises. That thereafter, on the 13th day of January, 1908, said defendant Caldwell entered into a contract with the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co., whereby he sold and conveyed to said N. C. McDuffie & Co. as much of the timber on said tract of land as was sufficient to run a shingle mill for 'so long a time as the timber on said land lasts or until it had been exhausted.' This contract included a sale of both original timber and tops.

"The consideration for this contract was recited to be the sum of $1 in hand paid, and a further payment by N. C. McDuffie Company to said Howard Caldwell of so much per thousand for shingles cut by said N. C. McDuffie Company, —, a price varying according to the grades of shingles manufactured. Under this contract N. C. McDuffie & Co. moved its shingle mill to said tract of land, dug a well, put up sheds and tenant houses, and expended a considerable sum of money in putting itself in a position to carry out its part of the contract, and commenced to develop its business by the manufacture and sale of various grades of shingles. That thereafter, on or about the 24th day of February, 1908, said N. C. McDuffie & Co. contracted to buy from said Howard Caldwell all of his, said Howard Caldwell's, timber rights on said tract of land, and actually paid the sum of $100 in cash as a part of the purchase price, agreeing to pay the balance, to wit, the sum of — dollars upon the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient deed conveying the same rights to it as the said Howard Caldwell had acquired in said timber under his deed from Lessie H. Fort, the plaintiff herein.

"It appears from the complaint and the answer of N. C. McDuffie & Co.: That about this time—before the actual transfer of Howard Caldwell to N. C. McDuffie & Co.—that the plaintiff, learning of the proposed transfer, and being acquainted with the fact that the consideration to be paid by N. C. McDuffie & Co. to Howard Caldwell was less than the aggregate sum of the two notes given by Caldwell to her for the agreed portion of the purchase price under her said deed of the 19th of September, 1907, made a demand upon said Caldwell to have the purchase money from the McDuffie Company paid to her, but that such demand was refused. That thereupon, through her attorneys, she warned the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. not to comply further with the terms of its agreed purchase, as she intended to take steps to protect her rights therein, and it appears that said N. C. McDuffie & Co. did not further comply with its contract to purchase. Subsequently, by complaint dated the 3d day of March, 1908, the plaintiff brought this action against the defendants above named, alleging her prior ownership in the tract of land and 'the sawmill, engine, log wagons, wagons, and all other sawmill equipments then located upon the said tract of land.' That she had contracted to sell the timber rights and the chattels above mentioned to said Howard Caldwell upon the terms hereinbefore stated in this decree, and that she had so conveyed the same upon the terms agreed upon in view of certain representations made to her by said Caldwell as to his worth and ability to meet the credit portion of the purchase price as represented by the said two notes, aggregating $9,000. That the deed was procured through fraud and thereof; further, that, in spite of such representing to plaintiff his worth in money and in representing to her the time that it would take for him to cut, saw, sell, and dispose of said timber, and in further representing that he could not and would not sell and dispose of the timber until after she had been paid the credit portion of the purchase price thereof; further, that, in spite of such representation, said Howard Caldwell had contracted to sell for a lump sum of money in cash—being less than the amount due by him to the plaintiff—all of said timber, with the intent to defeat the payment of the sum of money he was due plaintiff, and that, by reason thereof, plaintiff would suffer an irreparable injury and lose the whole of the $9,000 owing her. The defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. was made a party to the action as the one to whom said Howard Caldwell had contracted to sell said timber.

"The action was for fraud in the obtaining of the said deed to said tract of timber, and the complaint prayed that the conveyance be declared void and the deed ordered delivered up for cancellation; further, that said defendant Caldwell be enjoined and restrained from cutting, selling, and disposing of the timber or in any manner interfering with the same until he had paid the sum of $9,000 owed by him to the plaintiff, and that the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. be enjoined and restrained from buying said timber and from paying the defendant Caldwell any sum of money therefor. The complaint also prayed for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property and for such other relief as might be just and might meet the demands of equity. Thereafter, on the 12th of March, 1908, the Honorable John S. Wilson, judge presiding in the Fifth circuit, passed an order requiring the defendants to show cause before him why the injunction prayed for in the complaint should not be granted, and in the meantime enjoining and forbidding said defendants from committing any of the acts prayed for by the plaintiff. The summons, complaint, and rule to show cause was served on both defendants on the 13th day of March, 1908.

"Both defendants made return to the rule to show cause, and on the 24th day of March, 1908, his honor, Judge John S. Wilson, made permanent the temporary injunction theretofore granted, pending the hearing of the cause on its merits, requiring the plaintiff to enter into an undertaking in the sum of $5,000, conditioned that the plaintiff would pay to the defendants such damages as they might sustain by reason of such injunction if the court should finally decide that the plaintiff was not entitled thereto. The record disclosed the fact that the injunction bond required of the plaintiff was given.

"Thereafter both defendants answered. The answer of the defendant Caldwell is, in effect, a denial of all of the allegations of the complaint charging fraud and imposition on his part, but admitting the allegations with reference to his purchase of the timber and incumbrance by way of mortgage placed thereon, and a contract to sell the same to the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. The answer of the defendant McDuffie & Co. sets up the defense of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice under its contract 'to run a shingle mill for so long a time as the timber on said land should last or until it had been exhausted, with no limitation as to the time except such as was set forth in the deed from the plaintiff to the defendant Howard Caldwell.' It also admits that it had contracted to purchase from said Howard Caldwell the entire timber rights on said tract of land—such contract to purchase being subsequent in date to the contract for the operation of the shingle mill. It asks to be relieved from the contract to purchase on account of having been restrained and enjoined from complying with said contract to purchase. It asks for damages under the restraining order on account of the expense it had been put to in fitting up and carrying on its operations under said shingle mill contract, and for damages resulting from its being prevented from performing its work, labor, and operations under said contract.

"The only modification of the order of injunction hereinbefore referred to was a consent order signed by the Honorable John S. Wilson on April 15, 1908, permitting the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. to continue its operations under its shingle mill contract until June, 1908, term of the court of common pleas for Lexington county—the prices to be paid for shingles cut to be those mentioned in said contract, all parties agreeing that such prices were full and fair—payment being made to the clerk of the court for Lexington county, who should hold all funds coming into his hands from such source subject to the further orders of this court. This right continued until some time in June, 1908, when the attorneys for the plaintiff declined to have the order continued, and the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. discontinued its operations by reason of the former injunction order, shut down their mill, and kept the same shut down until the ——— day of ———, when they moved the same away from said tract of land.

"Under said consent order all other rights and equities of the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. were preserved except that it was released from its contract to purchase the timber from Howard Caldwell. Under an order of reference, dated the 23d of June, 1908, signed by his honor, Judge J. W. DeVore, presiding judge, referring the cause to Samuel B. George, Esq., to take the testimony, the case now comes before me for a hearing and determination; the testimony having been reported by said referee. So far as the controversy constitutes a conflict of the rights of the plaintiff on the one hand, and the defendant Howard Caldwell on the other hand, after hearing exhaustive argument by counsel for all parties, Messrs. Graham and Sharpe on behalf of Mrs. Fort, Messrs. D. W. Robinson and Washington Clark on behalf of the defendant Caldwell, and Messrs. Logan & Edmunds on behalf of the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co., and after a careful review of the testimony, I am satisfied that in the making of the contract to sell the timber and the mill plant which went therewith, and in the subsequent conveying the same, that the plaintiff and her husband who was acting with her, and was at the time an aged man, feeble in health

(he has since the commencement of this action died), were overreached by the said Howard Caldwell, and that the deed executed and delivered by her to said Caldwell should be delivered up for cancellation.

"The evidence to my mind is clear and convincing that the representations alleged in the complaint, as having been made by said Caldwell to the plaintiff, were made, and that upon the strength of these representations the deed to the timber rights was executed. The testimony of all parties present when the original agreement was made, with the exception of the testimony of the defendant Caldwell, all shows that the plaintiff relied upon the representations of said defendant as to his worth and ability to pay the obligation incurred for the credit portion of the purchase money, and the representations as to the length of time it would take to cut, saw, and market the timber, and that she would be paid before that time elapsed. Mrs. Fort testified: 'I asked if it was not necessary or customary in a case like that for me to have some security, something like that. * * * He said, "No," that would not be necessary. He said the timber would be there, and that he could not possibly make way with the timber by the time payment was due in six months. He intended to saw it himself.' The witnesses Earle Fort and W. D. Durham testified to the same effect. Mrs. Fort and the two witnesses named also testified as to the defendant Caldwell giving an estimate of his worth in money and property.

"The denial of said defendant upon these matters is qualified and more in the nature of an avoidance. He admits that he did not represent his worth, but simply denies the extent he went to in making these representations. As to the matter of time within which he expected to cut and market the timber, he admits in his answer that the credit portion would become due 'long before the expiration of the six years mentioned in the contract and deed.' It could not have been in the mind of either party at the time of the execution of the contract and deed, certainly so far as the testimony shows, that the purchase made by Caldwell was for any purpose other than to use the rights individually, and that nothing could be done to defeat the plaintiff's rights to recover the $9,000 owing for the credit portion. Yet the defendant Caldwell placed a mortgage incumbrance on the land and contracted to sell the same for a price much less than he owed the plaintiff for the credit portion of the purchase price, and refused to do any act whereby the plaintiff's rights might be protected. His explanation of his conduct falls to satisfy me of the bona fides of the transaction on his part. A great portion of the best timber, so far as the testimony shows, has been cut—the value of the tract as a timber tract greatly decreased—a considerable lot of timber has been marketed, and the balance standing was contracted to be sold. Had the latter transaction been consummated, there can be scarcely a doubt but that the plaintiff would have suffered an irreparable injury in the loss of a debt due her on account of the rights which she had parted with contrary to every representation made to her, and I am forced to the conclusion from all of the acts of the defendant Caldwell, after he acquired the timber rights from the plaintiff, that the original transaction in procuring the contract and deed was so lacking in the elements of good faith on his part as to shock the conscience of a court of equity, and require the cancellation of the deed as hereinafter ordered and decreed.

"So far as the rights of the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. are concerned, they are now under the pleadings, and the order of Judge Wilson of date 15th of April, 1908, hereinbefore referred to, limited to a consideration of the single matter of their rights as bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration without notice under their 'shingle mill contract'; the matter of their rights to purchase the entire tract having been eliminated under said consent order of the 15th of April, 1908. I have no hesitation in reaching a conclusion as to their rights under said contract.

"At a glance, it is seen that McDuffie became a purchaser of the license for a valuable consideration. And I so hold, and conclude that, as between the claim of the plaintiff against the defendant Howard Caldwell for a rescission and cancellation of the deed and an injunction restraining him from further use of the timber, the rights of N. C. McDuffie & Co. intervene as bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration without notice under said contract referred to, and that they are entitled to such protection as innocent purchasers.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed:

"(1) That the defendant Howard Caldwell be, and he is hereby, forever restrained and enjoined from cutting, selling, wasting, disposing of, or in any manner using the timber on the land described in the complaint.

"(2) That the defendant Howard Caldwell deliver up to the clerk of court for Lexington county the said deed of Leslie H. Fort to Howard Caldwell of date the 19th day of September, 1907, and that the same be marked null and void and canceled of record by said clerk of court.

"(3) That inasmuch as the plaintiff Leslie H. Fort received from Howard Caldwell the sum of $3,000 in cash on account of the purchase price of said timber that it be referred to Samuel B. George, Esq., as special referee to take the account between the plaintiff and said Howard Caldwell to determine the difference, if any, between the amount so paid by said Caldwell to plaintiff and the value of the use and occupation of said land and timber, including the amount of timber cut and sold and the depreciation in the value in said timber tract by reason thereof by said Caldwell from the 19th day of September, 1907, to the 13th day of March, 1908, being the date of the temporary restraining order and rule to show cause herein, so the judgment may be rendered accordingly.

"(4) That it be adjudged that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction granted under the order of Judge Wilson, dated 24th of March, 1908, as against the defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co., was restrained and enjoined from pursuing its work under its said contract to cut, saw, and market shingles by the said order of March 24, 1908; that it be referred to the said Samuel B. George, Esq., as special referee to take the testimony as to the damages suffered by said defendant by reason of such injunction order, such testimony being limited to the damages suffered from the said 24th of March, 1908, to the ——— day of January, 1909, at which latter time it voluntarily moved the shingle mill from said tract of land, and that such damages be assessed against the bond given by the plaintiff to indemnify the defendant as provided in said order of March 24, 1908, and that judgment be rendered in favor of said defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. accordingly.

"(6) That the plaintiff have judgment for her costs against the defendant Howard Caldwell.

"(7) The defendant N. C. McDuffie & Co. have judgment for its costs against the plaintiff."

"Exceptions.

"The plaintiff appeals to the Supreme Court of South Carolina from the decree of Hon. Ernest Gary in the above stated case, and will move the said Supreme Court to reverse the same on the following grounds:

"(1) Because his honor erred in holding that the defendant N. C. McDuffie Company were bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration without notice of the timber in question under their 'shingle mill contract,' when said contract shows that no consideration was paid by the McDuffie Company at the time of the execution of said contract, and when the testimony of W. B. Montgomery, the vice president of the McDuffie Company, testified that no money had been paid the defendant, Howard Caldwell, for the said timber up to the time of the commencement of this action, and it is respectfully submitted that there was not a particle of testimony going to show that the defendant McDuffie Company was a purchaser of said timber for value without notice.

"(2) For that his honor erred in not holding that the defendant N. C. McDuffie Company had failed to prove that it had paid valuable consideration for the timber, that it had the legal title, or best right to it, and that it had purchased bona fide without notice, and was not a bona fide purchaser of said timber, for value without notice.

"(3) For that his honor erred in not holding that the deed from plaintiff to defendant Howard Caldwell for the timber in question showed that said timber had not been paid for, but merely 'secured to be paid' was such constructive notice to the defendant McDuffie Company as to put it on inquiry, said deed being on record prior to the execution of said 'shingle mill contract,' and therefore the McDuffie Company was not an innocent purchaser without notice.

"(4) For that his honor erred in not holding that plaintiff being in the actual possession of the land and timber in question, and actually living on said premises, which was well known to the McDuffie Company, operated as notice to the McDuffie Company, who should have made inquiry under the facts of plaintiff and circumstances of this case, and that it could not claim to be an innocent purchaser for value without notice.

"(5) For that his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction granted by Judge Wilson on the 24th day of March, 1908, against the defendant McDuffie Company under the facts and circumstances of the case, when the said McDuffie Company utterly failed to show that it was a bona fide purchaser for value under its shingle mill contract, and when said McDuffie Company advised plaintiff to institute an action for injunction.

"(6) For that his honor erred in holding that the McDuffie Company was entitled to recover of plaintiff damages from the 24th day of March, 1908, to the ——— day of January, 1909, which it had suffered by reason of the injunction, when all the testimony in the case showed, and his honor so found, that said McDuffie Company was allowed to operate its mill under said 'shingle mill contract' by an order of the court herein, until the June term of court in Lexington county, in 1908, and when from McDuffie's own testimony he removed the engine and boiler from said premises in August, 1908, which engine and boiler were parts of said shingle mill and without which he could not have operated it, and it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred as a matter of law in holding that the McDuffie Company was entitled to any damages at all, and especially for any damages prior to June term of court in 1908, and after August, 1908, at which last date the said McDuffie Company voluntarily removed its mill or the greater portion of it from said premises.

"(7) Excepts because his honor erred in holding that the McDuffie Company were entitled to judgment against the plaintiff for its costs, when under the facts and circumstances of the case it is respectfully submitted that it was not entitled to such costs.

"(8) For that his honor erred in not holding that the McDuffie Company was estopped from asking for any damages against the plaintiff in this case, by asserting that it was the friend of plaintiff, and would not injure her; by persuading plaintiff to allow it to operate its shingle mill on said premises from the granting of said order of injunction until the June term of court, 1908.

"(9) For that his honor erred in not holding that the McDuffie Company had violated the said shingle mill contract in failing to saw up the tops and laps of said trees, when the testimony shows that it had not sawed up the tops and laps of the trees, and the dead timber as requested by said contract, but that it had only sawed up the best part of the trees, leaving the tops and laps of the trees and the dead timber on the ground, and, having breached said contract, it could not claim damages.

"(10) Because having required the referee to take the testimony and determine the difference, if any, between the amount paid by Caldwell to the plaintiff and the value of the use and occupation of said land and timber, including the amount of timber cut and sold and the depreciation in the value in said timber tract by reason thereof, by said Caldwell from the 19th of September, 1907, to the 13th day of March, 1908, his honor erred in not requiring the said Caldwell to account for the use and occupation of said lands and timber, including the amount of the timber cut and amount sold, and the depreciation in the value of said timber and land from the 19th day of September, 1908, to the filing of the injunction bond in this case, on the 30th day of March, 1908, when the testimony shows that the said Caldwell and his agents and servants continued to occupy and sell the timber on said land or premises, until the filing of the injunction bond in this case.

"(11) For that having found that the said mill and outfit which the defendant Caldwell bought from plaintiff was a part of the consideration of the $12,000 which Caldwell was to pay plaintiff for said timber, which said sawmill was used by the said Caldwell, and greatly injured and damaged by him, a great portion of which mill and outfit had been removed, torn up, and destroyed, sold, and disposed of by the said Caldwell as shown by the testimony in the case, thereby rendering the same valueless, his honor erred in not requesting him to account for the use, damage, and injury to said land, sawmill, and outfit as well as the parts thereof torn up and destroyed by the said Caldwell.

"(12) For that having held that the defendant Caldwell procured the deed from plaintiff for the timber and sawmill through fraud and imposition, it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in not requiring the defendant Caldwell to account for the use, damage, and injury to said sawmill and outfit, timber, and land from the time he took possession thereof until he ceased to occupy the use and possess the same, to wit, until the 30th day of March, 1908, when the injunction bond was filed in the clerk's office."

W. H. Sharpe and G. T. Graham, for appellant. Logan & Edmunds and Washington Clark, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action to set aside a deed for fraud. The facts are fully stated in the decree of his honor, the circuit judge, which, together with the appellant's exceptions, will be reported.

[1] The first question raised by the exceptions is whether there was error on the part of his honor the circuit judge in concluding that the defendants N. C. McDuffie & Co. were purchasers for valuable consideration without notice. They entered into the contract with Howard Caldwell before they had notice that the deed executed in his favor by the plaintiff was void. Under that contract, N. C. McDuffie & Co. not only assumed financial obligations, but expended time and money in carrying the provisions of the contract into effect, before they had notice that said deed was not valid. The exceptions raising this question are therefore overruled.

[2] The next question is whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge in ruling that N. C. McDuffie & Co. were entitled to damages from the 24th of March, 1908, to the ——— day of January, 1909. There are two reasons why the exceptions raising this question must be sustained. During a part of that time, to wit, from the 15th of April to the June term of the court, in 1908, N. C. McDuffie & Co. were allowed to continue operations under their shingle mill contract. The other reason is that N. C. McDuffie & Co. removed their plant in August, 1908. N. C. McDuffie, one of the defendants, testified as follows: "Q. And you have left the mill there until last January, until the last week in January of this year, for the reason that you had no place to put it? A. No; that is not exactly right." Q. Then, what is right? A. We moved the boiler and engine away from there, about last August. Q. Well you are not damaged $400 per month, as to the boiler and engine that were moved away? A. We purchased a sawmill and necessary equipments to rig up a complete sawmill, and in that way made use of the boiler, engine, and live stock. The shingle machinery was left at the Pellion location until the last week in January of 1909"—thus showing that they voluntarily removed such parts of the shingle mill plant as rendered its further operation impossible. Therefore, upon the accounting, they will not be entitled to recover damages after that time. Statements made in open court by the attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant Howard Caldwell render unnecessary the consideration of the eleventh and twelfth exceptions.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be modified.

STATE ex rel. LYON, Atty. Gen., v. CITY COUNCIL OF AUGUSTA.

FISH (§ 12*)—DAMS—CONSTRUCTION OF FISHWAYS.

The city of Augusta, in maintaining a dam across the Savannah river, must on the South Carolina side thereof construct a fishway according to plans approved by the Department of Fisheries of the United States and the Attorney General of this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

Action by the State, on relation of J. Fraser Lyon, Attorney General, against the City Council of Augusta. Decree rendered.

J. F. Lyon, Atty. Gen., for petitioner. D. S. Henderson, C. Henry Cohen, and W. H. Barrett, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Whereas, subsequent to the filing of the petition and answer in the above case, the General Assembly did, at its January session, 1911, adopt an act, which was duly approved by the Governor, as follows:

"An act relating to the action pending in the Supreme Court concerning the dam across the Savannah river beginning in Edgefield county, and in relation to the maintenance of so much of said dam as lies in the waters of Savannah river from the middle thread of the stream to the South Carolina shore.

"Whereas, the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina did in the year 1909 (see Journal of Senate of 1909, page 807) adopt the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring, that the Attorney General be and, he is hereby required to bring an action against the owners of the dam situated in Edgefield county, state of South Carolina, above the city of Augusta, to erect and maintain proper fishways, or an action to abate said dam as in violation of the terms of the original grant by said state of South Carolina as he is advised;" and

"Whereas, the Attorney General of this state did, in compliance with said resolution, institute an action before the Supreme Court of this state against the city council of Augusta for the purpose of effectuating the object of said resolution; and

"Whereas, the city council of Augusta, the defendant to said action, has made answer thereto, the full text of which will appear by reference to said answer on file in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of South Carolina; and

"Whereas, the city council of Augusta has secured from the Department of Fisheries of the United States an approved plan of the best kind and location of fishway, and said plan and location has been examined by a majority of the members of the committee from the General Assembly charged with this matter, and by the Attorney General, and such plan and location is now in the hands of the Attorney General to be filed with the Secretary of State:

"Now, be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina:

"Section 1. That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to apply for the entry of a decree in the above mentioned action of the State of South Carolina ex relatione J. Fraser Lyon, Attorney General, against the City Council of Augusta, now pending in the Supreme Court of this state, to the following effect, to wit: That the city council of Augusta shall be required to promptly construct a fishway of the kind and in the location indicated on the said plan, approved by the Department of Fisheries of the United States and by the Attorney General, and to be filed by him in the office of the Secretary of State; and that so long as such fishway be maintained as thus constructed, this will be recognized as a compliance with the duties of the city of Augusta as to the maintenance of such fishway. That such fishway as aforesaid shall be constructed by the 1st day of May, nineteen hundred and eleven; the said decree to contain such other provisions as may be proper to carry out the purposes of this act: Provided, that if work of constructing said fishway be prevented by bad weather or other unavoidable, reasonable cause, the Attorney General is empowered to extend the time for constructing the same: Provided, further, that the application for the decree above provided for shall not be made until a resolution or ordinance shall be duly adopted by the city council of Augusta and filed in the Supreme Court of this state, authorizing and directing their attorneys to appear in said court and consent to such decree.

"Sec. 2. That should such fishway at any time be damaged or destroyed, it shall be repaired or restored as may be necessary according to the plans hereinbefore referred to (unless other plans shall then be prescribed by the General Assembly), within such reasonable time as may be prescribed by the Board of Fisheries of South Carolina.

"Sec. 3. When such fishway shall have been completed, the Attorney General shall request the Department of Fisheries of the United States to cause the same to be inspected by a representative of said department, and the report of such representative of the Department of Fisheries as to whether or not it has been constructed in accordance with the aforesaid plans shall be filed with the Secretary of State, to be kept along with said plans. If, however, said Department of Fisheries declines to inspect the said fishway, then the Board of Fisheries of the state of South Carolina, appointed in pursuance of Act No. 60 of the Acts of the General Assembly of this state for the year 1906, be, and they are hereby, required to inspect such fishway so erected, and make their report to the Attorney General, and to the Secretary of State, which said report shall be filed with said plans.

"Sec. 4. That the right and power of the city council of Augusta, Georgia, to maintain the aforesaid dam at its present height across the Savannah river from the middle thread of the stream of the said river to the South Carolina shore is hereby granted to the city council of Augusta, and its successors in office, subject, however, to the condition that they shall maintain a fishway in accordance with the aforesaid plans, and shall keep open both above and below said fishway an unobstructed channel sufficient for the free and uninterrupted passage of fish: Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall preclude the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina from requiring the location, construction and maintenance on said dam of suitable locks for the passage of boats sufficient for the commerce of the river, whenever in its judgment the same is necessary.

"Sec. 5. That in the event the city council of Augusta shall fail or refuse to consent to the decree provided for in section 1 of this act, or, having consented thereto, shall thereafter fail or refuse to obey the said decree or to comply with the provisions of this act, the Attorney General shall have the right to apply to the Supreme Court in the said case now pending for the relief demanded in the petition, or such other relief as the court shall deem to be proper: Provided, the Attorney General, in the event the city council of Augusta shall fail or refuse to comply with the provisions of the decree hereinbefore provided for, or with any of the provisions of this act whatsoever, then the Attorney General shall in his discretion, institute such action or proceeding as he may deem advisable for the purpose of compelling compliance with the intention of this act, or for the purpose of abating, as a public nuisance, so much of said dam as lies within the boundaries of South Carolina.

"Sec. 6. This act shall take effect immediately upon its approval by the Governor." And

Whereas, the city council of Augusta, on the 6th day of March, 1911, did adopt the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the city council of Augusta:

"That Mr. C. H. Cohen, city attorney, and Messrs. D. S. Henderson and William H.

Barrett, all attorneys of record for the city council of Augusta in the case of the State of South Carolina ex relatione J. Fraser Lyon, Attorney General, v. the City Council of Augusta, now pending in the Supreme Court of South Carolina, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to consent to the entering of a decree in the above case, in accordance with the provisions of the act of the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, entitled 'An act relating to the action pending in the Supreme Court concerning the dam across Savannah river beginning in Edgefield county, and in relation to the maintenance of so much of said dam as lies in the waters of Savannah river from the middle thread of the stream to the South Carolina shore,' adopted at the 1911 session of such General Assembly, and duly approved by the Governor of South Carolina.

"Done in council, this 6th day of March, 1911." And

Whereas, it has been made to appear that the city council of Augusta has already entered into a contract for the construction of the said fishway:

Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the city council of Augusta be, and it is hereby, ordered to construct a fishway in said dam of the kind and in the location indicated on said plan approved by the Department of Fisheries of the United States, and by the Attorney General, and now of file in the office of the Secretary of State, and that so long as such fishway is maintained as thus constructed, this will be recognized as a compliance with the duties of the city of Augusta as to the maintenance of said fishway, and said fishway shall be constructed by the 1st day of May, 1911: Provided, however, that if the work of constructing said fishway be prevented by bad weather or other unavoidable reasonable cause, the Attorney General is empowered to extend the time for constructing the same.

Both parties to this proceeding have leave at the foot of this decree to apply to the court for such other or further relief as may be proper in the premises.

HOLLIDAY v. PEGRAM et al.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 22*)—LEASE—EXISTENCE.

Letters constituted mere negotiations for a lease, and not a completed contract, where they provided for "making" and "arranging" the agreement at a future meeting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-59; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 419*)—TESTIMONY AFFECTING WRITING—ADMISSIBILITY.

Parol evidence is admissible to show that, as part consideration for a lease, in writing, but silent as to repairs, the lessor agreed to repair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1920; Dec. Dig. § 419.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 223*)—COVENANT TO REPAIR—BREACH BY LANDLORD—RIGHTS OF TENANT.

A tenant, damaged by breach of the landlord's agreement to repair, is entitled to a deduction of the amount of such damage from the rent.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 231*)—ACTION FOR RENT—EVIDENCE.

In an action for rent, letters and a proposed contract constituting negotiations for an agreement were admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 926-934; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 218*)—DIRECTED VERDICT—PARTNERSHIP OR INDIVIDUAL OBLIGATION.

It was improper to direct a verdict against a firm for rent, where the evidence was admitted tending to show merely individual liability by one of the partners.

Woods, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by J. W. Holliday against G. H. Pegram and another, partners as G. H. Pegram & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This is an action, to recover the sum of $850 for the rent of a tobacco warehouse.

The complaint alleges that, at the times therein mentioned, the defendants G. H. Pegram and C. W. Payne were copartners under the firm name of Pegram & Co.; that about the 23d of March, 1910, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendants, by the terms of which, they were to occupy certain property, known as the Dixie Warehouse, for the season of 1910, and to pay, as rent, the sum of $850 on the 1st of September, 1910; that, pursuant to said agreement, the defendants entered into possession of the premises, and were in possession of the same, at the time this action was commenced. The defendants, in their answer to the complaint, admitted the allegations of partnership between the defendants, but denied all the other allegations.

The following letters were introduced in evidence, without objection:

"Exhibit A: Kinston, N. C., February 3, 1910. Mr. Jos. W. Holliday, Savage, S. C.—Dear Sir: I have discussed your proposition with Mr. Payne, and he prefers, as I do, to rent the W. H. for the coming season, with option to buy, October 1, 1910. We will give you $850 rent, if we don't buy, but if we buy the W. H., will pay $1,000 October 1, 1910, and eight per cent. interest on $6,000 from date of contract and $1,000, with interest at 8 %, each October 1st thereafter, until the $6,000 is paid. Please write me as soon as convenient, on account of the other proposition I have under consideration. Yours truly, G. H. Pegram."

"Exhibit B: Savage, S. C., March 10, 1910. Mr. G. H. Pegram, Kinston, N. C.—Dear Sir: Referring further to renting you my warehouse in Florence, S. C., for the coming tobacco season, will say, that if you still care for it, I will rent it to you for eight hundred and fifty dollars, payable on the first day of September, 1910, provided you accept same promptly. You being the first to see about it, and others are after me for it. If you want it, we can arrange the rent agreement, when you come down to look after the work. I am, Yours truly, [Signed] Jos. W. Holliday."

"Exhibit C: Kinston, N. C., March 20, 1910. Mr. Jos. W. Holliday, Savage, S. C.—Dear Sir: We will take your warehouse at Florence, S. C., $850.00 rent, for the coming season 1910. You can send me copy contract, will arrange rent agreement, when come down. Yours truly, [Signed] G. H. Pegram."

"Exhibit D: Savage, S. C., 3-23-1910. Mr. G. H. Pegram, Kinston, N. C.—Dear Sir: I beg to acknowledge yours of March the 20th, 1910, in answer to mine to you, of the 10th of March, and as per same, consider it a bargain or trade of rent, for my warehouse in Florence, S. C., for the coming season. We can arrange the agreement when you come down to begin work, out in the country. Yours truly, [Signed] Jos. W. Holliday."

"Exhibit E: Florence, S. C., June 7, 1910. Mr. J. W. Holliday, Savage S. C.—Dear Sir: If you can make it convenient, to come over to Florence this week, I am ready to make contract for your warehouse. If you can't come this week, please state time when you can come, so I won't be out of the city. Yours truly, [Signed] G. H. Pegram."

"Exhibit F: Savage, S. C., 6-9-10. Mr. G. H. Pegram, Florence, S. C.—Dear Sir: I am just in receipt of yours of the 7th. It will be so that I can't get up to Florence this week. If you are going to do any work, out through the country, in working this section, call by and we can fix up our contract. If you are not coming down this way, I will try and go to Florence, one day before long. Trusting, though, that you will come down, through this section, I am, Yours truly, [Signed] Jos. W. Holliday."

The following letters and proposed contract were offered by the defendants, but his honor, the presiding judge, refused to allow them to be introduced in evidence.

"Florence, S. C., July 20, 1910. Mr. J. W. Holliday, Savage, S. C.—Dear Sir: Mr. G. H. Pegram is not quite satisfied with the contract, for lease of the Dixie warehouse, which you sent him. He would like to have the following changes made in the contract: 1st. The lease should be for the term of one year from the 20th day of March, 1910, to the 20th day of March, 1911. * * * 2nd. An agreement on your part, to keep the roof in good repair, so far as is practicable, will be satisfactory to Mr. Pegram; or an agreement giving him the authority, to put the roof in good repair, and to make such repairs, as he may think necessary, at your expense, will be equally satisfactory. * * * 3rd. In making an agreement for an option to renew the lease, the contract should state, that in case of renewal, the new contract should be upon the same terms and conditions, which govern this contract. * * * Please advise us at your earliest convenience, in regard to this matter, and if our suggestions are acceptable to you, we will draw a contract accordingly, and will have it signed by Mr. Pegram, and forwarded to you for your signature. Yours very truly, [Signed] R. E. Whiting."

"Savage, S. C. 7-21-10. Messrs. G. H. Pegram & Co., Florence, S. C.—Gentlemen: I am in receipt of yours of the 18th, and am very much surprised and very sorry, to hear the roof is as you write. I did not make any bargain or offer with Mr. Lundy to do the work. He mentioned it to me, in the warehouse, and I asked him to look at, and examine it, and see what he would do it for, and write me, as I stated in Mr. Ragsdale's office, where, in talking over it, I left it to you, to have done, and I was to pay you for it. As yet, I have no help, and it is very bad for me, to get away from here, and as per our understanding, it seems you could have the leaks stopped, just as well as I could. And if the shingles are as you state, there is a roof paint that will stop leaks; even if it is put on a wire gauze it won't leak; so, see if it is kept by any of the stores there, and use that on the leak to stop them, in place of taking off the shingles. I will pay for it and the putting on. Trusting the paint will stop the leaks, and you can get it and will have it attended to at once, and from time to time as needs be. I would suggest that you mark the leaks, and then get some one that understands putting on paint (a regular painter) to do it. Look into this, and let me hear from you about it. Hoping it will do all right, I am, Yours truly, [Signed] Joseph W. Holliday."

"Savage, S. C., 8-29-10. Messrs. G. H. Pegram & Co., Florence, S. C.—Gentlemen: Your rent to me of eight hundred and fifty dollars, for the warehouse will be due on the first day of September, 1910; please send me your check for same on that date, less what you have paid out, on repairing building, and for the amounts; send me receipted, itemized bills from the parties, who did the work for you, and from whom you got the material. Trusting you will be prompt in this, I am, Yours truly, [Signed] Jos. W. Holliday."

"Savage, S. C., July 14, 1910. Mr. J. W. Ragsdale, Florence, S. C.—Dear Sir: As per mutual understanding between Mr. Pegram, Mr. Whiting and myself, I enclose an agreement for rent of warehouse property, for 1910, which covers all points, as per our discussion in your office. I have signed same, in the presence of a witness, and you can have Mr. Pegram to sign them, keeping one and returning one to me. I am, Yours truly, [Signed] Jos. W. Holliday."

"State of South Carolina, County of Florence.

"This agreement, made about the 20th day of March, 1910 between Jos. W. Holliday, lessor, and G. H. Pegram and C. W. Payne, constituting the firm of G. H. Pegram & Co., lessees. The said Jos. W. Holliday, does hereby rent to the said G. H. Pegram & Co., his lot from the first day of January, 1910, to the 31st day of December, 1910, for eight hundred and fifty dollars, payable on the first day of September, 1910. * * * The said G. H. Pegram & Co. have rented from the said J. W. Holliday, his lot known as the Dixie Tobacco Warehouse lot, for which the said G. H. Pegram & Co. are to pay to the said Jos. W. Holliday, eight hundred and fifty dollars, on the first day of September, 1910. * * * And it is understood by and between the said parties, that, as there are some leaks in the roof of the warehouse, which the said G. H. Pegram & Co. agree to have patched, from time to time, by putting on a good shingle or shingles, in the place of the defective one or ones, or shingles that may be off of said roof, to stop said leaks, which they are to keep an itemized account of the cost of said work, rendering same to the said Holliday, which he is to pay them for. And the said Jos. W. Holliday further agrees, that if he does not dispose of the said property, by the first day of February, 1911, he will give the said G. H. Pegram & Co. the preference of renting said property again, for 1911, provided they want it, and will notify me, so I will get said notice by the 10th day of February, 1911, and we enter, at once, into an agreement which is mutually satisfactory to both parties. Witness our hands and seals this the 14th day of July, 1910.

"[Signed] J. W. Holliday. [L. S.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of R. S. Altman, witness as to J. W. Holliday's signature."

At the close of the testimony his honor, the circuit judge, directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $850, with interest from the 1st of September, 1910, and the defendants appealed.

J. W. Ragsdale, for appellants. Willcox & Willcox, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The plaintiff contends that the letters "B," "C," and "D," show a complete contract between him and the defendants, and that the verdict was properly directed. On the other hand, the defendants contend that the letters merely show negotiations for an agreement which was not to be binding upon the parties, until it was formally executed; also that G. H. Pegram, alone, rented the house in his individual capacity.

[1] The first question that will be considered is whether the letters which were introduced without objection make out a complete contract. The letters "B," "C," and "D" must be considered in connection with the letters "A," "E," and "F," as they were introduced without objection.

"A valid contract may doubtless be made by correspondence, but care should always be taken not to construe as an agreement letters which the parties intended only as a preliminary negotiation. The question in such cases always is, Did they mean to contract by their correspondence, or were they only settling the terms of an agreement into which they proposed to enter after all its particulars were adjusted, which was then to be formally drawn up and by which alone they designed to be bound?" Lyman v. Robinson, 14 Allen (Mass.) 242.

"Courts, in the construction of contracts, look to the language employed, the subject-matter, and the surrounding circumstances. They are never shut out from the same light which the parties enjoyed when the contract was executed, and in that view they are entitled to place themselves in the same situation as the parties who made the contract, so as to view the circumstances as they viewed them, and so to judge of the meaning of the words, and of the correct application of the language to the things described." Nash v. Towne, 5 Wall. 689, 18 L. Ed. 527.

"Where there is a doubt as to the proper meaning of a contract, the court may receive evidence of the practical construction which the parties themselves have placed on it, as indicated by their acts under it, for it is a canon in the interpretation of contracts that the practice of the parties under them may furnish a solid basis on which their construction may rest, inasmuch as the subsequent acts of the parties, in executing a contract, may reflect their intention in making it." 21 A. & E. Enc. of Law, 1115.

"It is unquestionably the duty of the court, in construing a written instrument, to interpret its language, and it may also state the effect thereof, where it is susceptible of but one inference; but where the inference to be drawn from the facts stated in the instrument is in dispute, and such facts susceptible of more than one inference, then the question must be determined by the jury, especially when the inference to be drawn is dependent upon other facts in the case." Glover v. Gasque, 67 S. C. 34, 45 S. E. 119.

"Doubtless the general rule is that it is the province of the court to construe written instruments; but it is equally well settled that, where the effect of the instrument depends, not merely on its construction and meaning, but upon collateral facts and extrinsic circumstances, the inference of fact to be drawn from the paper must be left to the jury." West v. Smith, 101 U. S. 263, 25 L. Ed. 809.

"Where the parties to a contract have given it a particular construction, such construction will generally be adopted by the court in giving effect to its provisions. And the subsequent acts of the parties, showing the construction they have put upon the agreement themselves, are to be looked to by the court, and in some cases may be controlling." 9 Cyc. 588, 589.

"The construction of a contract is a question for the court, if the terms of the contract and the extrinsic facts which may affect construction are free from dispute. This rule applies where the contract consists of several writings, as where it consists of letters exchanged between the parties. * * * If the terms of the contract are in dispute, or it is possible to draw more than one inference from the established facts which are relied on to show the intention of the parties, the jury must determine such facts, or decide which of such inferences is the correct one. The court should, in such cases, submit the question of fact to the jury, under proper alternative instructions, as to the construction to be given in the event of each possible finding of fact by the jury." 2 Page on Contracts, § 1129.

"It is a well-settled principle that when the construction to be given a contract is rendered doubtful by the language thereof, the interpretation of the contract, by the parties themselves, is entitled to great weight." Williamson v. Association, 54 S. C. 582, 32 S. E. 765, 71 Am. St. Rep. 822.

In letter "B" the plaintiff says: "If you want it, we can arrange the rent agreement when you come down to look after the work." In letter "C" the defendant G. H. Pegram says: "You can send me copy contract; will arrange rent agreement when come down." In letter "D" the plaintiff says: "We can arrange the agreement when you come down to begin work in the country." In letter "E" the defendant says, "I am ready to make contract for your warehouse," and in letter "F" the plaintiff says, "Call by, and we can fix up our contract." It will also be observed that the other letters do not mention all the provisions of the contemplated agreement set out in letter "A." The foregoing authorities show the court erred in ruling that the said letters made a complete contract.

[2] But, even if the said letters showed that the contract was complete without further action on the part of the plaintiff and the defendants, it would not follow that the presiding judge was right in directing a verdict. When the defendants offered testimony tending to show that there was an agreement as to repairs, the plaintiff's attorneys objected to the introduction of such testimony, whereupon the defendants' attorney thus stated the object of the testimony: "I want to show that, according to the terms of the agreement entered into between Mr. Holliday and Mr. Pegram, and the subsequent agreement between Mr. Holliday and Mr. Pegram, of Pegram & Co., that Mr. Holliday agreed to have this work done." The following then took place: "The Court: You do not plead it in your answer. Mr. Ragsdale: How could I set up a counterclaim under the law of this case? Mr. Willcox: He could sue us in an independent action. (Objection sustained.)"

[3] If there is a lease in writing, which makes no reference to repairs, the lessee is not precluded from introducing parol testimony to show that, as a part of the consideration of the agreement to pay rent, the lessor promised to make repairs. And, if it appears that the lessee suffered damage by reason of the lessor's failure to make the repairs, he would not be allowed to recover the whole amount mentioned as rent, but only that amount, after deducting such damages as the lessee may have sustained by reason of the lessor's failure to make the repairs. Williams v. Salmond, 79 S. C. 459, 61 S. E. 79.

[4] The foregoing authorities also show that the presiding judge erred in his ruling that the letters and proposed contract, which he refused to allow the defendants to introduce, were not admissible in evidence.

[5] The next question that will be considered, is whether there was error in directing a verdict, on the ground that there was testimony tending to show that G. H. Pegram alone rented the warehouse, in his individual capacity. His honor allowed defendants to introduce testimony to that effect. He did not change his ruling, or strike out such testimony. Therefore, in determining whether there was error in directing a verdict, the testimony which he ruled to be competent must be taken into consideration. As the defendants denied the allegation that the defendants, as partners, entered into the contract, and there was testimony tending to show that G. H. Pegram alone entered into the contract, in his individual right, the presiding judge erred in withdrawing such fact from the consideration of the jury by directing a verdict.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

JONES, C. J., and HYDRICK, J., concur.

WOODS, J. I concur in the conclusion that there should be a new trial in this case, on the ground that the defendants should have credit for the repairs made on the warehouse. But I am unable to assent to the views expressed by Mr. Justice GARY on the other points. The letter of the plaintiff of March 23, 1910, to G. H. Pegram, in answer to a letter agreeing to pay $850 rent, stated that the plaintiff considered the warehouse rented for the coming tobacco season. Not only was there no dissent or objection on the part of the defendants to the statement of this letter, but both the defendants, in the face of it, entered into possession of the warehouse and used it for the tobacco season. The correspondence shows that, besides the allowance for repairs, the only other claim made by the defendants was that they should have a right to a renewal of the rent contract. The right of renewal, if established, could not affect the right of the plaintiff to recover the rent when it fell due.

(90 S. C. 196)

DU BOSE v. KELL et al.

1. TRUSTS (§ 72*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—EVIDENCE.

A husband purchased land, mortgaged to his wife, for a payment in cash, and an assumption of liability for the payment of an undesignated mortgage debt. There was no evidence that any money of the wife was used in the purchase of the land. Held not to establish a resulting trust, for the assumption by the husband of the payment of the mortgage could only create liability against him for the payment to the wife of the mortgage.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 96*)—RENEWAL.

The mere recording in a deed record book of a deed reciting that the grantee is to satisfy a balance to an unstated amount due to an undesignated person on an unidentified mortgage is not a compliance with Civ. Code 1902, § 2449, requiring that some written acknowledgment of the debt secured thereby must be recorded on the record of the mortgage in order that the same shall constitute a lien on any real estate after the lapse of 20 years from the creation of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 876*)—LAPSE OF TIME—PRESUMPTION OF PAYMENT.

Where more than 20 years have elapsed since the rendition of a judgment for the payment of a legacy, a presumption that the judgment has been paid arises.

4. ESTOPPEL (§ 28*)—ESTOPPEL BY DEED—PERSONS BOUND.

One claiming title as heir of a deceased ancestor, who in her lifetime conveyed the land by warranty deed to a third person, is estopped from setting up title, whether the ancestor had title at the time of the conveyance or subsequently acquired title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 68; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

5. DEEDS (§ 68*)—"MENTAL CAPACITY."

To render a deed void on the ground of the grantor's mental incapacity, it must appear here in controversy which the defendants Eunice R. Cloud and Susan A. Boylston may have at any time possessed has passed by conveyance to the other defendants in this action.

"Coming now to the report of the referee upon the equitable issues in the case and considering first the questions sought to be made by the plaintiff's fifth exception, it appears clearly that this exception raises purely a question of legal title which depends upon the proper construction of the wills of Jane Hemphill and Mary Hemphill, and perhaps also upon the question of fact as to who were the heirs at law of Mary Hemphill at the time of her death or at the time of Susan C. Kell's death, and that such question of title can only be tried upon the hearing of the legal issues in this case. As no waiver has been made of the right to trial by jury of this issue, the same must be left for determination upon the trial of the legal issues in this case.

"As to the first four exceptions by the plaintiff, these do raise equitable questions which are now to be determined.

[1] "The referee does find that B. E. Kell, Sr., 'took up' the mortgage which was given by J. H. McMurray to Susan C. Kell for the purchase price of the Fishing Creek Place. What meaning was intended by the referee in using the expression above quoted is not altogether clear, but if there was any such finding as that B. E. Kell, Sr., had paid the mortgage to Susan C. Kell, there is nothing in the testimony of J. H. McMurray to warrant such finding nor has attention been called to any other evidence to sustain the same. Indeed, an examination of the context of the referee's report leads to the inference that he did not intend to make any such finding as that B. E. Kell, Sr., had paid the mortgage debt of J. H. McMurray to Susan C. Kell. While not so finding in express terms, perhaps, the referee does in effect find that B. E. Kell, Sr., did agree with J. H. McMurray to pay the purchase-money mortgage due by the latter to Susan C. Kell.

"There is nothing in the evidence to show error in the finding by the referee of which complaint is made by the fourth exception. The evidence showed merely a purchase of this land by B. E. Kell, Sr., from J. H. McMurray, a payment by him of part of the purchase money in cash and an assumption of liability for the payment of a certain undesignated mortgage debt against the said land conveyed to him. There is no evidence whatever that any money belonging to Susan C. Kell was used in the purchase of this land or applied in the payment of the purchase money thereof; but the evidence was simply of an assumption by the said B. E. Kell of responsibility for the payment of an unidentified mortgage debt upon the same. If it be assumed that the mortgage debt referred to was that owing to Susan C. Kell, this would only amount to an acknowledgment of liability for the payment of any balance that might be due thereon, but would not constitute a using of the money of Susan C. Kell in the purchase of the land. Under such circumstances, there is nothing upon which a resulting trust can be based, as even the assuming of the payment of a mortgage debt due to the wife of the grantee could not operate to raise a resulting trust in the land, but could occasion merely a liability by B. E. Kell, Sr., for the payment to her of the mortgage debt. See Rogers v. Rogers, 52 S. C. 388, 29 S. E. 812, and authorities there cited.

[2] "There was no error in the holding by the referee, of which complaint is made by the second exception, and no error in the failing to hold that the acceptance by B. E. Kell of the deed from J. H. McMurray, containing the recital that said Kell should 'satisfy a balance of a mortgage covering the premises' conveyed, and the recording of such deed was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of section 2449 of the Civil Code of 1902. The mere recording in a deed record book of a deed containing simply a recital that the grantee is to satisfy a balance to an unstated amount due to an undesignated person upon an unidentified mortgage not even stated to be owing by the grantor in the deed would seem to come very far short of being a compliance with the statutory requirement that some written acknowledgment of the debt secured thereby must be 'recorded upon the record of such mortgage' in order that the same shall constitute a lien upon any real estate 'after the lapse of twenty years from the date of the creation of the same.' For these reasons, therefore, the first four exceptions by the plaintiff must be overruled.

[3] "There was, however, error by the referee, as complained in the sixth exception, in failing to find and conclude that the judgment or decree for the payment of the legacy aforesaid against the estate of Mary Hemphill in favor of the said Susan C. Kell was and is presumed to be paid from lapse of time and barred by the statute of limitations. More than 20 years had elapsed since the rendition of this judgment or decree, and, if not barred, it must certainly be presumed paid after that lapse of time.

"But there was no error in the failure by the referee to make any finding as to whether or not the title to the Fishing Creek Place and the Parish Place had reverted to the heirs of Mary Hemphill, as that is a question of law for determination upon the trial of the legal issues in this case. It may be remarked, however, that if the reversion of these lands, after the death of Susan C. Kell without issue, was in Mary Hemphill and was undisposed under her will, the same would have descended to Susan C. Kell, who was the sole heir of Mary Hemphill at the time of her death, according to concessions as to this fact made at the hearing. As-already stated, however, these are legal issues of title for adjudication upon the trial herein upon the law side of the court, and no opinion can now be properly expressed thereupon. As to the matter referred to in the seventh exception, it is considered that the question as to who was in the actual possession of the Fishing Creek Place and the Parish Place at the time of the commencement of this action is immaterial to the determination of any equitable issue herein. As to whether it is material upon the trial of any issue as to the legal title is a question for the court before which that question may arise.

[4] "Coming now to the errors alleged in the conclusions as to matter of law set out in the eighth exception, there can be no doubt that the referee was right in holding that, in so far as the plaintiff is seeking to set up any title to the Fishing Creek Place through and under Susan C. Kell, the plaintiff is estopped by the warranty in the deed from Susan C. Kell to J. H. McMurray, of date November 20, 1880, from setting up any title in herself to the Fishing Creek Place claimed to have been derived by her as heir of Susan C. Kell, whether such title was held by Susan C. Kell at the date of the execution of the deed or subsequently acquired. This will not, of course, prevent the plaintiff from establishing at the trial of the legal issues herein any independent title which she may have to said land, not derived through Susan C. Kell subsequent to the execution of said deed. As to the remaining questions made by this exception, they are concluded by what has been said in disposing of plaintiff's fourth exception.

"As it has already been held that the claim of Susan C. Kell against the estate of Mary Hemphill, on account of the legacy referred to in the ninth exception, the same being the claim established by the decree already mentioned, was barred by the statute of limitations and stale by lapse of time, it follows that this exception cannot be sustained.

"With reference to the eleventh and twelfth exceptions, it is sufficient to say that it is shown by the evidence and conceded by the plaintiff that the defendants (excepting Eunice R. Cloud and Susan A. Boylston) are the owners of a two-thirds interest in the Fishing Creek and the Parish Places, and they are therefore entitled to two-thirds the rents thereof. In the tenth paragraph of the complaint the plaintiff avers that a two-thirds interest in the Parish Place is the defendants' (other than Susan A. Boylston and Eunice R. Cloud), and in the eleventh paragraph she alleges that the defendants Susan A. Boylston and Eunice R. Cloud are the owners of a two-thirds interest in the Fishing Creek Place, which interest the evidence shows has been conveyed by Susan A. Boylston and Eunice R. Cloud to their codefendants herein. It thus appears that the plaintiff claims only a one-third interest in each of these two places and in the rents and profits of the same, and, as has already been held, the question as to whether the plaintiff owns such one-third interest is a legal issue for determination on trial by jury. The conclusion of the referee, therefore, in so far as concerns the title to this remaining undivided one-third interest in these two tracts of land and as to the accountability of plaintiff for the rents and profits of such one-third interest, being dependent upon the issue as to the legal title to the said one-third interest, cannot be sustained for the reason that this question of title, being a legal issue, is triable by the court on its law side, and not by the referee under a submission of the equitable issues. So far, therefore, as the referee undertakes to determine that the title to anything more than a two-thirds interest in the Fishing Creek and Parish Places is in the defendants (the Kells) and so far as the referee undertakes to adjudicate that the plaintiff is accountable to the defendants (the Kells) for any more than the two-thirds part of the rents and profits of said two places received by plaintiff, the conclusions of the referee are overruled; the question as to the legal title of the plaintiff to a one undivided third interest in said two tracts and as to her consequent legal title to and ownership of one undivided third interest in the rents and profits thereof, since the death of the said Susan C. Kell, being reserved for determination by the court upon the trial of the legal issues herein.

"The remaining questions presented by the tenth and thirteenth to the twentieth exceptions, inclusive, embrace the chief issues in this case and those to which almost the entire argument at the hearing was directed.

"These exceptions raise substantially three questions, that is to say:

"(1) Whether there was error by the referee in the finding and conclusion that on the 27th day of October, 1902, the said Susan C. Kell was mentally competent to understand and did comprehend the nature, force, and effect of her act in signing the deed, dated on that day, conveying to Dr. B. E. Kell the Home Place, the Rocky Creek Place, and the Parish Place, and that said deed was duly executed and is a valid deed vesting the fee-simple title to the said lands in the grantee therein named.

"(2) Whether there was error by the referee in the finding and conclusion that said deed was voluntarily, willingly, and freely executed by the said grantor, Susan C. Kell, and was not procured or induced by any undue influence, fraud, cunning, duress, or artifice, and that there were no circumstances attending or surrounding its execution to raise a presumption of fraud or undue influence; and that said deed is therefore valid.

"(3) Whether there was error by the referee in the finding and conclusion that any presumption of fraud or undue influence raised by the relationship existing between the grantor and grantee of this deed has been rebutted by the evidence, and that the said deed was supported by a good and valuable consideration, and is therefore valid.

"The plaintiff's contentions are, first, that at the date of the signing of this deed the said Susan C. Kell was insane, or at least mentally incapable in law of executing the same; and, second, that, even if she were not then so insane or mentally incapacitated to execute the deed, yet the execution thereof was procured by fraud or undue influence on the part of the grantee.

[5] "Considering first the question as to the mental capacity of the grantor, the rule of law with reference to this matter may be stated in general terms to be that, while the mental incapacity which will render one unable to make a contract or a valid gift need not be so great as entirely to dethrone the reasoning powers, there must be at the time of the act or contract such insanity or mental weakness or unsoundness as amounts to an incapacity or occasions an inability to understand or comprehend the subject of the contract or act and its nature and probable consequences, in order to render the act or contract void in law. 22 Cyc. 1206; Rippey v. Grant, 39 N. C. 443; Miller v. Craig, 36 Ill. 109; Dennett v. Dennett, 44 N. H. 531, 84 Am. Dec. 97; Hay v. Miller, 48 Neb. 156, 66 N. W. 1115; Dewey v. Algire, 37 Neb. 6, 55 N. W. 276, 40 Am. St. Rep. 468; West v. Douglas, 145 Ill. 164, 34 N. E. 141; Argo v. Coffin, 142 Ill. 368, 32 N. E. 679, 34 Am. St. Rep. 86; Mann v. Bank, 86 Fed. 51, 29 C. C. A. 547.

"In order to render a deed void upon the ground of the mental incapacity of the grantor, it must appear that there was on his or her part such mental infirmity as to render him or her incapable of understanding the nature of the act. The test is not whether the grantor's mental powers were impaired, but whether, at the very time of the execution of the deed, he had sufficient capacity to understand in a reasonable manner the nature and effect of the act which he was performing. Mere infirmity of mind or body, not amounting to an incapacity to understand the nature and consequence of the act done, will not render a person incapable of executing a valid deed. Nor will monomania or delusion existing in the mind of the grantor affect the validity of a deed, unless it be such as to actually influence his mind in the very transaction in question by rendering him incapable of appreciating the true nature and effect of the particular act in controversy. 13 Cyc. 573, 574; 16 A. & E. Enc. L. 624; 9 Id. 119, 123; 18 A. & E. Enc. L. 624 (2d Ed.); 9 Id. 123; Concord v. Rumney, 45 N. H. 428; Teter v. Teter, 59 W. Va. 449, 53 S. E. 779; Rippey v. Grant, 39 N. C. 443; Hovey v. Hobson, 55 Me. 282; Buckey v. Buckey, 38 W. Va. 168, 18 S. E. 383; Woodville v. Woodville, 63 W. Va. 286,

"As is said in Rowland v. Sullivan, 4 De-saus. 520, there must be made to appear 'some incompetency of mind, showing an incapacity at the moment of executing the deed or will, or some imposition practiced upon the testator or donor must be proved, to authorize the court to exercise the high power of setting aside deeds or wills regularly executed.'

[6] "Considering the question as to the capacity of Susan C. Kell to make the deed here in question in the light of the principles adjudicated by these authorities, does it appear here that at the moment of the signing of this deed on the 27th day of October, 1902, she was mentally competent to understand and did in fact comprehend the purpose and effect of her act in signing this deed? It is shown by the evidence that at the date mentioned the grantor in this deed, an aged lady of intelligence and refinement, about 81 or 82 years old, twice widowed and having lost her last husband some months previously, having no children nor any who could be called near and intimate relatives, was living in the home of those who are the witnesses to the deed here in question. It further appears that the grantee of the deed, the nephew of her last husband and a physician of high character and repute, who had long bestowed upon her his most devoted care and attention, occupied that place in her heart and affections which would naturally have been held by a beloved son, had she been so fortunate as to possess a child by whom she might have been guarded and cherished in her declining years.

"It is beyond question that at this time Mrs. Susan C. Kell was not of strong mentality, was feeble in body and almost deprived of her eyesight, was subject at times to that forgetfulness and loss of memory which is frequently found to occur in the case of very aged persons, and was occasionally visited by certain delusions which recurred at more or less frequent intervals. The only particular delusion, however, which could strictly be characterized as recurrent, appears to have been the idea which at intervals took possession of her mind that her parents were still living, and that they might be found at a certain more or less definite place. But this belief was temporary and occasional. It was not persistent, and it readily yielded to the reminder that her parents were long since dead. According to the learned opinions of the experts, it further appears that Mrs. Kell was at intervals afflicted with a 'loss of orientation,' which is to say, that at such times she imagined herself to be at a different place, going to a different direction from that which was the fact. But this also is clearly shown to have been only occasional and temporary, not often recurring nor persisting, but easily yielding to an acceptance of the truth of the facts when called to her attention.

"Much learning has been displayed in this case by the medical experts in the discussion of the question as to whether during the latter years of her life Mrs. Kell was suffering from senile dementia or merely from neurasthenia. The testimony upon these points by the doctors examined as experts, some of whom had little or no acquaintance with her, was based chiefly upon hypothetical inquiries as to what mental condition was indicated by particular acts or remarks attributed to Mrs. Kell upon various isolated and disconnected occasions. The opinions of some of these learned physicians are apparently based upon an aggregation of specific acts performed and words spoken by Mrs. Kell upon more or less widely separated occasions, assembled from the testimony of various witnesses and read by or recounted to the experts with a view of their predicating thereupon a theory as to her general mental condition and power of mind.

"After a very careful reading and consideration of their testimony, the conclusions of these experts appear to be based so largely upon conjecture as to the possible influence and effect of various events and occurrences in her life and as to the inference to be drawn from disconnected and in some instances unascertained acts and facts, in large measure remote from the time of the execution of the deed, as to render their evidence as to Mrs. Kell's probable capacity at that time of little if any value to the judicial mind. One expert concludes, although with some apparent doubt and hesitation, that, when last seen by him in 1898, Mrs. Kell was probably incapacitated by senile dementia from attending to business; while upon a hypothetical statement of practically the same facts, and by a substantially identical method of reasoning, another unquestionably learned expert comes to an opposite conclusion as to her mental capacity in 1902, his opinion being without support of any personal knowledge whatever as to the facts upon which it was based. While there is indubitable proof that at times Mrs. Kell suffered from aphasia and amnesia (to make use of the terms employed by the medical experts), yet those afflictions cannot be considered as necessarily establishing incapacity to convey property, as otherwise the writer of this opinion, in common with many others generally considered of sufficient mental power for the ordinary transaction of business, would be disqualified from disposing of property if the occasional exhibition of such comparatively trifling defects could be regarded as proof of mental incapacity. There is no satisfactory evidence that Mrs. Kell in 1902 was suffering from any such degree of mental impairment as is denoted by the term senile dementia, although some of the experts seem to imply or assert that such was the case. As has already been remarked, however, the conclusions of these experts seem to have so little foundation of relevant facts to support them and appear to be based so largely upon mere conjecture, and their opinions are so irreconcilable and at variance the one with the other as to render them of no practical service in arriving at the truth as to Mrs. Kell's mental capacity at the date in controversy.

"Dismissing, therefore, the opinions and conclusions of the experts as offering no substantial aid in the determination of the question under consideration, and proceeding to an examination of the testimony of those witnesses who were well acquainted and who were frequently associated with Mrs. Kell, we find that while some of them testify to occasional acts and speeches of that lady (as already mentioned) tending to indicate that she was at times afflicted with aphasia, amnesia, and a delusive belief that her father and mother were still living, and perhaps that she was laboring more or less under the malady denoted by the term neurasthenia, yet there is found in the evidence no ground for supposing that these temporary and occasionally recurrent conditions had to any material extent impaired her general capacity to comprehend the nature and probable results of her act in signing the deed here in question. Nor is there any evidence that on the day of the execution of the deed she was laboring in any degree whatever under the burden either of aphasia, amnesia, delusion, neurasthenia, or senile dementia. On the contrary, the proof is full and the testimony without conflict that she was then in the complete enjoyment of her ordinary capacity for understanding such a transaction, that she did, in fact, understand the nature of the act performed in signing the deed in question, and that she comprehended the effect of her signature to that paper. This is the testimony of those witnesses provided by the requirements of law for the very purpose of attesting the capacity of the grantor, as well as the manual act of her signature, and it is also the testimony of others present at or near the time of such signing, and these witnesses alone, perhaps of all those examined in the cause, are qualified to speak positively as to her mental condition at the very moment in question. To the witnesses to this deed and to the others present at or about the time of its execution the referee pays the tribute of saying, upon his own knowledge of their characters, that no consideration whatever would induce any of them knowingly to make a misstatement of fact or consciously to engage in a misrepresentation of the truth. Their testimony, therefore, is entitled to the highest credence, and is alone sufficient to sustain the referee's conclusion upon the question against the mere opinion or suggestion of other witnesses who saw her occasionally at previous or subsequent times when, in their opinion, she was incapable of understanding the nature and effect of such a transaction.

"When, in addition to this direct testimony as to her capacity, given by the members of the Brown family with whom she resided, there is considered the evidence as to her general understanding and powers of mind as contained in the depositions of such men as Dr. De K. Wylie, who had been her family physician and who may be said to have known her intimately, Mr. J. McC. Caldwell, Mr. W. C. Garrison, the two McCroreys, and other neighbors and friends, who saw her frequently near the time in question, it must be concluded that her general capacity to execute the deed has been established, notwithstanding the dissenting opinions of others who saw her at more or less infrequent intervals. It may be remarked, further, that Mrs. Mary E. Brown, whose high character is vouched for by the referee, testifies that upon one or more occasions after the execution of this deed Mrs. Kell referred in conversation to the fact that she had conveyed all her property to Dr. B. E. Kell by this deed and expresses satisfaction with her action in so doing; and Miss Bessie Brown, having a similar indorsement by the referee, testifies to substantially the same declarations made by Mrs. Kell after the execution of the deed.

"While it is quite true that a number of credible witnesses deposed to conditions of mind and memory exhibited and to acts done by Mrs. Kell on particular occasions, evidencing some degree of irrationality on her part at such times, which induced these witnesses to believe that she was then mentally incapacitated for the transaction of business, yet the testimony of those best acquainted with her and best qualified to judge as to her general capacity, and especially the testimony as to her mental condition while living at the Browns, and particularly at the time of the execution of this deed, is convincing and conclusive as to her capacity to understand and as to the fact that she did comprehend the nature and effect of her act in signing the deed of October 27, 1902. Mere temporary aberrations of mind, resulting from old age and ill health, existing during brief periods of time upon days more or less remote from the date in question, cannot be considered as necessarily so evidencing her incapacity at the time of the execution of the deed as to outweigh the uncontradicted and credible testimony of reliable witnesses who vouch for her capability and understanding of her act at the very moment of the making and delivery of the deed.

"Upon a consideration of the entire testimony in the case, and after careful attention to the learned and exhaustive arguments of counsel, both upon the law and the facts the conclusion has been unhesitatingly reached that the preponderance of the evidence establishes the fact that the conveyance here in controversy is the act and deed of one who was then fully capable of disposing of her property as she might see fit.

"It remains to consider the question as to whether there has been shown such pressure of inducement exerted upon the grantor in this deed, in procuring the execution thereof, as would amount to undue influence, or any such advantage taken of her in inducing the making thereof, as would amount to fraud, so as to require its cancellation by a court of equity.

"The principles of law applicable to the question of undue influence are well settled, and may be thus stated in general terms:

[7, 8] "Where a deed is procured by undue influence exerted upon the grantor, it will be set aside by a court of equity upon a proper and timely application on the part of the person injured or aggrieved thereby; but, in order to avoid the deed upon this ground, there must be shown such an influence exerted upon the grantor as to overbear her will and to make the act of execution not the carrying out of a real purpose or intention of the grantor, but the mere mechanical performance by her of the wish and design of some other person. Neither fair argument, nor mere suggestion, nor even persuasion, unaccompanied by other circumstances to show a substitution of the will or purpose of some other person for that of the grantor, will amount to undue influence. In order to make it undue, it must appear that the influence exerted was such as to overcome or destroy the free will of the grantor and to make the deed as executed the expression not of his purpose, but that of some other person. 13 Cyc. 285; 9 Cyc. 455; Revels v. Revels, 64 S. C. 272, 42 S. E. 111, and authorities there cited; Conley v. Nallor, 118 U. S. 127, 6 Sup. Ct. 1001, 30 L. Ed. 112. But 'the line between due and undue influence, when drawn, must be with full recognition of the liberty due every true owner to obey the voice of justice, the dictates of friendship, of gratitude and of benevolence, as well as the claims of kindred, and when not hindered by personal incapacity, or particular regulations, to dispose of his own property according to his own free choice.' Wallace v. Harris, 32 Mich. 380.

[8] "It is further an established principle of equity, well founded in right reason, that the acts and contracts of persons who are of weak understanding and who are thereby liable to imposition, and also all contracts or gifts between persons standing in confidential relations towards each other, will be closely scrutinized by the courts to discover whether or not any undue influence was exerted or any confidence was betrayed to the prejudice of the weaker party or of the one reposing such trust and confidence. 27 A. & E. Enc. L. p. 456; 29 Id. (2d Ed.) p. 102; Gaston v. Bennett, 30 S. C. 467, 9 S. E. 515; Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 506, 24 L. Ed. 260;

Wille v. Wille, 57 S. C. 413, 35 S. E. 804; Banker v. Hendricks, 24 S. C. 1; 9 A. & E. Enc. L. 124; Martin v. Taague, 2 Speer's Law, 268; Woodward v. James, 3 Strob. 552, 51 Am. Dec. 649; Farr v. O'Neill, 1 Rich. Law, 80; Pressly v. Kemp, 16 S. C. 344, 42 Am. Rep. 635; Price v. Railroad, 38 S. C. 215, 17 S. E. 732.

"Undue influence may be said to consist in any influence which is so far operative as to destroy free agency, so as to compel the person doing the act in question to do the same against his will. It is not material how such control was exerted, whether by physical force, threats, importunities, or any other species of mental or physical coercion, provided only it was so exerted as to destroy free agency and to make the act done not a true expression of the will of the person doing it, but in truth a carrying out of the purposes of some other person against that will. But the undue influence is to be proved and not to be presumed, unless the relation in which the parties stood with reference to each other is such as to raise a presumption of its existence. Yet, even where such a presumption arises, it is rebutted by evidence showing that everything between the parties was fair, open, voluntary, and well understood. See 29 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 102, 105, 119, 122; Means v. Means, 5 Strob. 167.

[10] "Applying the principles stated to the evidence in the case at bar, we find that the grantor in the deed here under consideration was a feeble old lady, past her four-score years of life, her mind and memory to some extent weakened and impaired by the troubles and afflictions of her previous life, and by the burdens of the years resting upon her, entertaining at times delusive momentary beliefs as to the continuing existence in her life of her long-dead parents and temporary beliefs at variance with facts as to then existing weather conditions and as to locality of places. It appears that she had none then standing towards her in the relation of her kindred or dear friends, excepting only the grantee in this deed, who was not her blood, but had long been holding the place of a devoted son, having laid aside a promising career in life in order to bestow upon her the skilled attention which his knowledge as a physician enabled him to give. It is shown by the evidence that the grantor was weak in body and doubtless to some extent enfeebled in her general mental powers, but that at the very moment of the execution of the deed she was not laboring under any delusion of mind, and was in fact engaged in the carrying out of a long-cherished purpose to dispose of her property as to insure its devolution upon her grantee. It is true that at or about the time of the signing of the paper in question she expressed sentiments of confidence in the belief that the grantee would continue to care for her during the remainder of her life, and it cannot be doubted that she executed the deed in the faith that he would not permit her to suffer by reason of her act. If he had failed to give her support, aid, and maintenance, the circumstances and relations of the parties were such as would well have warranted a court of equity in imposing upon the grantee the duty of providing for her support and comfort during the remainder of her life, at her instance and upon her application. But it does not appear that there was any abuse of that trust and confidence nor is there any evidence of a failure by him to discharge any duty in that particular.

"The testimony of the subscribing witnesses and of those present at the time of the signing by the donor is unanimous to the effect that she was then compos mentis; that she appreciated and understood the force and effect of her act; that she was not hoodwinked or deceived as to the nature of the instrument; and that she acted entirely of her own volition, although upon the suggestion of the grantee in the execution of the instrument. The voluminous mass of the evidence in this case has been searched in vain to discover any testimony of undue influence exerted by the grantee or by any other person, either before or at the time of the execution of this deed, in order to induce the making thereof. There is not the slightest evidence of even argument or persuasion employed to that end, and the testimony tends to show, and in my opinion does establish, the fact that the grantor therein had long entertained a fixed purpose to bestow the lands in question upon the grantee as ultimate owner.

"If it be the fact, as I think it is, that the relation of the parties to this transaction and the mental weakness and dependence of the grantor upon the grantee were such as to impose upon those claiming under the latter the burden of showing that no fraud was practiced nor undue influence exerted by or on behalf of the beneficiary under this gift, that there was no suppressio veri nor suggestio falsi operating as an inducement thereto, it is my opinion, after a careful examination of the entire record, that this has been affirmatively shown, and that it appears from the evidence that the conveyance was the voluntary act and deed of Susan C. Kell, was willingly executed by her in pursuance of a long-cherished intention, was not induced by any suppression or misrepresentation of facts, and that there was no fraud upon the part of the grantee thereof nor abuse of the confidential relations existing between the said grantor and grantee.

"The evidence shows that the act of signing was performed not only understandingly and without reluctance, but also with a desire and purpose on the part of the donor to dispose of her property to the donee named in the deed and for his own ultimate benefit. When the effect of her act was mentioned to her subsequently to such execution of the deed, she expressed satisfaction with her act in so disposing of her property and a continued understanding of the purpose and effect of what she had done. She lived for nearly two months thereafter, and so far as the evidence discloses, although the fact of her having so disposed of practically her entire property was mentioned in her presence and in the absence of the donee, she never at any time, so far as appears, gave expression to any other feeling than that of satisfaction with the deed as effectuating her voluntary purpose and intention. If the transaction had been regarded at the time by the grantor as a business transaction, whereby she was conveying the property to the grantee in consideration of past services alone, or if there were evidence going to show that she viewed it in the light of a commercial transaction, then the question sought to be made as to the adequacy of the consideration mentioned in the deed would be a matter of serious importance. But as it was evidently understood by her as being a deed of gift, with but slight, if any, reference to pecuniary obligations existing between the parties, the transaction is to be considered as purely a matter of gift, and not of bargain and sale. So considering it, I am of the opinion that the validity of this deed must be sustained, and it is accordingly so adjudged. This disposes of the exceptions of the plaintiff to the report of the referee, all of which are overruled except in so far as the same have hereinbefore been sustained.

"As to the first exception by the defendants, relating as it does to a question of evidence, as it was not discussed or pressed in any way at the hearing, it does not appear to require especial consideration in view of the conclusions already reached. It may be remarked, however, that, if there was any error as is therein alleged, it appears to have been harmless error. In so far as the costs and disbursements of this cause in equity are concerned, in view of the fact that the burden of proof was properly upon the defendants here to show that no advantage had been taken of the confidential relations existing between the grantor and grantee of the deed in question, and especially in view of the fact that this deed does not appear ever to have been spread upon the records of the proper office, I overrule the exception by the defendants as to the matter of the payment of such costs and disbursements and direct the payment of the same in accordance with the recommendations of the referee.

"As to the conclusion of law by the referee as to the rents and profits collected by plaintiff from the Fishing Creek and Parish Places, the liability of the plaintiff to the defendants for such rents and profits to the extent of two-thirds thereof, and interest from the time of receiving the same, results from the conclusions already reached, but the liability for the remaining one-third is yet to be determined by the result of the trial of the legal issues herein.

"Under the views already stated, the recommendation by the referee as to a dismissal of the complaint must be disapproved, and the cause must be retained for trial by jury of the legal issues of fact herein, and also for the purpose of stating the accounts as to the rents and profits. Leave is granted for an application to be hereafter made to the court, or to any circuit judge having jurisdiction at chambers after notice, for a recommittal of the report for such further accounting by any of the parties for the rents and profits of any of the lands in question, as may be necessary and in accordance with the conclusions of this decree, or may be rendered proper in the further progress of the cause, and for such statement of the accounts for rents and profits already found and of the interest chargeable thereupon as may be conformable to the conclusions of this decree and requisite to a final judgment herein as to said matters of accounting."

The following are plaintiff's exceptions:

"For the purpose of appeal, the plaintiff hereby excepts to the decree of Special Judge Ernest Moore, filed April 15, 1910, upon the following grounds:

"(1) That the honorable, the special judge, erred in not allowing the plaintiff's motion, made at the trial of the said cause before him, to amend the complaint so as to conform the same to the proof in the cause, by striking out the description of the Parish Place, in the first paragraph of the complaint, and by inserting the same after the description of the Fishing Creek Place, in the eleventh paragraph of the complaint; the effect of such amendment being to change the allegations of the complaint as to this Parish Place, so as to allege that Mrs. Susan C. Kell had a life estate only in the same, and that at her death the same passed to the plaintiff and her sisters, the defendants, Susan A. Boylston and Eunice R. Cloud, as tenants in common, and as such they are each entitled to one-third undivided interest thereof in fee, instead of the allegation that Mrs. Susan C. Kell died seised and possessed of the same, so as to conform the same to the proof as developed in the testimony and trial of the cause; whereas, the same should have been allowed for the reasons stated.

"(2) That he erred in overruling plaintiff's fourth exception to the report of the referee; and in so doing in holding: 'The evidence showed merely a purchase of this land by B. E. Kell, Sr., from J. H. McMurray, a payment by him of part of the purchase money in cash and an assumption of liability for the payment of a certain undesignated mortgage debt against the said land conveyed to him. There is no evidence whatever that any money belonging to Susan C. Kell was used in the purchase of this land, or applied in the payment of the purchase money thereof.' And in further holding: That the fact that the mortgage debt was owing to Susan C. Kell would only amount to 'an acknowledgment of liability for the payment of any balance that might be due thereon, but would not constitute a using of the money of Susan C. Kell in the purchase of the land. Under such circumstances, there is nothing upon which a resulting trust can be based, as even the assuming of the payment of a mortgage debt due to the wife of the grantee would not operate to raise a resulting trust in land, but could occasion merely a liability by B. E. Kell, Sr., for the payment to her of the mortgage debt.' Whereas he should have sustained the said exception and held that B. E. Kell, Sr., the purchaser of the land, was the husband, agent, and trustee of Susan C. Kell, the mortgagee, and owner of the mortgage upon the said land referred to, and that this mortgage has never been paid or satisfied, and that the amount due upon the said mortgage constituted fiduciary funds used by the trustee in the purchase of property in his own name, and which he has not paid, and that Mrs. Kell had therefore an interest in the said lands, by way of resulting trust, to the extent of the funds so belonging to her used in the purchase of the land from McMurray by B. E. Kell, and that equity will not permit a trustee to employ the trust funds, in what shape soever they may be, for his own benefit and profit and to the loss of the cestui que trust.

"(3) That he erred in overruling plaintiff's eighth exception to the referee's report, and in holding: 'There can be no doubt that the referee was right in holding that, in so far as the plaintiff is seeking to set up any title to the Fishing Creek Place through and under Susan C. Kell, the plaintiff is estopped by the warranty in the deed from Susan C. Kell to J. H. McMurray, of date November 20, 1880, from setting up any title in herself to the Fishing Creek Place, claimed to have been derived by her as heir of Susan C. Kell, whether such title was held by Susan C. Kell at the date of the execution of the deed or subsequently acquired.' Whereas he should have held that B. E. Kell was the husband, agent, and trustee of Mrs. Kell at the time and in the very transaction by which he took the deed from McMurray, and being fully aware of the limited estate which McMurray had taken under his deed from Mrs. Kell, and of the mortgage and amount due thereon, given by McMurray as security for the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the place, which mortgage, representing funds of Mrs. Kell, was used in the purchase of the said lands by the trustee, B. E. Kell, from McMurray, and that the said B. E. Kell, and those claiming under him as devisees, are estopped from denying that Mrs. Kell, or her heirs at law, are entitled to the proportion of the land represented by the amount of the mortgage debt so used by her husband, agent, and trustee in the purchase of the lands for himself, and the warranty in her deed to McMurray cannot bar Mrs. Kell, or her representatives and heirs at law, from asserting this interest in the said lands, and as against any after-acquired interest of Mrs. Kell therein that would pass by said warranty to McMurray and his assigns.

"(4) That he erred in overruling plaintiff's tenth exception to the referee's report, and in holding: 'That on the 27th day of October, 1902, the said Susan C. Kell was mentally competent to understand, and did comprehend, the nature, force, and effect of her act in signing the deed dated on that day, conveying to Dr. B. E. Kell the Home Place, the Rocky Creek Place, and the Parish Place, and that the said deed was duly executed' and is a valid deed, vesting the fee-simple title to the said lands in the grantee therein named.' And in further holding: That 'the preponderance of the evidence establishes the fact that the conveyance here in controversy is the act and deed of one who was then fully capable of disposing of her property as she might see fit.' Whereas, he should have held that at the time of the execution of said deed Susan C. Kell was mentally incapable of executing the same, and of knowing the force and effect thereof, and physically unable to sign the same unaided, and that she did not understand the force and effect of the same; and he should have held, further: (b) That, even though the said deed be valid as to the Parish Place, it could only convey to Dr. Kell, the grantee, the interest of Mrs. Kell, the grantor, therein, to wit, her life estate, as held under the will of Mrs. Jane Hemphill, and that upon her death the estate so conveyed ceased and determined, and that the defendants, the grantees of Dr. Kell, have no interest therein save such as was conveyed to them after Mrs. Kell's death by plaintiff's sisters, Miss Eunice R. Cloud and Mrs. S. A. Boylston, who at the death of Mrs. Kell, the life tenant, were the heirs at law of Mrs. Hemphill as well as of Mrs. Kell.

"(5) That he erred in holding: 'There is no satisfactory evidence that Mrs. Kell in 1902 was suffering from any such degree of mental impairment as is denoted by the term senile dementia, although some of the experts seem to imply or assert that such was the case.' And in further holding: '* * * That perhaps she was laboring, more or less, under the malady denoted by the term "neurasthenia.'" Whereas, he should have held that the clear weight of the undisputed testimony of the medical witnesses, who had seen and treated Mrs. Kell during the latter part of her life, was that she was then suffering from senile dementia, and had been for a long time, and that said disease manifests itself in its earliest stages in more violence and excitability of body and mind, which affects the physical conditions and general health, but as the disease progresses the mind becomes more affected, and its blood supply is decreased, and it becomes less active and more passive, and the patient then becomes more quiet and less violent, and that finally the mind is entirely lost, while the health of body improves, and that just such conditions were shown to exist in the case of Mrs. Kell.

"(6) That he erred in overruling plaintiff's fourteenth exception to the report of the referee, and in holding: 'The voluminous mass of the evidence in this case has been searched in vain to discover any testimony of undue influence exerted by the grantee, or by any other person, either before or at the time of the execution of this deed, in order to induce the making thereof. There is not the slightest evidence of even argument or persuasion employed to that end, and the testimony tends to show, and in my opinion does establish, the fact that the grantor therein had long entertained a fixed purpose to bestow the lands in question upon the grantee as ultimate owner.' Whereas, he should have held: That from all the facts and circumstances surrounding the execution of the deed and the relation of the parties, as shown by the evidence, that actual undue influence as well as constructive or presumptive undue influence, from fiduciary relations of the parties, was clearly shown, and the deed should have been declared null and void and set aside.

"(7) That he erred in overruling plaintiff's thirteenth exception to the referee's report, and in holding: 'It is true that at or about the time of the signing of the paper in question she expressed sentiments of confidence in the belief that the grantee would continue to care for her during the remainder of her life, and it cannot be doubted that she executed the deed in the faith that he would not permit her to suffer by reason of her act. If he had failed to give her support, aid, and maintenance, the circumstances and relations of the parties were such as would well have warranted a court of equity in imposing upon the grantee the duty of providing for her support and comfort during the remainder of her life, at her instance and upon her application. But it does not appear that there was any abuse of that trust and confidence, nor is there any evidence of a failure by him to discharge any duty in that particular.' And in further holding, in effect, that because the grantee never neglected or failed to provide for Mrs. Kell, the grantor, and carried out the intention of the arrangement, which he holds, under the circumstances and conditions stated, to have been made between them, that there could be no undue influence; the error being that it is not necessary, in order to avoid a deed for undue influence, to show, in addition to actual undue influence, or undue influence from fiduciary relation of the parties, that the grantee so procuring the execution of such deed failed to support or neglected or abandoned the grantor, whereas, he should have held that if the deed was procured by undue influence, actual or constructive, the court of equity will set it aside as against public policy, irrespective of whether or not the grantee in possession of the estate so conveyed provides for the grantor, or carries out the terms of the arrangement that grantor had been induced to make by reason of such undue influence.

"(8) Having held that the highest degree of confidence and trust existed in the relations between the grantor and the grantee, the latter being the physician and medical attendant of the former, who was an old lady of eighty-odd years old, of weak mind and memory, and subject to various delusions, and accustomed to rely upon the advice and direction of the grantee, and being at the time of the execution of the deed nearly, if not quite, blind, and that the deed was without consideration, in the nature of a gift of all her valuable estate, he erred in further holding that the validity of this deed must be sustained, and in so adjudging; whereas, he should have held that from the said facts and circumstances so found to exist at the time of the said conveyance that imposition or undue influence will be implied in law.

"(9) That, having held that the relations of the parties and the inadequacy of the price paid were such as in law to raise the presumption of undue influence, he erred in holding that such presumption can be rebutted by proof of the absence of actual fraud, persuasion, argument, or duress; whereas, he should have held that the only way to rebut such presumption of undue influence from the relationship of the parties is by clear proof, that the relation of the parties had no bearing or influence upon the transaction, that they dealt at arm's length, as strangers, in the transaction, and that the grantee had not been actively concerned in the preparation and execution of the deed, and that the grantor had the benefit of independent, disinterested advice, and that the conveyance was for adequate valuable consideration, or considered as a gift pure and simple, that the gift was such a one as the court of equity would permit to have been made out of a trust estate owned by Mrs. Kell, by her trustee, upon application, to a relative or friend for whom she entertained an affection, none of which have been shown, or attempted to have been shown, in this case.

"(10) That he erred in not holding that the said deed was obtained without adequate consideration, and while the grantor was mentally incapable of executing the same, and of knowing the force and effect thereof, while she was under duress, and under the care of parties employed by the grantee, and by means of undue influence, while the relations between her and the grantee were of the very closest fiduciary and confidential nature, and the day after the grantee had informed her of her husband's death, and without the opportunity of independent advice, and upon the solicitation of the grantee, who came with the deed prepared for her to sign; and that the same is fraudulent, null and void, and should be set aside and cancelled by the decree of this court.

"(11) That he erred in not holding that plaintiff was and is entitled to one-third interest in all the lands described in the complaint, and in failing to decree partition thereof."

Halcott P. Green, Henry & McLure, and A. L. Gaston, for appellant. J. H. Marlon, Glenn & McFadden, and R. B. Caldwell, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action to set aside a deed for fraud and for other relief.

The facts are fully stated in the decree of his honor, Special Judge Ernest Moore, which, together with the appellants' exceptions, will be incorporated in the report of the case.

[11] The first question that will be considered is whether there was error on the part of the presiding judge in refusing the motion to allow the plaintiff to amend the complaint in the particular mentioned in the first exception. Amendments are within the discretion of the presiding judge, and an order refusing a motion to amend is not appealable, unless there was an abuse of discretion, which does not appear in this case.

We do not deem it necessary to consider the other exceptions specifically, as we are satisfied with the circuit judge's findings of fact, and the reasons assigned by him for his conclusions of law.

Affirmed.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by the Austin Manufacturing Company against W. H. Coffman, trading as the W. H. Coffman Coke Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Harold A. Ritz, for plaintiff in error. McClaugherty & Peters, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Austin Manufacturing Company, a corporation, doing business at Chicago, brought an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Mercer county against W. H. Coffman, trading as W. H. Coffman Coke Company, to recover a balance of the purchase money of a stone crusher sold by the Austin Company to Coffman, and recovered a verdict against Coffman, on which the court rendered judgment, and Coffman brings the case to this court.

Coffman claims that the Austin Company had sold him, not only a stone crusher, but a boiler to be of 100 horse power and an engine of 75 horse power, and that the boiler was not of 100 horse power, and the engine was not of 75 horse power, and that they failed to do the work required of them; and he filed a notice of recoupment, seeking to abate for damage therefrom $1,500. This case involves no law, not a single point of law, and only question of fact. The Austin Company claimed that it made no sale whatever of boiler and engine to Coffman, but only of a stone crusher. Such was the matter in contest before the jury. Coffman in an equivocal manner, which is the character of his whole evidence, if it is not against himself, stated that the Austin Company sold him boiler and engine. Ramsey, who sold as agent the crusher to Coffman and made the contract with him, swears flatly and definitely that the Austin Company sold no boiler or engine, but that Houston, Stanwood & Gamble sold them. Thus we have a direct conflict of oral testimony, and the decision of the jury must stand, on familiar principles. But it does not stand alone on that principle; for the written evidence and the action of Coffman are overwhelming to prove the rectitude of that verdict. It is proven that the Williams Contractor Supply Company, of Columbus, Ohio, is a sale agent for machinery manufactured by others; it manufacturing nothing. It sent Ramsey to see Coffman about the purchase of the crusher. The start of the matter is that Coffman wrote the Austin Company proposing to buy, not an engine and boiler, but only a crusher. In response the Austin Company wrote him a letter saying, "We are in receipt of your letter of the 30th ult. for stone crushing machinery," and sent him catalogues of stone crushers, and otherwise speaking of only a proposition to sell a stone crusher. As a postscript to the letter we find, "All our business in that section of the country is handled through our Columbus, Ohio, branch office, the Williams Contractor Supply Company, to whom we have referred your letter, with instructions for them to get in touch with you and which they will do promptly."

On this postscript Coffman would hang his case, seeking from it to show that he purchased from the Austin Company the boiler and engine. Ramsey was an agent, not of the Austin Company, but of the Williams Supply Company. He went to make contracts of sale for machinery and other things for the Williams Supply Company, which simply took orders for things through Ramsey, and would then send those orders for filling to this, that, and the other manufactory according to the article wanted. The Williams Supply Company was a mere intermediary. It simply procured orders for machinery or other things and sent those orders to various manufacturers. Now, that postscript was a postscript of a letter written by the Austin Company to Coffman, in response to Coffman's letter saying that he wished to purchase a crusher. Coffman's letter to the Austin Company never whispered of a purchase of boiler or engine, but only of a crusher, and the response letter of the Austin Company never mentioned boiler or engine. Both letters must be read together, and they never mentioned boiler or engine, but mentioned only a crusher. And the postscript cannot possibly refer to anything beyond the article mentioned in both letters. Both letters were confined to a crusher. What Coffman relies on, the postscript itself, when read with the two letters, proves that this proposed purchase was only of a crusher. Not that only; when Ramsey went to Bluefield to see Coffman, Coffman gave a written order, signed by Coffman, addressed to the Austin Company, directing it to ship to him "1 No. 5 Austin gyratory stone crusher" and other things going with it, never mentioning boiler or engine. The order is a fully written contract, confined exclusively to a crusher and its accompanying utensils. This order contains the following clause: "It is fully understood that this order embodies the entire understanding; that it is not affected by any verbal statement or promises by whomsoever made." Thus we have a written contract containing all its stipulations, and Coffman would by his own oral evidence add to it a most material addition. He would contradict it. The law will not allow this.

That alone ends the case, if other considerations did not. On that same day, through Ramsey, Coffman made a written order, signed by Coffman, saying, "Purchase for W. H. Coffman with power plant for a No. 5 crusher boiler and engine from Houston, Stanwood & Gamble, Cincinnati, Ohio." Thus Coffman made an explicit order to buy the boiler and engine from Houston, Stanwood & Gamble, and he says it was shipped from their manufactory. The Austin Company never saw this order. It went to Houston, Stanwood & Gamble. It is absurd to say that the purchase of the boiler and engine was from the Austin Company. Not only that; but Houston, Stanwood & Gamble, as Coffman himself swears, sent him a bill for the boiler and engine, and he paid them for the boiler and engine. Why did he pay Houston, Stanwood & Gamble for the boiler and engine, if he had bought them of the Austin Company? Coffman is an experienced man of business, of acute intelligence. Is it not absurd to say that he could be under the opinion that he bought the boiler and engine of the Austin Company, or that he would pay another firm for them? Another absurdity connected with his position arises from the fact that the crusher price was $3,475, and the boiler and engine cost $1,200; total $4,675. The Austin Company never rendered a bill for anything but their crusher to Coffman. He knew the bill was only for the crusher. The bill rendered was for $3,442.50, the original contract price for only the crusher, after a small abatement for a utensil belonging to the crusher of less length than at first contemplated. Never did the Austin Company make any demand for boiler and engine. If it had sold the crusher, boiler, and engine, why did it never render a bill therefor? And why did Coffman accept the bill for boiler and engine rendered by Houston, Stanwood & Gamble, and pay them for the boiler and engine, if the Austin Company was entitled to the money for a purchase from them of the boiler and engine?

Moreover, the Austin Company often wrote to Coffman for payment, dunning him. He made four payments, amounting to $2,400, thus acknowledging the justice of the demand. He wrote letter after letter, asking indulgence and promising payment. Those letters did not speak of a boiler and engine. They related to the demand for the payment of the crusher. After the claim was put in the hands of lawyers, he promised payment repeatedly, and even after the action was brought it seems that he only asked a continuance of the case. He never mentioned the defect of the engine until the suit. In all the correspondence through months and months, in more than a dozen letters from him to the Austin Company and its attorneys, he never mentioned the defect. He said he did not discover the defect in the engine until recently. Why not? The verdict is clearly, plainly right on the evidence. The case is only one of evidence.

Therefore we affirm the judgment.

CREDITORS' SUIT (§ 50*) — ENFORCEMENT OF LIENS — DECREE.

Pending a chancery suit to enforce various liens against a debtor's land, some of the lienors holding first liens agree in writing that the debtor may sell a part of a tract in lots, the proceeds to go into the hands of a trustee to be applied on liens. Before decreeing the debts and sale of the balance of the debtor's land, the proceeds of such lot sales should be ascertained, and the trust fund applied on the lien debts.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Bill by Paul Golden and others against Daniel O'Connell and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant O'Connell appeals. Reversed and remanded.

R. S. Turk and Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for appellant. L. M. McClintic and Price, Osenton & McPeak, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Paul Golden, having a judgment against Daniel O'Connell, brought a chancery suit against O'Connell and various other lien creditors by judgment and deeds of trust to enforce his lien against land of O'Connell. It is a lien creditors' suit. A decree was rendered in the case, fixing the amount of a very considerable number of lien debts against O'Connell, and subjecting his land to sale. He appeals.

A very important matter in this case, and one which has given us some perplexity, is this: O'Connell was owner of several tracts of land on which the liens rested. After report by a commissioner of a number of liens, a number of those lienors entered into an agreement in writing, reciting that O'Connell, out of a tract of 127 acres, called the "Drewry Place," at White Sulphur Springs, had set apart about 25 acres for town lots, streets, and alleys, to be offered for sale. They consented that O'Connell might sell them, and appointed W. E. Nelson their attorney, with power to execute releases of liens to purchasers of lots on receipt of the purchase price, the money arising therefrom to be applied upon the liens upon the land in their order as reported by the commissioner in the cause. This writing was signed by the creditors having the first liens in priority. Five lienors did not sign it. O'Connell filed an amended answer, introducing that paper into the case, and alleging that a large number of lots had been sold, realizing about $5,000, and that a hotel had been sold for $3,000, which sales were partly for cash and partly on credit, making up about $8,000, and that the cash and notes had gone into the hands of Nelson. He asked that the case go to a commissioner to ascertain the amount in the hands of Nelson thus arising. It does not appear when this answer was filed. It is first mentioned in the decree of sale. No evidence substantiates this answer; but as no depositions could be taken until the answer was filed, and as the answer first appears in the decree of sale, we think that would excuse O'Connell for not taking such depositions. He virtually asked a continuance, by asking that the fund in Nelson's hands be ascertained. It is apparent that, as the first lien creditors consented to this agreement, it should have been ascertained how much would arise from such lot sales applicable on the debts. The debts were decreed, regardless of any credit from such sales. True, no evidence proves those matters; but the court had before it that answer and the agreement taken for true, and that agreement showed that consent to such sale was given by the creditors; and, though it did not prove that such sales had been made, yet that agreement rendered the fact highly probable. That agreement rendered it plausible that there was a fund arising from the sale of those lots and that hotel of large amount, which should be applied on the liens, a trust fund dedicated by agreement of O'Connell and the lien creditors for the payment of their debts.

The decree did not sell the 35 acres, but sold the balance of the tract, reserving the sale of the 35 acres until further orders. We think that it was error to decree these debts against the balance of the land and sell it for the full amounts of the debts without first ascertaining and bringing in the funds arising from such lot and hotel sales. It seems to a court of equity inequitable to decree the whole amount of the debts and sell the balance of the land regardless of that fund. These lien creditors had solemnly agreed to let this property be sold for payment of their debts. It is error not to ascertain the true amounts of liens before decreeing a sale. It is true the lienors not signing that agreement are not bound by it; but they seem to be the subsequent lienors, and anyhow, though they may be delayed by our decision, yet equity always delays creditors enforcing liens until the amounts of the liens shall be ascertained.

It is hardly necessary to refer to other matters, as we see no other error, and those matters involve no legal principles.

We reverse the decree, and remand the cause to the circuit court for the purpose indicated above, and for other proper proceedings.

1. ACTION (§ 56*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 964*)—REVIEW—CONSOLIDATION OF CASES.

The trial court has discretion in the matter of consolidating causes, and, to warrant a reversal of a decree on this ground, it must appear that such discretion has been misused to the prejudice of the party complaining.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Preston County.

Action by Mary C. Castle and others against George M. Castle and others, and by Joseph W. Castle against Milford C. Gibson. Suits were consolidated and a decree made, dismissing both, and Joseph W. Castle appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Wm. G. Conley, for appellant. N. J. Fortney, P. J. Crogan, and F. E. Parrack, for appellee Milford C. Gibson.

WILLIAMS, P. Two suits in equity were pending in the circuit court of Preston county, the first brought in June, 1897, by Mary C. Castle and others against George M. Castle and others, and the second brought in July, 1902, by Joseph W. Castle against Milford C. Gibson.

On the 28th of October, 1905, the two cases were heard together and a decree made, dismissing both. This decree required Joseph W. Castle to pay to Mary C. Castle all the costs in the first suit; the second suit was dismissed without costs to either party.

Joseph W. Castle, one of the defendants in the first suit and sole plaintiff in the second, has appealed, and assigns four grounds of error: (1) That it was not proper to hear the two causes together; (2) that it was error to decree costs against petitioner in the first of said causes; (3) that it was error to dismiss the second cause; and (4) that it was error not to decree specific performance according to the prayer of the bill in the second suit.

Milford C. Gibson was one of a large number of defendants to the first suit, and was the sole defendant in the second.

Pending the first suit, and after numerous depositions had been taken on both sides of the case, on the 15th of December, 1898, a written agreement of compromise was entered into between Joseph W. Castle, Mary C. Castle, M. C. Gibson, and others, in which it was agreed that the first suit was to be dismissed, "agreed," and that each party should pay his own costs. All matters in controversy between the parties involved in the suit, which was in relation to the title to a certain tract of land and the timber which had been cut from it, were "adjusted and settled forever" by this agreement. The compromise agreement contained this contract between Joseph W. Castle and M. C. Gibson, viz.: "Joseph W. Castle hereby agrees that he will pay the defendant, M. C. Gibson, five hundred dollars ($500 00) within thirty days from this date, and the said Gibson hereby agrees that when the five hundred dollars above mentioned are paid he will execute and make the defendant, Joseph W. Castle, a deed of special warranty for all his interest in the farm, in the bill mentioned of one hundred and twenty-nine acres on which John Hartman lived and died." It was to specifically enforce this contract between Joseph W. Castle and M. C. Gibson that the second suit was brought. Depositions were taken by both plaintiff and defendant in the second suit. On the 6th of December, 1904, while the second suit was pending, and before any order of dismissal was made in the first suit, Joseph W. Castle and M. C. Gibson, who were the only parties to the second suit, made a second written agreement, by which Gibson was to pay Joseph W. Castle $500 and execute to him a deed with special warranty, granting all his right in the John Hartman farm, "saving and reserving to himself all of the coal lying under the vein known as the 'Three Foot Vein' now open on said place." The money was to be paid and deed executed by Gibson upon the dismissal of the Mary C. Castle suit, and the contract recites that her authority in writing for the dismissal had already been given. Joseph W. Castle was then to execute to Gibson a quitclaim deed for all right claimed by him in the coal reserved by Gibson. The contract then closes as follows: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that the said two suits are to be dismissed at the December term, 1904, of the said court, 'agreed,' each party to pay his own costs incurred therein." The foregoing statement shows the relation between the two suits, and all the facts essential to a review of the decree appealed from.

[1] There is nothing prejudicial to appellant in his first assignment of error. It is largely a matter of discretion with the chancellor whether or not it is proper to hear two causes together. Beach v. Woodyard, 5 W. Va. 231; McKittrick v. McKittrick, 43 W. Va. 117, 27 S. E. 303; Wyatt v. Thompson, 10 W. Va. 645; Patterson v. Eakin, 87 Va. 49, 12 S. E. 144; 8 Cyc. 591-593. The first agreement of compromise did not appear in the first suit, but it was the basis of the second suit, and was made an exhibit with the bill. By consolidating the two suits, the court could consider its effect upon the rights of the parties in the first suit; otherwise it may have required an amendment of the pleadings in that suit to put it before the court. We do not see that the court has violated its discretion by consolidating the suits, or that appellant is prejudiced by such consolidation.

[2] As to the second point of error assigned: The decree directs that Joseph W. Castle pay to the plaintiff, Mary C. Castle, all the costs of said first suit. Generally speaking, the control over costs in equity suits is a matter largely within the discretion of the chancellor. Section 10, c. 138, Code 1906; Nutter v. Brown, 58 W. Va. 237, 52 S. E. 88, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1083. But in the present case the costs had been made the subject of an agreement between the parties, which took it out of the court's discretion. Both of the compromise agreements expressly stipulated that each of the parties should pay his own costs in the first suit. The decree holds that these contracts are binding; and we do not see how the court could have then disregarded the stipulation as to costs, which appears to be as binding as any other portions of the agreements.

[3] The matter of costs being thus taken out of the discretion of the court by agreement of the parties, and the amount thereof decreed to be paid by Joseph W. Castle to Mary C. Castle being shown by the supplement to the record to be in excess of $100, after deducting the costs which he himself incurred and for which he is liable, the decree, as to costs, becomes an appealable decree. Nutter v. Brown, 58 W. Va. 237, 52 S. E. 88, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1083. It was error to disregard the agreements concerning costs, and to decree all the costs in favor of Mary C. Castle against Joseph W. Castle.

Third: The second suit was brought to specifically enforce the agreement for the purchase of the land which was in controversy in the first suit. Joseph W. Castle and M. C. Gibson were the only persons interested in that portion of the compromise agreement thus sought to be enforced. Consequently, it was not necessary that any of the other parties to the contract should have been made parties to that suit. The court did not err in refusing the prayer of the bill and in dismissing the second suit, in view of the second compromise contract of December 6, 1904. This contract abrogated the first one, in so far as it related to the contract for the purchase of the land. This last-mentioned agreement was not a matter in litigation. It appears in the record of the second suit only as matter of evidence; and was put in evidence by plaintiff himself as an exhibit in support of his objection, made on the 23d of February, 1905, to any further taking of testimony by the defendant. By the terms of this agreement, both suits were to be dismissed, "agreed," and each party was to pay his own costs. There is no proof that this second contract was ever canceled by the parties, or that it was superseded by any other agreement. Neither does it appear that it was not, at the time of the decree, a valid and binding contract. The court could not have granted the prayer of Joseph W. Castle's bill without disregarding this contract which plaintiff had, by his counsel, placed before the court. This reason is also a sufficient answer to the fourth assignment of error.

It is insisted by counsel for appellant that, inasmuch as there is no order of court showing the filing of the answer of M. C. Gibson in the second suit, his answer cannot be considered as a part of the record. This is true. Park v. Petroleum Co., 25 W. Va. 108; Sims v. Bank, 8 W. Va. 274; Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710. And in view of the fact that Gibson filed no answer, the depositions taken on his behalf cannot be read. Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 46 W. Va. 426, 33 S. E. 266; Edgell v. Smith, 50 W. Va. 349, 40 S. E. 402. But the contract is not a part of the defendant's evidence; plaintiff's counsel vouched the contract in support of his objection to any further taking of depositions by the defendant, and therefore, the plaintiff being responsible for the contract's appearance in the record, he cannot be heard to say now that it ought not to be read. It is a part of his own evidence, and it proves him out of court.

We do not interpret the language of the decree, wherein it recites "that the contracts heretofore made are fair and binding upon the parties thereto," to be an adjudication upon the rights of Joseph W. Castle and M. C. Gibson under the contract of December 6, 1904, because the decree expressly says that "the dismissal is without prejudice to the rights of the parties under the contract of December 6, 1904, if any they have."

In so far as the decree appealed from directs Joseph W. Castle to pay all the costs of the first of said suits to Mary C. Castle, it will be reversed, and a decree entered here that each of the parties to said suit pay his own costs; and in all other respects the decree will be affirmed, but without prejudice to any right of suit upon, or defense to, the contract of date December 6, 1904, concerning which we express no opinion.

Appellant, having substantially prevailed, is entitled to costs in this court.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—PRESUMPTION OF NEGLIGENCE.

Negligence by the master is not to be presumed from the mere fact of injury to the servant, except in those cases wherein the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Garfield Chandler, by his next friend, against the American Car & Foundry Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Anderson, Strother & Hughes, for plaintiff in error. Holt & Duncan, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. Plaintiff, a boy 20 years of age, was injured while in the service of defendant company, and sued, by next friend, in the circuit court of Cabell county, and recovered a judgment for $2,000 against defendant for negligently causing his injury. He was employed to work about the yards of defendant's car shops in the city of Huntington, and, at the time of his injury, he and four other boys were engaged in hauling a truck load of iron angle bars from a certain place in defendant's grounds to the shops. The angle bars weighed about 75 pounds according to plaintiff's testimony; were about nine feet in length, by about five-sixteenths of an inch thick; they had the form of a half open book, and, if flattened out, would be about eight inches wide. They could be easily loaded upon the truck by two boys, one lifting at either end of the bar. The truck on which they were loaded was not over 21 inches high, was flat on top, and was drawn by a horse upon tracks laid throughout the yards for that purpose. The angle bars had been hauled to the defendant's yards on the railroad, and thrown off in a pile, to be thereafter carried upon the truck to any point about the yard, or buildings, where they might be needed in the manufacture of cars. Plaintiff had been working for defendant only four days; and, at the time of his injury, he and four other boys had been ordered by defendant's foreman to load the angle bars on the truck, and to take them to one of the shops. Plaintiff testifies that after they had put on what they thought was a sufficient load the foreman, Mr. Chalmer, told them to put on all that were in the pile, and that they then loaded on the balance of the pile, about 50 more bars; that this made too much of a load for the horse, and that they were then told by the foreman to push on the truck to assist the horse, and did so; that plaintiff was pushing at one side of the truck when they came to a curve in the track which made the car harder to pull; that the horse gave a sudden jerk which jostled the load and caused some of the angle bars to fall and catch his left hand, severely mashing and lacerating it and cutting off the ends of two of his fingers.

The negligent acts complained of are: (1) That defendant did not provide a proper, safe, and suitable track on which to operate its truck, nor a reasonably safe and suitable truck; that the track was uneven, being lower on one side than on the other, and that the truck was not provided with suitable standards or sideboards. (2) That it did not use proper care in the selection of a foreman of its work, but negligently employed a reckless and incompetent foreman. (3) That it did not use sufficient motive power to draw the truck, that the horse had not the strength to draw it evenly and smoothly when loaded.

As to the first negligence complained of: It appears from the testimony of Bradford Burns, one of plaintiff's witnesses, that there was a sharp curve in the track, and at this place the track was not level; the inner rail being about one inch the lower. The plaintiff himself, when asked what made the iron fall, answered: "The horse jerked it [meaning the car] on that curve." The fact that the outer rail of the track at the curve was higher than the inner one by about an inch does not show negligence in its construction. The testimony of Bradford Burns is the only proof offered by plaintiff to show that the track was not in a proper condition, and it does not prove it. Moreover, it is proven that plaintiff had hauled other kinds of iron over the track before the accident, and therefore it must be presumed that he knew its condition; and, knowing the condition of the track, he assumed the risk.

[1] It is admitted that there were no standards, or sideboards, on the truck; and there is conflict in the testimony as to whether the truck was constructed with a view to such appliances. But, assuming that it was provided with a place for standards, and that defendant failed to supply them, that is not such an act of negligence as would make defendant liable for the injury which happened to plaintiff. Plaintiff could foresee the consequences liable to follow from piling the angle bars on the truck, without standards to support them, as well as any one else. He assisted in loading the truck, and had as good an opportunity to know whether the angle bars were piled too high to be safely hauled without standards as any one else had. We must presume that he possessed ordinary intelligence, and such intelligence is all that was necessary to enable him to anticipate and to guard against any danger from the angle bars rolling down upon him.

[2] The danger was so obvious and patent that he must be held to have assumed the risk as one incidental to his employment. To say that he could not have foreseen the danger would be to charge him with an unusual degree of ignorance. If plaintiff saw that standards were intended to be used on the truck, and undertook to use it without them, he assumed the risk. 1 Labatt on Master & Servant, § 265. This court said: "A servant having knowledge of danger to himself must use diligence and care to protect himself from harm." Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. 999.

[8] The only evidence tending to prove that defendant was negligent in not providing a competent foreman is that the foreman ordered plaintiff and his collaborators to put on all the angle bars in the pile, after they thought the truck had been sufficiently loaded. Granting that it was an error of judgment in the foreman to give this order, still it is not sufficient to prove negligence by defendant in employing him. But even if it had been proven that the foreman was not competent, and that defendant knew it, or should have known it by the exercise of reasonable diligence, still it was necessary to prove that his incompetency was the proximate cause of the injury, and this plaintiff has not done. Core v. Railroad Co., 38 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. 596; Bailey's Master's Liability, 70. The consequences liable to follow from the overloading of the truck, and then undertaking to push against it to help the horse, were as well known to plaintiff as they were to the foreman; and, if plaintiff thought it was dangerous to obey these orders of the foreman, he was not compelled to do so; in obeying the orders, he assumed the risk of known dangers. 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 442. The foregoing argument also applies to show that plaintiff assumed the risk of such accidents as were likely to follow from the use of a horse to draw the truck.

The direct and proximate cause of plaintiff's injury was the piling of too many angle bars on the truck, and then undertaking to push it after it was heavily loaded, and taking a dangerous position by the side of the truck, where the iron in falling would fall upon him. These were plaintiff's own acts; everything which contributed to his injury was open and visible, and, according to the evidence now before us, he must be regarded as being fully cognizant, at the time, of all accidents likely to result from the use of the means and appliances employed in the work at which he was engaged, and to have assumed the risk of such accidents. The means and appliances, according to the evidence, were all reasonably safe; the injury resulted from plaintiff's own lack of proper care.

[4] The master is not an insurer of his servants against injury; and "the mere fact of injury received by a servant raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the master." Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. 999; Richards v. Iron Works, 56 W. Va. 526, 49 S. E. 437.

Plaintiff's work was easy, and the instrumentalities used—a truck to be drawn upon tracks by a horse—were of the simplest kind, and plaintiff must be held to have assumed the risk of the accident which resulted in his injury; it was an incident of his employment. He has failed to prove even a prima facie case of negligence against defendant. In view of what we have said, it was error to refuse defendant's peremptory instruction to find in favor of defendant.

It was not error to refuse defendant's instructions Nos. 7 and 8, because they relate to the failure to warn against danger; and it is not averred in the declaration that defendant was negligent in failing to warn plaintiff of the danger incident to the work at which he was engaged. True there is some evidence in the case tending to prove that defendant's foreman had told plaintiff not to push at the side of the loaded truck, but this evidence was wholly irrelevant, inasmuch as the declaration does not aver that defendant was negligent in that regard. In view of the want of such an averment in the declaration, instruction No. 8 becomes a question of abstract law, and it was not error to refuse it.

The judgment of the lower court will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and, in view of the fact that we are unable to see that plaintiff may not be able to make out a better case on another trial, we will remand the case for a new trial.

NATIONAL BANK OF WESTON v. LYNCH
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 9, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 246*)—AMENDMENT OF DECLARATION.

A declaration may be amended, in form, or in substance, so long as the identity of the cause of action is preserved.

2. JURY (§ 12*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—USURY AS TO DEFENSE.

The right to plead usury, and to have the issue thereon tried by a jury, as provided by section 6, chapter 96, Code 1906, is a substantive right, of which a defendant can not be deprived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 270*)—NATIONAL BANKS—USURY—RIGHTS OF MAKER OF NOTE.

In an action by a National Bank against the maker of a note, defendant has the right, by sections 5197 and 5198, Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493) to reduce the amount of the recovery by the amount of usurious interest which the note bears on its face, or which is included and carried therein; but he can not off set usurious interest actually paid; his remedy for illegal interest actually paid being by action under said section 5198, to recover back twice the amount actually paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 1023-1053; Dec. Dig. § 270.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Gilmer County.

Action by the National Bank of Weston against Thursey M. Lynch and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Thursey M. Lynch brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Charles E. Hogg, for plaintiff in error.
Robert L. Bland, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. [1] The first point of error is, that the court below permitted plaintiff to amend its declaration, charging the note sued on to be the joint note of defendants, instead of joint and several, as charged in the original declaration. The only case cited for this proposition is, Postmaster General v. Ridgway, Fed. Cas. No. 11,313. In that case plaintiff had declared against one obligor alone as jointly and severally bound. The plea was non est factum. The bond offered on the trial was the joint bond of defendant and another. On objection, on account of variance, the court in its opinion says: "It is no doubt true that amendments may be made, not only in form but even in substance. But surely the court is not to be put to sea; nor is this privilege to be so construed as to introduce suddenly, and on the trial, new parties and a new cause of action." This was the real point in the case. No authority is cited for the court's conclusion. The amendment made in the case at bar was not in the midst of the trial, but before trial, by amended declaration, regularly filed, and process thereon, and regularly matured at rules. The cause of action was the same, not a new and different cause of action from that alleged in the original declaration. Besides our statute, section 8, chapter 131, Code 1906, authorizes such amendments, even in the midst of the trial. The authority of the court to permit amendments exists independently of statute. Travis v. Peabody Ins. Co., 28 W. Va. 583. Allegations may be changed and others added, so long as the identity of the cause of action is preserved. Kuhn v. Brownfield, 34 W. Va. 252, 12 S. E. 519, 11 L. R. A. 700; Hanson v. Blake, 63 W. Va. 560, 60 S. E. 589. Other cases justifying the amendment are, Gilchrist v. Oil Co., 21 W. Va. 115, 45 Am. Rep. 555; Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. 26. The point of error is overruled.

[2] The next point is that the court below rejected defendants' plea of usury. The plea tendered was in general terms, such as is provided for by section 6, chapter 96, Code 1906. The statute says defendant may plead such plea, a substantial right, we think, given by law, and of which a defendant, if not otherwise precluded, can not be deprived. Upon the filing of such plea this statute requires the court to direct a special issue to try three things: (1) Whether or not, the contract, assurance or other writing is usurious; (2) if so, to what extent; (3) whether or not the interest has been paid on such contract, assurance or other writing, above six per cent, and if so, to what extent. It is further provided that if the verdict upon the plea of usury be for the defendant, judgment shall be rendered for the plaintiff for the principal sum due, with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, and if any interest has been paid above the rate of six per cent per annum, the excess over and above that rate shall be entered as a credit on the sum due, and if nothing be found due after applying all credits, and all excessive interest, judgment shall be entered for the defendant.

We think, a defendant, if he so elects, has the right to file this plea of usury, and have the issues thereon tried, without interposing any other plea to the action. In the case at bar, however, the action being debt, defendants were permitted to demur to the declaration, and to file a general plea of nil debet, in writing, without counter affidavit filed, and without objection on that ground, but their plea of usury was rejected. It is suggested in brief of defendants' counsel that the court below may have rejected this plea for want of a counter affidavit; if so, it is argued, the affidavit of the plaintiff accompanying the declaration, does not appear to have been filed at rules, or by any order of the court, so as to cut off defendants' plea. The point we think immaterial, for whether or not plaintiff's affidavit was filed, the plea of nil debet, a plea to issue, entered without objection, operated as a waiver by the plaintiff of its right to require a counter affidavit and to set aside the office judgment, and admit the pleas. Williamson & Co. v. Nigh, 58 W. Va. 629, 53 S. E. 124; Parfitt v. Sterling Veneer and Basket Co., 69 S. E. 985, 992. The judgment below rejecting this plea we think was clearly eraneous. The plea should have been received, and the issue, as the statute provides, directed and tried by the jury. The right given by the federal statute does not supersede the right given by the state statute.

[3] The briefs and arguments of counsel, however, are mainly devoted to the question whether defendants have the right, as against plaintiff, a national bank, to cut down recovery on the note sued on, to the extent of the usurious interest charged or borne by the note. Such rights as the defendants have are given by sections 5197 and 5198, Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493). It seems to be settled law that a defendant cannot offset against principal, usurious interest actually paid by him; that his only remedy for illegal interest actually paid is the right given by the statute to recover back twice the amount so paid, the penalty prescribed by section 5198, for the unlawful taking of usurious interest. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 23 L. Ed. 196; Bank v. Boylen, 26 W. Va. 554, 53 Am. Rep. 113; Lynch v. Bank, 22 W. Va. 554, 53 Am. Rep. 113; Bank v. Bradford, 51 W. Va. 255, 41 S. E. 153, and cases cited.

It is earnestly insisted, however, that although the note sued on does not bear on its face a usurious rate of interest, or in fact any interest, nevertheless, there is included in the note usurious interest, not paid, but agreed to be paid, and that, within the meaning of said section 5198, it carries with it usurious interest, not recoverable as principal, in said action; and that defendants' general plea of usury, under the state statute, fairly presents this issue, and was improperly rejected on that ground. As we have already concluded the judgment must be reversed for rejecting this plea, we need not, and do not, decide the question, whether it is good as a plea under the federal statute. In National Bank v. Lewis, 75 N. Y. 516, 31 Am. Rep. 484, defendant seems to have combined his defenses under state and federal statutes, in the same plea. In Bolles on the National Bank Act (4th Ed.) page 264, referring to this case, and to National Bank v. Orcutt, 48 Barb. (N. Y.) 256, 257, and other cases, strongly indicates that the plea under the federal statute must be specific; while in Bank v. Littell, 46 N. J. Law. 507, the court holds that if the maker of a note is entitled to set up the usurious interest contract between plaintiff and the endorser, it is not necessary to plead the federal statute specially, but that he may avail himself of it under the general issue. In Brown v. Bank, 169 U. S. 416, 18 Sup. Ct. 390, 42 L. Ed. 801, Justice Harlan says: "No matter how many renewals may have been made, if the bank has charged a greater rate of interest than the law allows, it must, if the forfeiture clause of the statute be relied on, and the matter is thus brought to the attention of the court, lose the entire interest which the note carries or which has been agreed to be paid." But as we have said we do not decide the question of pleading; for the benefit of court and counsel on another trial, we refer to the authorities found on the subject.

Returning to the main question, may a defendant, where the note, on its face, or in fact carries usurious interest, interpose the plea of usury, and thereby reduce recovery by the amount of the usurious interest carried in the note? The law seems to be well settled that he may do so. Brown v. Bank, supra; Danforth v. National State Bank, 48 Fed. 271, 1 C. C. A. 62, 17 L. R. A. 622; Bank v. Stauffer (C. C.) 1 Fed. 187; Bank v. Bradford, supra; Bank v. Hoagland (C. C.) 7 Fed. 159; Shafer v. Bank, 53 Kan. 614, 36 Pac. 998; Bank v. Donnell, 172 Mo. 384, 72 S. W. 925; McGhee v. Bank, 40 Neb. 92, 58 N. W. 537; Hall v. Bank, 30 Neb. 99, 46 N. W. 151. If, however, the usurious interest has in fact been paid his only remedy is by action to recover it back; he can not off set it against the principal of the note.

For the reasons above given the judgment below will be reversed and a new trial awarded.

J. W. ELLISON, SON & CO. v. FLAT TOP GROCERY CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 9, 1911.)

1. SALES (§ 119*)—DEFECT IN QUALITY—RIGHT TO RESCIND.

In case of a contract for the sale of 200 car loads of hay of given quality to be delivered and paid for in monthly installments of 17 car loads running through a year, the purchaser generally has no right, after the contract has been partly executed, to rescind for defect of quality of some of the hay, but must recoup from the purchase money or sue for damages for such breach.

2. SALES (§ 116*)—CONTRACT—BREACH—RIGHT TO RESCIND.

Where a purchaser of chattels has right to rescind the contract for breach of it, the breach must be in a material matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 290; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

Error from Circuit Court, Mercer County. Action by J. W. Ellison, Son & Co. against the Flat Top Grocery Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ritz & Ritz, for plaintiff in error. Sanders & Crockett, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. J. W. Ellison, Son & Co. and the Flat Top Grocery Company, both corporations, made a written contract by which the Ellison Company sold to the Flat Top Company 200 car loads of hay, 180 of which were to be No. 1 timothy, and 20 No. 1 mixed; the hay to be good. The contract contained the clause: "The party of the first part agrees to take the full amount of hay within twelve (12) months, commencing October 1st, 1907, said shipment to be made at the rate of seventeen cars per month, which shipment is to be made on regular terms, payable ten days from date of shipment." The hay was to be shipped as ordered by the purchaser. The Ellison Company began shipment of hay September 10, 1907, and continued these shipments until late in June, 1908, when the Flat Top Company refused to receive any further shipments on the ground that the contract had been broken by the plaintiff by reason of the fact that some of the hay was of inferior quality. Under this contract 123 car loads of hay had been then shipped; there remaining to be shipped 77 car loads when the Flat Top Company rescinded the contract. Of the hay shipped some was inferior. Up to the 1st of February, 1908, there were shipped 55 cars, and from that date to the cancellation of the contract by the Flat Top Company 68 cars. The Flat Top Company paid for the 123 cars of hay. From time to time during the delivery of such cars, nine cars contained some bad hay. Complaint was made by the Flat Top Company of this bad hay, and the parties met, and the Flat Top Company was allowed a rebate, and that matter was adjusted to the satisfaction of both parties, and the delivery of hay was continued. Eight of the cars containing bad hay were shipped before February 1, 1908, and the other one in March. In June, 1908, two cars contained some bad hay. One of these cars, however, need not be considered, as it was accepted by the purchaser from the Flat Top Company. It seems not in question. As to the other car the Ellison Company took it back on complaint being made. And on complaint about these two cars the Ellison Company offered to take them both back and replace them with good hay; but the Flat Top Company refused this proposition and canceled the contract, and then the Ellison Company brought the suit we have in hand against the Flat Top Company to recover damages for the breach of the contract, and recovered a verdict against the Flat Top Company for $4,463.40, and the court refused a new trial and rendered judgment therefor.

[1] A question has been much debated between counsel as to whether this contract is one deemed an entire or a severable contract, in the language of the courts and law books. Is it such a contract, an entire contract, as would authorize the purchaser of the hay, at any point during the process of delivery, to cancel the contract for the delivery of some bad hay, without liability to damages for breach? Or is it a severable contract denying such power of cancellation and compelling the purchaser to execute it and look to the seller for compensation in damages for bad hay delivered? I remark that each contract must stand upon its nature and circumstances. Upon this question there is a wilderness of authority through many, many years, and conflicting. Here is a contract not to deliver a single specific thing at one time. Here is a contract of present sale of chattels to be delivered in future by installments covering a considerable time, not to be executed by one single delivery. We have to take the contract that is in our hands. Can the Flat Top Company receive 123 car loads of hay, and then cancel the contract, leave the undelivered hay on the hands of the Ellison Company, and be immune from damages? "A contract for property to be delivered in installments, where each installment is to be paid for separately, is not entire. The vendor will be entitled to recover for any delivered installment, irrespective of default in the delivery of others. In contracts for the future delivery of goods, to be subsequently or concurrently paid for, the delivery being a condition on the performance of which the right to payment depends, if the contract is entire there must be a delivery of the whole to fulfill the condition. But where delivery is to be made in parcels or installments, severable not only in bulk but prices and times of delivery, the delivery of each parcel is a condition only to payment pro tanto. Nor will a default in respect to one severable part entitle the other party to rescind, unless there is then a renunciation of the entire contract, persisted in afterwards." Sutherland on Damages, vol. 3, pp. 1851, 1852. "A contract to deliver 50,000 tons of coal in a year, at the rate of 6,000 tons a month, at the buyer's option, upon monthly notice of the quantity required for the next month, is severable, and where the contract has been partly performed, and the portion delivered has been paid for and consumed, but a portion of the coal so delivered and consumed was of inferior quality to that demanded by the contract, no right to rescind the contract is raised, but in an action by the vendor for a breach of the contract the defendant may set off his damages by reason of such substitution." Scott v. Kittanning Coal Co., 89 Pa. 231, 33 Am. Rep. 753. "Where A. contracts to cut and deliver at B's mill a million feet of merchantable logs within the year, at an agreed sum per thousand feet, to be scaled and received as each 100,000 feet are placed in a certain creek, the contract is divisible and not entire." Tenny v. Mulvaney, 8 Or. 129.

We find in Benjamin on Sales, 579, the following: "In Simpson v. Crippen, the defendant had agreed to supply the plaintiff with 6,000 to 8,000 tons of coal, to be delivered in the plaintiff's wagons at the defendant's colliery 'in equal monthly quantities during the period of twelve months from the first of July next.' During the first month, July, the plaintiff sent wagons for 158 tons only and on the 1st of August the defendants wrote that the contract was canceled on account of the plaintiff's failure to send for the full monthly quantity in the preceding month. The plaintiff refused to allow the contract to be canceled, and the action was brought on the defendants' refusal to go on with it. Held that, although the plaintiff had committed a breach of contract by failing to send wagons in sufficient number the first month, the breach was a good ground for compensation, but did not justify the defendants in rescinding the contract, under the rule established by Pordage v. Cole. Two of the judges (Blackburn and Lush, JJ.) declared that they could not understand Hoare v. Rennie, and declined to follow it." We find in 9 Cyc. 648, the following: "Where the installments are numerous, extending over a considerable period, a default either of delivery or payment would not appear to discharge the contract, although it must necessarily give rise for an action for damages." In Blackburn v. Riley, 47 N. J. Law, 290, 1 Atl. 27, 54 Am. Rep. 159, it is held: "On a contract for sales of goods by successive deliveries and payments, a default in respect to one or more will not discharge the other party unless it is evident that the defaulting party intends no longer to fulfill." In Geril v. Poidebard Co., 57 N. J. Law, 482, 31 Atl. 401, 30 L. R. A. 61, 51 Am. St. Rep. 611, it is held: "Upon a sale of goods delivered in installments there is no right of rescission by the purchaser for a failure to deliver one of the installments, unless the seller, by his conduct, indicates his intention to abandon the contract, or a desire no longer to be bound by its terms. Hence, under a contract to sell 30 bales of silk, to be delivered in specific installments, at times designated, the failure or inability of the seller to deliver the first installment at the time agreed upon does not release the purchaser from the whole contract. He remains under obligation to receive the other installments when tendered to him, if the usefulness to him of any installment did not depend on prompt delivery of the prior installments, and full indemnity for the failure to deliver the first installment could be secured by action based thereon." "Where there was a contract for the purchase of a cargo of flour, and a portion of it was delivered, paid for, and used by the purchaser, he cannot repudiate the contract, upon the ground that the brand upon the flour was not that for which he contracted." Lyon v. Bertram, 20 How. 149, 15 L. Ed. 847. The court also said: "When an article is warranted and the warranty is not complied with, a purchaser who has received and paid for and used a portion of the article, and derived a benefit from it, cannot then rescind the contract. He may receive it and bring a cross-action for the breach of warranty."

Much more authority in this line could be given. See Huyett & Smith Co. v. Chicago Edison Co., 167 Ill. 233, 47 N. E. 384, 59 Am. St. Rep. 279, for full authority. Of course, authorities contra could also be given. We think that those authorities are apt in the case we have in hand, defect in quality. It might be different for failure of the purchaser in payment. It might be different on failure to deliver on time when time is material under the circumstances. But we have a case where, after a large part of the contract had been executed, the purchaser rescinds for defect in quality to a limited extent of hay. I would say that the contract in such a case is severable, and that the purchaser cannot abruptly cancel the contract, but must look to damages. Great stress is placed by the defense on the case of Norington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 308. There was a failure to deliver iron rails at a certain stipulated time and failure in quantity of shipment, and the court held that the purchaser could rescind. They were first deliveries. That case is different. The seller failed to ship the first shipments—I say the first shipments, a material matter—at the time stipulated, and, as soon as the purchaser learned that the quantity to be shipped had not been shipped, he canceled the contract. Time was the essence there. The opinion says so, and Justice Gray said: "Their previous acceptance of the single cargo of 400 tons shipped in February was no waiver of this right, because it took place without notice, or means of knowledge, that the stipulated quantity had not been shipped in February." Filley v. Pope, 115 U. S. 213, 6 Sup. Ct. 19, 29 L. Ed. 372, differs from this case. There was a failure to ship the pig iron from Glasgow to New Orleans. And the court held that shipment from Glasgow was a material part of the contract, and that the buyer could refuse to accept iron shipped from Leith arriving at New Orleans earlier than it would have arrived if shipped from Glasgow. Here was premature delivery. Many of the authorities, as will be seen in Williston on Sales, § 467, say that the purchaser may rescind if the circumstances show an intent or inability on the part of the seller not to complete his contract. He says the late English authorities so hold; that is, they deny the right of rescission, and require the party to look to damages, unless such intention to abandon the contract by the party who should perform it appears. So says 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 150. But in this case the Ellison Company was ready, willing, and able to complete its contract and begged, but was refused, leave to do so. Thus amid conflicting authority, on this case as it is, for each must stand on its own facts, I would hold that there would be no right of rescission, but the purchaser must allow the contract to be completed and sue for damages for defect in quality of the hay delivered.

There is another view against the defendant. It had received 123 car loads. Its repudiation of the contract would leave 77 car loads on the hands of the plaintiff, which must be supposed to have made purchases of farmers and bound itself in order to be able to comply with its contract with the Flat Top Company. Could that right be exercised when the Flat Top Company had received more than half the hay and could not return it, could not place the Ellison Company in statu quo? The fact that it could not do so is an argument against the right of rescission. When one party can make the other whole, it is often different. "The contract must be rescinded in toto; cannot be rescinded in part and affirmed in part." Clark on Contracts, 350. A contract must be wholly rescinded, or not at all, is said in Buskirk v. Peck, 57 W. Va. 372, 50 S. E. 432. Manns-Bruning Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. 907, to same effect. As is said in note to 30 L. R. A. at page 72: "And the court held that in case of a failure to comply with the contract in reference to the first shipment the purchaser might refuse to accept and rescind the contract, but this might not be so if the breach was in a subsequent shipment, since then the seller could not be put in statu quo." In Kauffman v. Baeder, 108 Fed. 171, 47 C. C. A. 278, 54 L. R. A. 247, a Circuit Court of Appeals held: "Where one party to a contract has received and retained the benefits of a substantial partial performance thereof by the other party, he cannot rescind it, but the contract must stand, he must perform his part of it, and his remedy for the breach of complete performance by the other party is limited to compensation therefor in damages. A breach of an independent covenant, a covenant which does not go to the whole consideration of a contract, but which is subordinate and incidental to its main purpose, does not constitute a breach of the entire contract, or warrant its rescission by the injured party. The latter is still bound to perform his part of the contract, and his remedy for the breach is compensation in damages."

But, be the above holding as it may, the decision of this case is not alone governed by it. And why? Because there was no substantial breach of the contract by the Ellison Company. There was only one car having bad hay in it that was made the basis of the repudiation of the contract by the Flat Top Company. The nine cars that contained bad hay had been arranged. The parties were satisfied by mutual agreement for abatement as to them. Thereafter there was only one car containing some bad hay. It would seem unjust that this small item should allow the purchaser to annul the contract and leave 77 car loads of hay on the hands of the seller, and make it suffer a loss by having to hunt another purchaser, and sell it at a loss, as the evidence shows that, when the defendant canceled the contract, hay was falling and materially fell in price. This repudiation of the contract did not take place at the opening of its execution by the Ellison Company. It might well happen that, in so large a quantity of hay having to be gathered here and there from farmers, there would be some bad hay. The Flat Top Company so regarded it because it allowed the Ellison Company to atone for nine car loads of bad hay by a rebate therefor. It did not then regard this so material a matter. Why did it not then treat defect in the nine car loads of hay as ground for cancellation? It did not do so, but allowed the Ellison Company to go on under the contract, and months later the Flat Top Company repudiated the contract for some bad hay in one car load. Now, what does the law say even in those cases of contracts where the right of rescission exists for breach? I quote from Williston on Sales, § 467: "Accordingly the general rule governing bilateral contracts must be applied. If either buyer or seller, therefore, has committed a material breach of contract, or has by repudiation manifested an intention to commit such a breach, the other party should be excused from the obligation to perform further. If, however, the injured party knowingly accepts defective performance of the contract, or accepts further performance after he is aware that a breach of contract has been committed, such conduct will operate as a waiver of his right to refuse to go on with the contract, though not necessarily of his right to recover damages for the breach committed by the other party. These principles are reasonably well settled in regard to contracts generally, and should furnish a sufficient guide in regard to installment contracts; but, unfortunately, the English courts, though at first seeming to accept these views, in later decisions seem to deny the injured party the right to refuse to continue performance irrespective of the materiality of the breach, unless the breach or some act or conduct of the wrongdoer 'amounts to an intimation of an intention to abandon and altogether to refuse performance of the contract.'" I quote from 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 644: "Generally the failure of performance, in order to constitute a ground for rescission, must be total; such as to defeat the object of the contract or render it unattainable. The right to rescission does not exist where there had been a substantial though not literally a complete performance."

[2] Under this authority, I ask: Did this failure as to one car deprive the Flat Top Company of the benefit of the contract? Was it not sure that it could and would get for the balance good hay? It had gotten good hay up to the date of its repudiation of the contract. The contract had been so far made good to it, and it had every reason to be sure that the balance of the contract would be properly executed. It would lose nothing, suffer no detriment. But, aside from that, there was no material or substantial breach. The Ellison Company had furnished 123 cars, and could and would furnish the balance, and it would be most unreasonable to say that this small failure as to one car should break the contract. Williston says, in section 467, that: "As a matter of theory the excuse of an innocent promisor in a contract should depend on whether he will receive, if he goes on with the contract, substantially what he bargained for. If he will not receive substantially what he bargained for, he ought not to be required to perform the contract." His text makes the right to rescind, even if that right exists, dependent on the materiality of the omission.

The plaintiff's two instructions complained of were consistent with the legal principles above stated, and we see no error in them. As they are long, and as the legal principles are above stated, and the case will not go back for trial, we need not insert them.

The defendant's instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 9 are based on the right of rescission in this case and are not good according to the principles above stated. We need not insert them at length, as the legal principles have been stated. They are of great length.

The defendant's instruction No. 5 would have told the jury that, if the hay already shipped did not comply with the terms of the written contract, and the plaintiff had notice thereof, the defendant had right to presume that the 77 car loads thereafter to be shipped were of the same kind as those previously shipped, and it had a right to cancel the contract. In the first place, the bulk of the hay that had been shipped was good, and as to that that was bad it had been adjusted, and thus far the instruction did not suit the case; but, further, the fact that there had been some bad hay shipped would not justify the defendant in assuming that more would be shipped, especially as the parties had agreed as to the bad hay that had been shipped, and the subsequent shipments and the eagerness of the Ellison Company to comply with the contract as to quality would justify the inference that bad hay would not be shipped; anyhow, it would not justify the mere assumption that the contract would in future be violated. The defendant could not anticipate this.

The defendant's instruction No. 6 says that if the jury believe from the evidence that part of the hay shipped was not of the quality required, and that the hay which the Ellison Company had for shipping upon the remainder of the contract was of inferior quality, then the defendant had right to cancel the contract. Now, there was a great deal of evidence to show to the contrary. There was no evidence to justify the theory that the hay thereafter to be shipped was bad. The instruction was not apt to the evidence, and only tended to mislead from the justice of the case. The justice of the case did not demand it. Besides that, an instruction of the plaintiff, No. 2, told the jury that the hay thereafter to be furnished must be such as the contract required.

The defense claims that an instruction for the plaintiff would allow as a measure of damages a recovery on 77 car loads of hay the difference between the contract price and the market price at the dates of delivery, and that for the month of September, 1907, only 4 cars were shipped when 17 should have been, and in October, when 17 cars should have been shipped, only 7 were shipped, making 23 cars shortage in those months, and that these failures were attributable to inability to get cars except in two instances. Now, in the first place, for the month of September only one car load was demanded by the contract and four were delivered. In the next place, the contract excuses for inability to get cars. In the next place, it is clearly proven that the defendant failed to give orders for shipment in several instances, though requested to do so. Counsel for defendant say that, as the defendant did not give shipping instructions for as many as 17 cars in several months, and 28 cars were behind at the time of the cancellation, the plaintiff, by continuing to ship after such failure of shipping orders, waived its right to require the defendant to take the cars which should have been but were not ordered during each month, and that the instructions for the plaintiff to the extent that they make no allowance for these cars are erroneous to the extent that the failure to ship these cars was due to the omission to give orders for them. We do not see that there is any strength in this. The reason why these 28 cars were not shipped in those months was the failure of the defendant to give orders for them. This is not disputed. Is this a claim for damages by recoupment or failure to ship in those months? If so, no notice was given of it. But, at any rate, orders were not given for shipment of those 28 cars at the time stipulated. No fault is found with the principle laid down by the court as to the measure of damages, in a general sense.

The defendant complains that witness Ellison was asked if the plaintiff had sold the 77 car loads of hay which it had on hand for delivery to the defendant as No. 1 timothy and No. 1 mixed hay, and was allowed to answer that it had been sold as No. 1 hay. Now, the plaintiff had right to show that those 77 cars were good hay; and we fail to see that evidence of their sale as No. 1 in the market would be inadmissible. Counsel for defendant say that such sale was res inter alios acta; that is, a transaction to which the defendant was not a party and not bound. But we think that such sale in the open market was a circumstance tending to show that the hay was good, as the plaintiff had right to show, though not called upon to show it, perhaps.

The same may be said as to the evidence of witness Hoge.

An assignment of error is as to witness Larrick in allowing him to say that he attempted to purchase some of the hay delivered to the Flat Top Company as No. 1 hay. This only went to prove—was only a mode of proving—that this hay was of good quality as called for by the contract. Surely there can be no solid objection to this.

The main point in this case is as to the right of rescission under the contract. These other matters touching the measure of damages and the evidence of Ellison, Hoge, and Larrick are inconsequential, cutting no important figure in this case, surely not ground for reversing a fair trial on the merits of the case doing justice. People contracting ought to live up to their contracts. It would surely be contrary to justice and law to allow the Flat Top Company, after this contract had been largely executed, with honest intent on the part of the Ellison Company to honestly execute it, to break it off for some bad hay in 1 car out of 200, especially when the Ellison Company asked pardon and took that car back and offered to replace it with another car of good hay. Counsel for the defendant do not base the right of rescission on anything but the presence of some bad hay in that one single car. The case leads us to say that there was no substantial breach of the contract on the part of the Ellison Company, and that the fact that hay was falling greatly in price was the inducement to the Flat Top Company to repudiate the contract, and not the breach of it by the Ellison Company.

We affirm the judgment of the circuit court.

KERFOOT v. DANDRIDGE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 9, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 870*)—REVIEW—INTERLOCUTORY DECREE—FINAL APPEAL.

A decree, prematurely entered, pending exceptions to a commissioner's report undisposed of, and which does not finally adjudicate the controversies between the parties to the cause is interlocutory, and not appealable, and a subsequent decree disposing of such exceptions, and finally adjudicating all matters in controversy, brings with it, for review on appeal, all errors in the former decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3487-3512; Dec. Dig. § 870.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County.

Appeal by John P. Kerfoot, as trustee, against A. S. Dandridge and others. Decree for plaintiff, and Hugh A. White, executor, and others, appeal. Affirmed.

Brown & Brown and Beckwith & Bushong, for appellants. Beltzhoover & Beltzhoover, for appellees devisees of Craven Trussell.

MILLER, J. This is a second appeal in this cause; the first was by Serena C. Dandridge, from a decree of March 9, 1898; opinion reported in 45 W. Va. 673, 31 S. E. 947. The present appeal is by Hugh S. White, executor of Blackburn Hughes, deceased, and J. W. Gardner, committee administrator of said Serena C. Dandridge, deceased, from a decree of October 29, 1907.

The decree now before us brought the cause on for hearing on the reports and supplemental report of the commissioner, to whom the cause had been referred, to state and settle the accounts in accordance with the decree and mandate of this court on the former appeal. Sundry exceptions to said reports, by Craven Trussell's executor, were sustained, because of errors therein, and because said reports, in the opinion of the court, did not "trace the full disposition of the fund so as to enable the court to arrive at a correct conclusion and disposition of the case." Without, however, committing the cause to the commissioner, the court, of its own motion, adopted and filed, in lieu of a report by a commissioner, a "Detailed Statement," made by counsel for the heirs at law of said Craven Trussell, deceased. Finding from this statement that there was due Sarah P. Hughes, deceased, the sum of seven hundred and twenty-eight dollars and twenty-nine cents, and that said Serena C. Dandridge, to whom, by decree of May 18, 1901, the last distribution had been made, had been overpaid seven hundred and five dollars, it was decreed that Hugh S. White, executor of Blackburn Hughes, deceased, sole distributee of said Sarah P. Hughes, deceased, recover of J. W. Gardner, sheriff, committee, and administrator of said Serena C. Dandridge, deceased, the sum so overpaid her, to be credited on the sum so found due said Sarah P. Hughes, leaving a balance due her of ninety three dollars and twenty-nine cents, and that said White, executor, should recover from each of the five several heirs of said Craven Trussell, deceased, to whose executors, by decree of December 2, 1903, the last preceding distribution had been made, the sum of eighteen dollars and sixty-six cents, to make up said balance.

The first point of error relied on by counsel for the estate of Serena C. Dandridge is, that the decree appealed from deprives that estate of the benefits of a decree adjudicating the rights of decedent, of May 28, 1901. The latter decree, although it brought the cause on to be heard on the reports of said Green, commissioner, and the several exceptions thereto, sustained by the decree now before us, in terms reserved the questions presented by said exceptions; but finding "from the orders entered in the cause and from the reports of the special commissioner of sale, showing the amount of moneys that have come into the cause," that there was due said Serena C. Dandridge "from the fund in the cause an amount greatly in excess of her purchase money bond," then held by special commissioner Trapnell, dated October 13, 1891, for seven hundred and ninety three dollars and ninety-four cents, it was thereby decreed, that said special commissioner "do cancel said bond, and deliver the same," to her or her attorneys, and that he also "execute and deliver" to her "a deed for the land purchased by her in this cause."

By the same decree the cause was "again referred to commissioner T. C. Green," and who was directed thereby to report: First, the amount due Hugh S. White, executor of Blackburn Hughes, deceased, sole distributee of said Sarah P. Hughes, deceased, after charging her interest with all debts chargeable thereto; second, the amount of the payments, with interest on the same, on account of the interest of A. S. Dandridge, Jr., and L. P. Dandridge, in excess of their share, and to whom such excessive payments were made; stating further such other matters as he might deem pertinent, or that any party should require.

That decree of May 28, 1901, was never appealed from. Was it final or appealable as to the matters adjudicated against the estate of Serena C. Dandridge, in the decree now before us? If so, the latter decree is erroneous, and should be reversed. That decree did find, not upon the reports of commissioner Green, and the pending exceptions thereto, but "from orders entered" and "reports of the special commissioner of sale" that there was then due Miss Dandridge from the fund in the cause an amount greatly in excess of her purchase money bond, and ordered her bond canceled and surrendered to her, and that a deed be made to her by the special commissioner. But the court did not find what amount was due her as distributee, nor undertake to finally adjust and settle the accounts between the distributees and creditors, and to which the exceptions to the reports of commissioner Green related. Some of these exceptions related particularly to errors and omissions in the account of Serena C. Dandridge, affecting seriously the rights of other distributees. True the decree does direct cancellation of her bond, and that a deed be made, but it recommends the cause to the commissioner, assuming perhaps, that after crediting her with her distributive share, and deducting debts for which she was liable, a balance would be due her as distributee. The sale to her had already been confirmed, and on payment of all purchase money she was entitled to cancellation and surrender of her bond, and to a deed; but it appears from the decree that she in fact paid nothing on the bond cancelled, unless the court rightfully determined that she was entitled as distributee to an amount in excess of her bond. Whether she was or not, and how much, was a question, in part at least, left undecided by the decree. Besides the record then showed that all, or practically all, of the money had been distributed, except the balance due from Miss Dandridge on her bond, and that on a proper adjustment of the accounts between distributees a very considerable sum was due to the estate of Sarah P. Hughes, and that excessive payments had been made to some of the other distributees, or their credits. How can it be said then that this decree adjudicated or settled all matters in difference between the parties, or the principles thereof, controlling the court in the decree now under review? Could appellees have appealed from that decree? We do not think so; it did not finally dispose of their rights. In Garrett v. Bradford, 28 Grat. (Va.) 609, it was decided that a decree which overruled certain exceptions, and confirmed the report of a commissioner, as to the questions involved in those exceptions, but recommitted the report as to matters involved in other exceptions, was nevertheless a decree settling the principles of the cause as to the questions involved in the exceptions overruled and from which an appeal would lie. But Judge Snyder, in Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778, 783, referring to this decision says: "I am very doubtful whether such a decree would be considered appealable in this state." Citing Laidley v. Kline, 21 W. Va. 21. The decree in the latter case, did not differ materially from that in the Virginia case. It involved exceptions to a commissioner's report, overruled and sustained, and did not, we think, differ very materially in this respect from the decree we are considering, except that it contained no order of recommittal. Judge Snyder says of it: "This decree shows on its face that it does not adjudicate the principles of the entire cause nor is it otherwise such a decree as can be appealed from to this court. The record here shows no other decree in the cause, but it does show that a number of claims other than those of the appellants were reported by the commissioner, and as those claims were in no manner considered or passed upon by the court, and the commissioner's report not having been confirmed, the appeal must be dismissed as prematurely and improvidently awarded." In Smith v. Evans, 42 W. Va. 352, 26 S. E. 347, the point decided was, that a decree prematurely entered, pending a commissioner's report undisposed of, and which does not finally adjudicate the controversies between the parties to the cause, is interlocutory, and not appealable. Citing Shirey

v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. 914; Hill v. Als, 27 W. Va. 215; Laidley v. Kline, supra; and Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680. The decree in Smith v. Evans adjudged that the bill "in so far as it is to be regarded and taken as a creditors' bill, or as a bill for the specific performance of a contract is dismissed; but, on motion of plaintiff, the bill is retained as to the feature of advancements." This court regarded the bill neither a creditors' bill, nor one for specific performance, but one to ascertain and distribute the estate of a decedent, and held that the decree in no wise adjudicated the merits of the cause, but left the merits wholly unadjudicated. The case of Shirey v. Musgrave is a leading case; it reviews most of the prior decisions. A balance of purchase money different from that found by a commissioner was decreed against Musgrave, and each party was decreed to pay his own costs, the court declining to then act upon the commissioner's report, and reserving all other questions.

It was said of that decree, as it may be said of the decree now before us, that it is only necessary to understand the object of the suit, and the matter which it called upon the court to determine, to see that among the questions reserved, are some of the most important principles of the cause, and of course the decree is not appealable. The point of the syllabus applicable here is, that the statute authorizing an appeal, where there is a decree adjudicating the principles of the case, is available only where the decree appealed from adjudicates all questions raised in the cause by pleadings or otherwise. Other cases illustrating the application of the rule, and which we think justify our conclusion as to the decree of May 28, 1901, are referred to in the cases already cited.

It follows, that if that decree was not an appealable decree, the statute of limitations does not apply, and that, on principles announced in Keck v. Allender, 42 W. Va. 420, 26 S. E. 437, Smith v. Evans, and Laidley v. Kline, supra, the court below, regardless of that decree, had jurisdiction to finally adjust and adjudicate the accounts between the parties, and that all matters not finally adjudicated and disposed of by that decree are now before us for review on the present appeal.

This brings us to the consideration of the alleged errors in the decree of October 29, 1907. Was there error in the decree of May 28, 1901, which the court below could correct by that decree? Though relying on the conclusiveness of that decree, as to the status of the account of Miss Dandridge, counsel nevertheless insist there was no error in her favor therein, or prejudicial to the rights of the other distributees. On the contrary they insist that the record demonstrably shows that decree to have been clearly right. They undertake to show, by reference to particular items, errors and omissions in the reports of commissioners, and dealt with in the present and in prior decrees, which, when readjusted according to their views, will show the status of the account of Miss Dandridge practically as recited in the decree of May 28, 1901, and said "Detailed Statement" correspondingly erroneous. Reference is first made to disbursements on account of the so called Porter debt; the first, by decree of December 4, 1883, of $1,822.00; the second, by decree of March 1, 1886, of $697.66; the third, by decree of May 20, 1887, of $1,200.00; the fourth, by decree of December 12, 1889, balance, $53.79. As we understand counsel, the argument, based on these decrees of disbursement is, that in none of them, except the last, did the court undertake to apportion the several payments on debts among the several distributees liable therefor, but directed payment out of the common fund in the hands of the special commissioners; wherefore, they say, there is nothing in the record negating their theory, that the court may have devoted the dower interest of Mrs. Serena C. Dandridge, Sr., wife of Adam S. Dandridge, Sr., in these funds, to the payment of those debts. Our reply, in part, is, that we can not see from the records before us that this dower money was in fact so applied; or that the decree now under review is erroneous or correctible in this particular. Counsel did not bring up the entire record, either on this appeal, or on the former appeal. On the former appeal it was assumed, we think justifiably, though we are criticised by counsel for having done so, that the court below, and distinguished counsel, would not undertake to distribute funds to creditors, before a decree adjudicating the principles of the cause, and fixing determinately the rights of the parties, the failure to do which has caused all the trouble encountered on this and on the former appeal. Apropos to the argument relating to the dower money, we find by reference to the report of commissioner Moore, in the record of the former appeal, that disbursements were made on account of the Porter debt, and on other debts, prior to December 4, 1883, which may have absorbed all the dower money.

Another item, equally affected by the argument based on the appropriation of the dower money, is the item of $198.37, a portion of the debt of the First National Bank of Jefferson, charged against the estate of Miss Dandridge, disbursed under an order of June 11, 1881. But it is also argued that it appears from the record that this bank obtained a judgment against Lemuel P., A. Stephen, and Serena C. Dandridge, jointly, in the order named, and that, without other evidence of the fact, the court should assume, from the order in which defendants were named in the judgment and petition filed, that Serena C. Dandridge was the last endorser on the note sued on, and lastly liable, and only liable, if at all, in the event the distributable shares of the two other judgment debtors should be found insufficient to discharge the debt. Neither the note nor the judgment are found in the record. It would be going too far, we think, to find error in a decree on such a record. We can not do so.

A complete answer, we think, to the argument relating to all disbursements made prior to or subsequent to May, 1885, is that presented by counsel for appellees, namely, that by decree of May 26, 1885, the court undertook to and did adjudicate the rights of the parties, fixing the amounts of the various debts decreed against the several distributees, and their priorities, and the proportions in which they were respectively liable, and this, so far as the record shows, was the only decree that did so. This decree we understand is the basis of the "Detailed Statement" of counsel, adopted in lieu of a commissioner's report, and of the final decree of October 29, 1907. That decree adjudged, with respect to the Porter debt and other debts with which the account of Serena C. Dandridge, Jr., should be charged as distributee, that the executors of said Porter be paid the sum of sixteen hundred and sixty-four dollars and fifty-seven cents, with interest, out of the distributive shares of A. S. Dandridge, A. S. Dandridge, Jr., E. P. Dandridge, L. P. Dandridge, Serena C. Dandridge, and Sallie P. Dandridge, and adjudged the same to be a second lien as to E. P. Dandridge and Serena C. Dandridge, a thirteenth lien as to A. S. Dandridge, and a sixteenth lien as to L. P. Dandridge, the Serena C. Dandridge, referred to, being Serena C. Dandridge, Jr. And with respect to the debt of the National Bank of Martinsburg, it was decreed that the sum of five hundred and twenty-four dollars and forty-six cents, found due to it, be paid out of the interest of Lemuel P. Dandridge, A. Stephen Dandridge, Jr., and Serena C. Dandridge. How can we go back of this decree to readjust accounts as between distributees, or creditors? We cannot do so. The rules and principles which counsel invoke to support the finality of the decree of May 28, 1901, inapplicable to it, are applicable to the decree of 1885, and preclude us from reconsidering on this appeal any errors therein.

The only other point of error relied on and covered by the "Detailed Statement," and the decree appealed from, relates to the item of $194.19, charged against the account of Miss Dandridge, her one-third share of the judgment of the National Bank of Martinsburg. It is conceded that the decree of May 26, 1885, makes this debt a charge and lien upon the distributive share of Miss Dandridge, without distinction as to priority; but it is claimed that because the decree of distribution of March 1, 1886, provides that the sum of $582.58 be paid said bank in full of its debt, and directs that $529.22 thereof be paid out of the interest of L. P. Dandridge, and $53.36, out of the interest of A. S. Dandridge, Jr., in apparent modification of the prior decree of May 26, 1885, no part of that sum can be charged against the interest of Miss Dandridge. Why this apportionment was made by the decree of March 1, 1886, is not apparent. It is in conflict with the final decree of May 26, 1885; and a very pertinent fact about that decree is that while it fixes the amounts and priorities of the other debts decreed against the several distributive shares of the distributees, it decrees this debt of the National Bank of Martinsburg, against Lemuel P., A. Stephen, Jr., and Serena C. Dandridge jointly, without priority as to liability. That decree, we think, fixed the status of the parties, and justified the court in final settlement, in charging the estate of Miss Dandridge with her one third proportion of that debt. At all events we are unable to see error justifying reversal of the decree on that ground.

This we believe disposes of all errors assigned. Great inequalities may exist in the distribution of the funds disposed of in this cause; if so, this court is not responsible for them, the fault must be chargeable to those who had the management of the cause in the court below. It is much to be regretted that so little attention was given to necessary details, and that the record has become so involved in confusion that even and exact justice cannot be administered. To now attempt to correct supposed errors in the decree appealed from would be a hopeless undertaking. Finding no error therein we affirm the decree below.

PEOPLE'S NAT. BANK v. BURDETT, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 9, 1911.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 142*)—SETTING ASIDE—APPEARANCE OF UNKNOWN DEFENDANT.

The right of a party to a suit or action, proceeded against as an unknown party or non-resident defendant, to appear and make defense, within the time, in the manner and upon the conditions, prescribed by section 14 of chapter 124 and section 25 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1906, is absolute, and the duty of the court to admit him, for such purpose, upon showing a proper status and compliance with the conditions, ministerial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 253; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 4*)—WHEN GRANTED—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT.

Mandamus lies to enforce such right, when it has been denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 9-34; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§ 14*)—WRIT FOR REHEARING OF JUDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

The filing of a proper petition for rehearing, under said sections, is a demand for such right, and rejection thereof by the court a default or refusal, sufficient for an application for a mandamus to compel enforcement thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 44-46; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 151*)—NONRESIDENT DEFENDANT—BOND FOR COSTS—PETITION—FILING.

Neither the bond for costs, required by said provisions, nor the defenses of the applicant for admission, need be filed or tendered with such petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

Robinson, J., dissenting.

Petition by the People's National Bank for a writ of mandamus to S. C. Burdett, Judge. Writ awarded.

Morgan Owen and E. B. Dyer, for petitioner. J. W. Kennedy and J. F. Cork, for respondent.

POFFENBARGER, J. Alleging rejection of its petition to have certain chancery causes reheard as to it, agreeably to the provisions of section 14 of chapter 124 and section 25 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1906, the plaintiff, a nonresident party to said cause, proceeded against by order of publication, asks a writ of mandamus to compel the circuit court of Kanawha county to permit it to make defense to said suits.

The second equity suit was one to quiet title to land, and the plaintiff here claims to have had an interest or right respecting the subject-matter thereof. Necessity therefor grew out of failure to make the applicant here and other interested persons parties to the previous suit, the purpose of which was enforcement of a vendor's lien. Edward Gebhart conveyed the land, affected by these suits, to S. W. Shrader, retaining a vendor's lien for $12,000. Shrader sold and conveyed part of the surface of the land and all the coal thereunder to the Southern Coal & Coke Company. That company executed a deed of trust on its purchase to the Kanawha Banking & Trust Company, to secure an issue of bonds, amounting to $90,000. To obtain satisfaction of his lien for the original purchase money, Gebhart brought a suit to enforce it, inadvertently overlooking the deed of trust. Neither the trustee nor the bondholders were made parties. Having procured a decree of sale of the property, he became the purchaser. To cure the defect, occasioned by the omission of parties, he brought a second suit, to which he made the trustee a party by name and the holders of the bonds as unknown persons interested in the cause, and sought, by way of alternative relief, confirmation of his title by foreclosure of the equities of the parties interested under the deed of trust, redemption of the land by payment of his lien, or a resale thereof. The trustee answered, denying any duty on its part to pay the debt or, in any way, protect the rights of the bondholders, and, in default of any appearance by the bondholders or defense of any kind, a decree confirming the title of the plaintiff was entered.

Claiming to be the owner of five of the bonds, secured by the deed of trust, the plaintiff here tendered its said petition in the circuit court, and an order was entered, filing the same and requiring notice of a hearing thereon to be given to the plaintiff in said chancery causes. On the day so fixed, the latter appeared and demurred to the petition, on the ground, among others, that it did not show sufficient interest in the petitioner. An attack upon the petition for indefiniteness as to the identity of the bonds and the date of the acquisition thereof having been made, the petitioner tendered and filed an affidavit, showing the same had been acquired before the institution of said second suit. Thereupon the court dismissed the petition.

[1] The right accorded by the statutory provisions under which the petition was filed in the circuit court is to make defense. It is a limitation of the power conferred upon a plaintiff to obtain relief in judicial proceedings without actual service of process upon the defendant. A judgment or decree without such process is left open to a right of review in the trial court, upon the application therefor within the time prescribed by the statute. The extent and method or mode of review is also prescribed. The applicant is admitted to make defense against the judgment or decree "as if he had appeared" in the case before the same was rendered, except that the title of any bona fide purchaser to any property, real or personal, sold in the proceedings, shall not be brought in question or impeached. The plain object of the statute is to give the applicant a day in court, agreeably to the fundamental principle of all judicial proceedings. It is a right to go into the case, not merely to review for error, apparent upon the face of the record, but also to set up and assert any defense which the party might have made, if he had been personally served with process and appeared in the action or suit. Duty v. Sprinkle, 64 W. Va. 39, 60 S. E. 882. By the great weight of authority throughout the country, the right to admission into the cause for such purpose is held to be an absolute right which the court cannot deny. Johnson v. Ludwick, 58 W. Va. 464, 52 S. E. 489; Buskirk v. Ferrell, 51 W. Va. 198, 41 S. E. 123; Taylor & Co. v. Hanson, 36 Ark. 591; 1 Black, Judg. 813; Freeman, Judg. § 105; Boeing v. McKinley, 44 Minn. 392, 46 N. W. 766; Brown v. Brown, 86 Tenn. 277, 6 S. W. 869, 7 S. W. 640.

From this conclusion it follows necessarily that the trial court has no discretion or power to deny the prayer of the petition, if the applicant shows himself to have been an unknown party or other defendant, within the meaning of the statutory provisions. The statute says that, on giving security for costs, he shall be admitted to make defense. It is therefore mandatory in form, and the nature of the right, as already defined, makes it one for denial of any discretion. It is fundamental in character. The right to defend is like a right to property or liberty. Denial or delay thereof may be highly or irretrievably injurious and prejudicial. Hence we are clearly of the opinion that the duty of the court upon such an application is ministerial. This construction protects the interest of the applicant and does the parties resisting the application no injury or wrong, in the legal sense of the terms. It takes away from them nothing the law has given. All rights acquired by the judgment or decree were subject to this reserved right in the defendant.

[2] A refusal or denial of this right is no doubt correctible by an appeal; but, in this state, we do not deny an extraordinary remedy in a proper case, merely because the party may avail himself of another remedy. Though a void judgment may be reversed by a writ of error, prohibition lies to prevent execution thereof. In King v. Mason, 60 W. Va. 607, 56 S. E. 377, the wrong complained of could have been redressed by an appeal, without any doubt whatever. Nevertheless this court awarded a mandamus. This writ does not lie to correct error; but it does lie in all cases to compel and enforce performance of ministerial duties. The test, therefore, is not whether a right may be obtained by some other remedy, but whether it is of such character as brings it within the province of the remedy by mandamus. The slow process of appellate review is not adequate to the vindication or enforcement of absolute rights such as the one involved here. The delay incident to that sort of procedure in such cases is not only useless, but also prejudicial and injurious. For that reason, they are within the remedy by mandamus, although, if the party see fit to incur the delay and the risk of injury, he may sometimes have relief by appellate procedure. We think the appropriateness of the remedy is clear beyond doubt.

Whether the applicant is entitled to make defense, and therefore within the statutory provisions here under consideration, is a preliminary question and does not make the duty of the court discretionary in passing upon the application. The determination of that question involves an inquiry as to the status of the applicant only, and does not extend to matters of defense in the suit. If such an inquiry barred the remedy by mandamus, it would wholly destroy it, for, in every instance of demand for the performance of a ministerial duty, the party upon whom the demand is made, whether a court or a purely ministerial officer, must make such an inquiry. Hence it is manifest that necessity for such inquiry and determination of preliminary facts does not make the duty judicial or discretionary.

[4] Objection is made here to the bond for costs, tendered with the petition. We do not think the statute requires it to be tendered or filed with the petition. It must be filed before the applicant is admitted to make defense; but the statute does not require it to be tendered or filed with the petition. The facts disclosed by the petition and alternative writ and return show clearly that no bond would have been accepted by the court. The sufficiency of the bond was not in question, and we do not pass upon it.

[3] The court below dismissed the petition and denied admission to make defense under the impression that the petitioner had shown no right to do so. In this view we cannot concur. It was proceeded against as a party and the petition, together with the affidavit, which may be treated as an amendment thereof, clearly show that the petitioner was a holder of five bonds at the time the suit was instituted, and therefore a party among those designated in the bill as "the unknown owners of those certain bonds" in the bill mentioned and described.

The remaining contention is that the plaintiff here did not properly demand admission as a party to the cause, because it tendered no defense thereto. In other words, it did not offer to demur to the bill, or tender an answer or otherwise present defenses, which the court refused to admit. This amounts to denial of a sufficient demand on the part of the plaintiff and default on the part of the court. This position is, in our opinion, wholly untenable. The beneficiary of the decree in the cause, by his demurrer to the petition and demand that it be stricken from the files, virtually asked the court to refuse to entertain such defenses, and the court, by its dismissal of the petition, clearly signified its determination not to entertain them. We think the order showing all this makes a plain case of demand and refusal.

For these reasons, the peremptory writ of mandamus asked for will be awarded.

KIRTLEY v. CABELL COUNTY COURT.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 9, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 180*)—NOTICE TO LANDOWNER.

A county court has no warrant in law to order that a land owner be proceeded against by a suit for condemnation of a right of way for a proposed road through his land, and later to order that a road be built thereon, without first giving him notice to appear and show cause against the road undertaking.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 180*)—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—NOTICE TO LANDOWNERS.

Proceedings of a county court for the establishment of a road, had without notice to the owner of the land proposed to be taken as prescribed by Code 1906, c. 43, § 36, and in which no opportunity was afforded him to be heard before an order directing a condemnation suit against his land, are erroneous, illegal, and reversible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 489; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

3. MOTIONS (§ 7*)—COUNTY COURTS—SPECIAL SESSION—NOTICE.

An order of a county court made at a special session is a mere nullity if the record does not show that the court acquired jurisdiction to make the order by the promulgation of the notice of the special session as required by law and the inclusion in that notice of the subject to which the order pertains.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Motions, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Sidney Kirtley against the County Court of Cabell County. Judgment rendered for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Blackwood & Saunders, for plaintiff in error. Geo. S. Wallace and Jean F. Smith, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. Kirtley seeks the reversal of proceedings purporting to establish a road through his land.

The county court, on a petition of citizens, appointed viewers to go on the land and make a report on the proposed road. When the viewers made their report, the county court, without the notice to parties for which the statute provides, and without any appearance by Kirtley, whose land was to be taken, immediately ordered that the prosecuting attorney institute proceedings for the condemnation of that part of Kirtley's land which it was proposed to take for the road. At a later term, Kirtley appeared and moved that this order be set aside, on the ground that the county court was without jurisdiction to make it, since no notice and opportunity to be heard had been given him. The county court overruled this motion, refused to set aside the order, and Kirtley saved an exception on the record. At a still later term, a special one, the county court ordered that the road be built, and this order was followed at another term by one directing that Kirtley remove the fencing on the land which the county court was assuming to take. From these proceedings Kirtley obtained an appeal to the circuit court. On the appeal, a so-called plea was filed on behalf of the county court, in the nature of a motion to dismiss the appeal. That plea set up the record of the condemnation proceedings that had been carried to a termination in the circuit court over the continued protest and exception of Kirtley as a party thereto. This record of the condemnation proceedings showed that the right of way had been condemned and a judgment entered in Kirtley's favor for the amount of compensation found. The circuit court dismissed Kirtley's appeal, and thereafter he obtained the writ of error now before us.

It is proper to observe that the writ of error calls for a review of the proceedings in the county court only. The appeal to the circuit court, which has been carried here by writ of error, relates alone to the orders of the county court. We have before us only what the circuit court had on appeal. We must say whether the circuit court erred in dismissing the appeal, and in order to determine that question must necessarily act upon the record of the county court just as the circuit court should have done. The proceedings had in the condemnation case in the circuit court are, therefore, not before us for review, because they were not brought before the circuit court for review by the appeal. They were no part of the proceedings appealed from, for they were not proceedings in the county court.

The circuit court could not properly pass on the appeal by a reference to what had been done in the condemnation suit. The so-called plea invoked the record of the suit in condemnation to justify a dismissal of the appeal. But as the condemnation proceedings were not a part of the record appealed from, they could have no proper part in determining the case on appeal. The question to be determined on the appeal was simply and solely whether the county court erred in the orders for the establishment of the road, and not whether the circuit court acted properly in the condemnation case which the county court may have erroneously directed to be instituted and prosecuted in furtherance of erroneous and illegal initial proceedings. So we have only to do with the propriety of the order of the county court directing the institution of the condemnation suit, and the other orders which followed that one in relation to the establishment of the road. A review of the regularity of the proceedings in the condemnation suit can only properly come by a writ of error in that particular case.

It is submitted that the question to be determined is a moot one, and that the writ of error should be dismissed for that reason. The county court claims that it has shown by the so-called plea to the appeal that a road has been established through Kirtley's land by the condemnation proceedings, and that, therefore, a reversal of the county court proceedings can avail nothing. It claims that the road is on the land by the force of the condemnation and must stay there whatever we may do with the proceedings that were had in the county court. But the answer to all this contention is that a county road cannot be established by a condemnation suit. The statute has not prescribed that method of establishing a public road. It has prescribed condemnation proceedings solely for the acquiring of land and the ascertainment of compensation, and only when it becomes necessary to resort thereto. The establishment of the road is a distinct and primary thing. The county court must do the establishing; that court must give to the proposed road a legal status as a public road. The circuit court may simply lend its powers for the taking of land and for the ascertainment of compensation for the land taken, so that the county court may perfect the legal status of the road. But if a proposed way is not regularly made a public road by orders of the county court, no mere condemnation of the land comprising the proposed way can ever make it such. That condemnation may erroneously vest title to the easement in the public, but it cannot give the land taken the legal status of a public road.

Let us repeat that the sole question presented is one which comes primarily from the county court and is based alone on the record of that court. It is this: Did the county court have warrant in law to order that Kirtley be proceeded against by a suit for the condemnation of a right of way through his land, and later to order that a road be built through his land, without first giving him notice to come in and show cause against the making of such orders?

The proceedings which we must review are anomalous. And they are quite as erroneous as they are anomalous. The plainly prescribed statutory procedure for the establishment of a road has not been followed. The land owner has had no opportunity to be heard.

[1] It was error for the county court to order the institution of the proceedings for condemnation, before notice to Kirtley to appear and show cause against the establishment of the proposed road. An opportunity to correct the error was given the county court when Kirtley appeared, contesting the jurisdiction, and asked that the order be set aside. But again the county court erred in denying this motion. The statute expressly provides that the land owner shall be given notice to show cause against "the proposed work"; that is, to show cause why a road should not be established through his land. Code 1906, c. 43, § 38. It also plainly provides that there shall be a hearing of the land owner, if he appears in answer to the notice, and on such hearing a decision to undertake the establishment of the road, as well as a failure to agree with the land owner as to compensation for the land to be taken, before proceedings to take the land and to ascertain compensation therefor are warranted. Code 1906, c. 43, § 38. [2] It cannot be determined whether proceedings to take the land and to ascertain compensation are warranted until the land owner is called in to answer the proceedings for the establishment of the road. If the land owner is given the notice required, he may prove to the county court that the establishment of the proposed road should not be undertaken, or he may agree readily as to compensation, and thus in either event the necessity for condemnation proceedings would be wholly precluded. But if the land owner is given no opportunity to be heard, how can the county court determine properly that proceedings to take the land and to ascertain compensation are at all necessary? The statute gives no power to the county court to institute proceedings in condemnation until they have heard the land owner, or have given him an opportunity to be heard. The right of the land owner to show cause against the institution of condemnation proceedings cannot be denied him. True, after the ascertainment of compensation in a case where the proceedings are warranted and properly carried on, the county court may abandon the work of establishing the road which it has decided to undertake; but, this right to abandon the work does not preclude the necessity for notice at the very initial steps. In the case at hand, the county court did not abandon the work, but carried the undertaking through without the initial notice to which Kirtley was entitled. It decided that he should be brought into a condemnation case, before it had taken the steps to ascertain that such a case would be justified or even necessary. Kirtley had the right to an opportunity to show that the road should not be undertaken as proposed, and that proceedings to take the land were therefore not warranted. He at least had the right to an opportunity to show that the proceedings were not necessary. If notice had been given him, he might have shown that he was willing for the land to be taken and to agree on the compensation therefor. Regardless of his rights, the county court subjected him to proceedings in the circuit court, the propriety of which, and the necessity for the same, the county court had not determined in the manner provided by law. All this erroneous action was reviewable on the appeal and should have been reversed. Plainly the circuit court erred in dismissing the appeal and not reversing the order which unlawfully subjected Kirtley to condemnation proceedings.

Proceedings in the county court for the establishment of a road are indeed proceedings to take the land which is necessary for the road. They are proceedings to divest the land owner of rights. Certainly no material step can be taken to divest one of his rights without notice. "No man shall be condemned unheard." This principle is fundamental. The county court cannot, for road purposes, divest the land owner's title, unless the owner is given an opportunity to be heard against the establishment of the road. He has the right primarily to resist the taking of his land by showing that the road is wholly unnecessary and should not be established, or by showing any other pertinent fact that will save his land from the public use. Coffman v. Griffin, 17 W. Va., at page 184. This right has been safeguarded to him by the statute. The statute must be strictly followed, otherwise the land owner's title is not divested for the public use. In commenting on the same provisions of the statute which we are now considering, Judge Green said: "If these provisions for the protection and benefit of the land-owner are not strictly complied with, the proceedings will be ineffectual to divest the land-owner's title. They are not only conditions precedent, which must be complied with, before the land-owner's property can be disturbed; but the party seeking to divest him of his right of property against his will must show affirmatively such compliance with these conditions." Herron v. Carson, 26 W. Va. 62.

We need not say what is the effect of the unauthorized proceedings in condemnation against Kirtley's land. That question does not properly arise upon the record to which we may look. It suffices to say that the condemnation proceedings, carried on without the previous steps prescribed by the statute to warrant them, do not legally establish a road on the land.

[3] The order of the county court which embodies its final decision that the road be established is erroneous, for reasons additional to the fact that the proceedings leading to that order are illegal and invalid. The order was made at a special session of the county court. The record does not show that the county court had jurisdiction to make the order at that special term. The record shows nothing as to the purposes for which the special session was called, and nothing as to the manner of giving notice of the special session if any was given. The holding in Mayer v. Adams, 27 W. Va. 244, applies. The order establishing the road must be regarded as a nullity.

The judgment of the circuit court dismissing the appeal will be reversed; and this court will enter the judgment which the circuit court should have entered in the premises. There will be judgment here that the order of the county court for the institution of condemnation proceedings, the order for the establishment of the road, and the order for the removal of fences by the land owner be wholly reversed, set aside, and held for naught; and that the case be remanded to the county court to be there proceeded in according to the statute relating to proceedings for the establishment of roads.

MYLIUS v. RAINE-ANDREW LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 9, 1911.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—ESTABLISHMENT.

In the trial of an action, involving title to land, dependent upon the location of boundary lines and application of the title papers to their subject-matter, it is not error to instruct the jury to give controlling influence to lines and corners marked upon the ground and identified, in so far as the lines were actually surveyed, and to courses and distances, in those instances in which the lines were not actually surveyed nor marked upon the ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-41; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—ASCERTAINMENT.

It appearing that a large tract of land was subdivided into a number of lots and a plat thereof made, in accordance with which deeds were executed, and which is referred to in the deeds for the description of the lots, and that the exterior lines were only partially surveyed and only a few of the interior lines actually run, and there is inconsistency between the plat and some of the lines so surveyed, the court may properly instruct the jury that, in locating any lot, it is to be governed and controlled by the plat, except in so far as it is in conflict with the lines actually run and marked upon the ground.

3. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Instructions to a jury must be broad enough in their scope and effect to present all material phases of the issue to which they relate. By whomsoever prepared, they are the instructions of the court, and, if they obviously tend to mislead the jury by reason of their narrowness, though correct as to one or more phases of the case developed by the evidence, it is error to give them.

4. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

On the trial of an issue as to which there is conflict in the evidence, the instructions, if any, must submit the conflicting theories the evidence tends to prove. Presentation of one of them and silence as to the other are tantamount to a comment on the weight of the evidence.

5. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Instructions confined to a subsidiary and inconclusive issue, founded upon the evidence, and ignoring the direct and vital issue, tend to mislead the jury and cannot properly be given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

6. DEEDS (§ 111*)—CONSTRUCTION—INCONSISTENT DESCRIPTION.

If a deed contain a general description of property, conforming to the manifest intention of the parties, as shown by the situation and circumstances surrounding them and the purpose they had in view, and also another description, clearly inconsistent with such circumstances and purpose, and false in that it applies wholly or partially to property not owned by the grantor, nor intended to be conveyed by him, but already owned by the grantee and not intended to be purchased by him, such latter description must be rejected as false and as having been inserted in the deed by accident or mistake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 809-815; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

7. DEEDS (§ 119*)—CONSTRUCTION—QUESTION FOR COURT.

The construction of a deed, not dependent in any way upon extrinsic evidence, and also of a deed dependent upon extrinsic evidence, when the facts are undisputed, is a question for the court and not for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 842, 843; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

8. BOUNDARIES (§ 33*)—ESTABLISHMENT—BURDEN OF PROOF—CLAIMANT UNDER INCLUSIVE GRANT.

The rule requiring a claimant under an inclusive grant to show that the land in controversy lies without the boundaries of the land excepted from the grant, as having been previously surveyed, as well as within the boundaries of the grant, has no application, if the grant has been subsequently forfeited for nonentry for taxation and sold in a judicial proceeding, at the instance of a commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands, as a whole, and without exception of any portion thereof, and it does not appear that the excepted lands were granted between the date of the inclusive grant and the date of the commissioner's deed.

9. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 186*)—ILLEGAL SALE OF WASTE AND UNAPPROPRIATED LANDS—STATUTES.

By virtue of the provisions of section 19 of chapter 105 of the Code of 1906, a deed made, by a commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands, under such judicial proceeding, constitutes a new grant by the state, passing to the grantee all right and title of the state to the land, whether held by reason of its never having been previously granted, or its subsequent acquisition by forfeiture or purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 186.*]

10. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 186*)—ILLEGAL SALE OF WASTE AND UNAPPROPRIATED LANDS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Deeds made by commissioners of school lands, ineffectual to pass title to waste and unappropriated lands, for want of legislative authority to dispose of them in the manner in which forfeited lands were sold, are validated by section 19 of chapter 105 of the Code of 1906.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 186.*]

11. EVIDENCE (§ 506*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—SUBJECTS OF EXPERT EVIDENCE—LOCATION OF BOUNDARY LINE.

The opinion of a surveyor as to the true location of a boundary line is inadmissible as evidence.

12. BOUNDARIES (§ 35*)—ASCERTAINMENT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

If, in an action involving title to land, admissions and conduct of one of the parties, relating to locations and boundary lines, are relied upon, it is not error to permit him to introduce an agreement with a third party, concerning the land, which tends to nullify the effect of such admissions and conduct.

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.
Action by Charles E. Mylius against the Raine-Andrew Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Fred O. Blue, C. H. Scott, and Harding & Harding, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Maxwell and D. H. Hill Arnold, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. Charles E. Mylius recovered a judgment against the Raine-Andrew Lumber Company, a corporation, for $8,000, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, in the circuit court of Randolph county, which has been brought here for review on a writ of error.

The declaration charges the cutting and carrying away of a large amount of timber, and the defense is want of title in the plaintiff to the land on which the timber grew. The question for determination, therefore, is as completely one of title as if this were an action of ejectment. A large tract of land, 19,000 acres, was granted by the commonwealth of Virginia to Henry Phillips September 22, 1795. Having become forfeited for nonentry for taxation, prior to the year 1840, it was sold, as forfeited land, under judicial proceedings regularly had, so far as the record shows; but, before sale, it was divided, by the commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands, into 23 lots, numbered from 1 to 23, respectively. In making this division, the commissioner actually ran some of the lines, but others were not run, and some lots were entirely, and others partially, platted on paper, without actual survey, and all were sold according to the plat. L. D. Morrall became the purchaser of lots Nos. 11, 12, 14, 15, 22, and 23, containing, respectively, 800, 1,000, 500, 800, 540 and 921 acres and John Wyatt purchased, among others, lot No. 13, and these sales were confirmed and deeds made, referring to the plat. Lots Nos. 11 and 15 passed to Baker Bros. by successive conveyances prior to 1879. E. D. Parren, prior to 1875, became the owner of lots Nos. 14 and 22. The title to these last two lots was forfeited and sold, under judicial proceedings, on March 27, 1876, one Isaac Baker becoming the purchaser of lot No. 14, and T. J. Arnold of 848 acres, part of lot No. 22, adjoining lot No. 14. The Bakers, having become owners of lots Nos. 11, 14, and 15 prior to August, 1879, conveyed the same to Charles E. Mylius and others. Afterwards, Kupfer and Farnsworth became interested in these lands. Mylius, by a partition deed dated March 1, 1891, conveyed to Kupfer 748 acres out of the northern ends of lots Nos. 14 and 15; the southern line of this conveyance extending east and west across the same, and he having previously conveyed to Kupfer an undivided one-fourth of lots Nos. 11, 14, 15, and 20. He, Farnsworth, and Mylius, by deed dated June 1, 1898, partitioned the same, and Farnsworth thereby became sole owner of 495 acres, cut off of the southern end of lot No. 11, and Mylius and Kupfer owners of the residue of lot No. 11 and the whole of lots Nos. 14 and 15. In connection with the conveyance from Mylius to Kupfer, a plat was made, known as the "Sherwood plat," which was referred to in the deed and also in the partition deed above mentioned. The western part of lot No. 13, adjoining lot No. 14, became the property of the defendant, the Raine-Andrew Lumber Company, by a deed from Jennings Bros., dated May 22, 1901; they having obtained it by deed from Jacob Carr and others, dated June 26, 1900. Kupfer conveyed to the defendant all the 743 acres except a small parcel thereof at the northwest corner, by deed dated April 27, 1901, and Mylius conveyed to it 160 acres, adjoining the Kupfer land and also the Jennings-Carr lands, by deed dated October 29, 1901. This land came out of lots Nos. 14 and 15, and probably No. 11, as shown by the Goff plat, and lies on the east side of what is called "Gladly Fork." The defendant cut and removed timber from a part of lot No. 14, which, it is charged, was not included in any conveyance to it.

The plaintiff brought two actions, one on the 27th day of May, 1903, in which he laid his damages at $3,000, and the other on the 24th day of June, 1905, in which he laid the damages at $10,000. As these two actions involve the same timber, and the second covered the subject-matter of the first, they were consolidated and tried as one, and the controversy is whether the timber cut was within the boundaries of the lands retained by Mylius, and this turns partly upon a dispute as to the location of lot No. 14; all the timber in controversy having been taken from 172.5 acres of land, lying within its boundaries as platted by Goff, Commissioner, and partly upon the location of the land conveyed to the defendant by Jennings Bros. and Mylius, respectively. The corner called for in the deeds made by David Goff, who made or caused the original plat to be made, according to which they were executed, designated, as the common corner of lots Nos. 11, 12, 14, and 15, a maple. While no maple is found on the ground, the defendant claims the one referred to in the plat and deeds stood at a point near the middle of lot No. 11, as it is located by the courses and distances specified in the Goff plat, and there is evidence tending to sustain this contention. Insisting upon this as the true location of the common corner, it claims the entire plat must be shifted south about 162 poles and west about 100 poles. This would practically draw lot No. 14 away from the territory in dispute and deny title in Mylius to the timber in controversy.

In general form, the tract of land, though irregular, is rectangular, its greatest length being north and south, and the division lines run nearly north and south and east and west. As we have said, Commissioner Goff did not actually survey all of the lines, neither the exterior nor the interior. According to his report, he commenced at the well defined and admitted southeastern corner and ran to the southwestern corner, and then ran up the irregular western line, calling for a chestnut, beach, and maple on top of Shaver's Mountain, corner to lots Nos. 4 and 8, a hemlock and spruce pine, corner to lots Nos. 8 and 9, and two hemlocks and a beech, corner to lots Nos. 9 and 17. Here he stopped, after having run something more than half of that. His next surveying was of interior lines and will be stated later. After running them, he went back to the beginning point and ran the eastern line a distance of 500 poles to two small beeches and stopped on that line. Afterwards, he ran some more interior lines from that point. His first running of inner lines was as follows: Commencing at the two hemlocks and beech in the western line, he ran easterly 320 poles to a hemlock, and then 320 poles to two hemlocks and a service, and then 320 poles to a maple, corner to lots Nos. 11, 12, 14 and 15. Though he does not say, in his report of survey, that the hemlock and the two hemlocks and service are corners, he had indicated on his plat a hemlock as the corner of lots Nos. 9, 10, 16, and 17, and two hemlocks and a service as the corner of lots Nos. 10, 11, 15, and 16. From the maple, he turned south and ran 400 poles to a spruce pine (corner of lots Nos. 6, 7, 11, and 12 according to the plat, but not so designated in the report); thence west to two beeches and a linn on the north bank of Big Run (corner to lots Nos. 7, 8, 10, and 11, on the plat, but not so designated in the report); thence south again to eight beeches, two sugars, and an ash (corner to lots Nos. 4, 5, 7, and 8), and stopped. On the other side, after having run north 500 poles on the eastern line, he turned into the body of the tract and ran 320 poles to two beeches and a maple, a corner to lots Nos. 1 and 2. Then he turned south and ran 485 poles, the division line between lots Nos. 1 and 2, to the exterior southern line, where he made a corner indicated by two beeches. This is all the surveying he did on the whole boundary. Commencing at the western outer line, he actually ran the northern boundaries of lots Nos. 9, 10, and 11, the southern boundaries of lots Nos. 15, 16, and 17, the eastern and southern boundary of lot No. 11, the western line of lot No. 12, the western boundary of lot No. 7, the eastern boundary of lot No. 8. On the other side, he ran all the lines of lot No. 1 and the eastern and southern lines of lot No. 2. He ran none of the lines of lot No. 14. His report calls for nothing affecting lot No. 14 but the maple corner. Every line thereof shown on the plat stands unaffected by any actual surveying done, except in so far as they may be influenced, if at all, by the location of the maple as a corner.

The evidence seems to leave no doubt that the Goff plat is founded upon the boundaries of the original grant, and radically conflicts with some of Goff's actual surveying. The southern line, southeastern corner, eastern line, northeastern corner, and a western corner of the original grant are admitted, and there is evidence strongly tending to establish them. The beginning corner of the old grant was a large maple, north of a road, and there seems to be no controversy about its location. Goff began his survey at a "maple stump in John Wyatt's garden." The old grant then calls for a course N. 76 W. and a chestnut and cucumber corner, 782 poles distant. Goff's plat calls for the same course and corner and deviates from the distance to the extent of 18 poles, making it 800. At the northwestern corner, the old grant and Goff's plat call for the same timber, a large sugar tree and ash, and for substantially the same courses and distances. The courses and distances lead to the same northeastern corner also, and a very ancient corner is found there. But Goff's surveying on the western side, covering more than half the length of the western line, is about 100 poles outside of the grant, as shown by his plat. This circumstance and the location of the line, run partially through the tract by Goff from the two hemlocks and beech on the western side, give birth to a number of contentions, and important questions cluster around them. In tracing this old line, timber was found, indicating that it had been run, not between lots Nos. 9, 10, and 11, on the south, and 15, 16, and 17, on the north, as indicated by the plat, but, on the contrary, right up through lots Nos. 9, 10, and 11, as located by the plat. Moreover, the maple called for at the eastern end thereof, instead of being at the corner of lots Nos. 11, 12, 14, and 15, as laid down on the plat, is actually closer to the center of lot No. 11, as shown by the plat, than to any of its corners or lines. This line is farther south than the plat line, according to this evidence, by about 162 poles, and its terminus farther west than the plat indicates by about 100 poles. The evidence, indicating the actual running of this line through lots Nos. 9, 10, and 11, as they are located on the plat, instead of immediately north of them, is so strong that the plaintiff, in his testimony, admits it, but he claims the plat was made without reference to this line, or that the platting of the whole tract was correctly done as to all except the lots bordering upon this line, and that the mistake, whether in the plat or in the survey, cannot affect the location of any other lots. There seems to be little or no evidence tending to show that the platted line from west to east, from the two hemlocks to the maple, was ever run upon the ground. In addition to the testimony, relating to this uncertain line, or discrepancy between the plat and Goff's actual surveying, and the exterior lines, there is much more concerning the location of other lots and some conflicting grants, not affecting lot No. 14; but its bearing upon the real issue is not so direct as that of the evidence above referred to. For this reason, time and space will not be consumed in setting it forth here.

But there is a mass of evidence in the case, bearing upon another phase of the issue. It is contended that, even though lot No. 14, as sold and conveyed by Goff, should be located by the plat, and the inconsistent actual surveying and location of lot No. 11 and others may not preclude the location of lot No. 14, as it is laid down upon the plat, Mylius never obtained title to the lot as so located. Goff conveyed lots Nos. 14 and 22 to Granville E. Jarvis. Jarvis conveyed these lots to E. D. Parren, in whose name they became delinquent for nonpayment of taxes and were sold by the state. George W. Yocum, commissioner of school lands, instituted proceedings in the circuit court of Randolph county in 1875, under which they were sold to Isaac Baker. In this proceeding, Nicholas Marsteller, surveyor of Randolph county, made a report, purporting an actual survey of these lots, and they were conveyed according to the description set forth in his plat and report. The boundaries, as set forth in this deed under which Mylius claims, and the only one purporting to confer title upon him to said lot No. 14, are said to be in accord with the location thereof as claimed by the defendant. The description calls for courses and distances and stakes upon the ground and the maple corner of lots Nos. 11, 12, and 15. The supposed lines of the Marsteller survey have since been run by Coberly, the present county surveyor, and he testifies, in this case, that he found timber all around the lot as located by the defendant, bearing marks corresponding in date with the Marsteller survey. Another circumstance relied upon to show the location of lot No. 14, in accordance with the claim of the defendant, as conveyed by Yocum, is the relation thereof to a tract of land known as the Arnold and Taylor tract, as shown by Marsteller's plat. The commissioner said in his report that this Arnold and Taylor land covered a part of lot No. 22, and had been taxed and was, therefore, not subject to sale. Accordingly, only so much of lot No. 22 was sold as was not covered by the Arnold and Taylor land. The Marsteller plat and report show that the Arnold and Taylor land, a long narrow strip, composed of two adjacent tracts, crosses lot No. 22 diagonally, leaving only a small portion of the northwest corner and a large portion of the eastern and southern parts uncovered. As platted in connection with the Goff plat, this Arnold and Taylor survey bears an entirely different relation to lot No. 22. Said lot goes farther north and east upon the Arnold and Taylor land. All this imports that the surveyed location of lot No. 14, not as Goff conveyed it to Jarvis, but as Yocum conveyed it to Baker, and Baker to Mylius, commences at the maple, located at the eastern terminus of the interior line, run from west to east, to a point near the center of lot No. 11. Lot No. 13 lies immediately east of lot No. 14. Goff conveyed this to John Wyatt. Wyatt conveyed it to Carr, and Carr a portion of it, along with a portion of lot No. 23, to Jennings Bros., and the Jenningses to defendant, the Raine-Andrew Lumber Company. The defendant purchased the 743 acres conveyed by Mylius to Charles Kupfer out of the northern end of lots Nos. 14 and 15, by deed dated March 1, 1891. The deed from Mylius to Kupfer refers to what is called the Sherwood plat and conveys lots Nos. 8, 9, 10, and 11, as designated on said plat. This plat seems to conform to the location of lot No. 11 and lots Nos. 14 and 15, as contended for by the defendant. It is also said that Mylius represented to the agent of the defendant company, before it purchased from Kupfer, that lots Nos. 11, 14, and 15 were to be located by reference to the maple contended for by the defendant as the corner. After the partition between Mylius and Kupfer, there was some apprehension, on the part of the latter, of loss of a part of the land conveyed to him by superior outstanding title, and Mylius covenanted to make the loss good in that event. Mylius also conveyed to Nancy Dyer a portion of lots Nos. 11, 14, and 15 by a deed in which he recognized the line of the land conveyed by him to Kupfer, and by Kupfer to the defendant company. Lot No. 15 had originally been conveyed to the Bakers by Squire B. Ward, and the Bakers conveyed to Mylius. In the deed from Ward to Baker, lot No. 15 is described as cornering on two hemlocks and a service, just as in the Goff plat. If lot No. 14 is located according to the Goff plat, the land conveyed to Kupfer, if located in lot No. 14, as located by the Goff plat, would, so far as we can see from the evidence, seem to cover the land in controversy here and give title to the defendant, for this controverted land lies in the northern portion of lot No. 14, as so located. Lots Nos. 10 and 11, of the Sherwood plat, seem to be also in the northern end of lot No. 14; but the evidence shows that, notwithstanding this, they are actually located, for the most part, west of lot No. 14, according to the Goff plat. Mylius conveyed these lots as if they were in lot No. 14, when, in point of fact, they are not, if it is to be located by the Goff plat, but are, if it is to be located according to the survey apparently made for the deed in the Yocum land sale proceeding. In addition to these circumstances, Mylius, in his testimony, admits that, in his dealings with Farnsworth and Kupfer, they recognized the maple corner as contended for by the defendant. When asked if his conveyance to Kupfer stated the truth, when it called for the northern line of lots Nos. 14 and 15, as laid off by Goff, he admitted that this was, in part, a mistake, and said: "Part of the land that is true, but not as to all the northern part of No. 15 as laid down by Goff. It is all of No. 15 as laid down by the Sherwood plat." And further, speaking of Kupfer: "When we divided the land, he got the best part of the land, and on account of the discrepancy at this maple he would not take up here. Neither would Farnsworth, and he taken his share under the Sherwood plat and then give me a contract that I was to have. I would not divide anyway—anything outside, north of that line, of the deed of the lot as laid down by Sherwood, of the northern and eastern line." It is shown that Mylius pointed out the maple corner as claimed by the defendant to the defendant's agent, as being the corner of lots Nos. 11, 12, 14, and 15. There is much evidence by conduct and admission of his recognition of this as the true corner.

Five instructions were given at the instance of the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant, all of which embody the theories of the plaintiff already stated. Instruction No. 1 told the jury that, in locating lot No. 14, they should ascertain it to be located at the place indicated on the Goff plat, unless they should believe from the evidence Goff had actually surveyed it and designated the lines and corner thereof from such actual survey. Instruction No. 2 told them that, if they should believe, from the evidence, Goff had actually surveyed lot No. 11, and thereby designated the lines and corners thereof, and did not actually survey, but only designated the location of, lot No. 14, by a plat thereof in connection with all the other lots, the plat of said lot No. 14 must govern the location thereof, and that the actual survey of lot No. 11 does not control the location of lot No. 14. It is to be observed here that Goff's report shows he actually ran three lines of lot No. 11 and marked all four of the corners thereof on the ground. Instruction No. 3 told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence Goff had done such surveying upon the ground, as to identify the whole 19,000 acres, and then made a plat thereof, showing the subdivisions thereof into lots, and made the plat a part of the record of his proceedings, the plat so made must govern the location of the lots shown thereon, unless they should believe Goff, as part of the same transaction, actually surveyed the lots, or some of them, and, by such actual survey, designated the lines and corners of the lots so surveyed, such survey should not control the locations of the lots not actually surveyed, but that they should be located by the plat. Instruction No. 4 told them that, if they should believe from the evidence the outside boundary of the whole tract was correctly shown by the plat lines on the plat used in the trial, and that Goff did not actually survey any of the lots or subdivisions shown on said plat except lots Nos. 1 and 11, as shown by the red lines upon said plat (the locations claimed by the defendant, a considerable distance south and west of the locations as claimed by the plaintiff), and designated all of the other lots shown upon said plat without having actually surveyed the same, they should be governed in the location of any of the lots shown upon said plat, other than lots Nos. 1 and 11, by the plat, made by Goff. Observe here that Goff's report shows he ran all the lines of lot No. 1 and three of the lines of lot No. 11, as stated. Instruction No. 5 told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence Goff actually surveyed lot No. 11, and located it upon the ground in accordance with the claim of the defendant, but, by mistake, located it 162 poles farther south than it should have been located, as shown by his plat, the mistake in the location of lot No. 11 does not control or govern the location of lot No. 14, as made by him.

[1] The purpose of these instructions was to controvert and nullify the claim of the defendant that the mistake or discrepancy indicated by the evidence must have the legal effect, if established, of shifting the location of all the lots on the plat about 162 poles to the south and 100 poles to the west, and thereby throwing lot No. 14 almost entirely without the bounds of the disputed territory. Although they laid the basis or groundwork of power in the jury to destroy this contention of the defendant, it is obvious that the court could properly give them, if the evidence tended to support the hypotheses embodied in them, and they were not forbidden by any rule of law, nor other evidence in the case. That there was evidence to sustain them is beyond doubt.

[2] The exterior boundaries of the whole tract, as shown on the Goff plat, are indicated by evidence found upon the ground, as we have shown. The exterior lines, with their courses and distances, must be located by the jury in accordance with the Goff plat, if they believe this location is correct. In settling this question, they could give effect to admitted corners and the courses and distances. The exterior lines of the Goff plat seem to be the lines of the old grant. The contradiction and inconsistency relate to the lines run and marked on the ground by Commissioner Goff and seemingly ignored or disregarded in his plat, if the admitted original corners are correct locations. There is strong evidence that the exterior lines are governed and controlled by the plat; but, in locating lots, actually surveyed, the marked lines necessarily control the plat. Every portion of the description of lot No. 14, except the southwestern corner, is found on the plat, and not elsewhere. There is no evidence of their ever having been marked upon the ground. It follows, therefore, that the north, south, east, and west lines rest upon nothing but the plat, which, in the main, is based on the exterior lines. These lines were first fixed. They were established before the delinquency or sale—before the issuance of the patent—and presumably rest upon an actual survey then made, while some of the interior lines were never surveyed. By courses and distances, lot No. 14 can be reached and located from the exterior lines. The maple in controversy is not the sole, nor the best, index to its location. Though the maple, if standing and identified, would be a natural object, marked as a corner, it would not be superior in any sense to the other natural monuments found in the exterior lines, plainly indicating a location of lot No. 14 at a place different from that indicated by the maple. If the surveyor made the maple the corner of lot 11, and erroneously described it as the corner of No. 14, never having run the lines of that lot, nor located its corner, nor made any corner at that place by any mark upon the ground, we know of no rule of law which forbids a finding of the jury in accordance with the fact, whatever the result may be to the parties.

These instructions are, in a certain sense, a concession to the defendant. They tell the jury they may depart from the plat in certain respects. At the same time, they warn them against doing violence to the descriptive matter in the deed further than is necessary to adjust it to the surveying actually done. The objection to them seems to rest upon the view that, on establishing the east and west line as claimed by the defendant, the jury must then reconcile the conflict, not in location, but in effect, between this line and the established outer lines, by making the former prevail over the latter and destroy their effect. We do not understand this line of argument. If the jury are satisfied the outer lines of the plat are based upon admitted corners and were made without reference to inconsistent surveying actually done, they are bound to make this application and find accordingly. If, in addition to this, they find certain interior lines on the plat do not correspond with lines surveyed upon the ground, what rule of law says they shall then determine that they shall prevail over other lines equally well, if not better, established in another portion of the plat? We are not aware of any, nor has any been brought to our attention. On the contrary, it is well established that, in this state of the evidence, the jury are at liberty to find that, in making the plat and deed, the survey was disregarded. On this subject we cannot do better than quote the law as declared in Mining & Mfg. Co. v. Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 406, points 1 to 5, inclusive, of the syllabus of which are as follows: "Generally, when, in a deed, lines and corners are described, or when from the statement of courses and distances or other descriptions, in connection with circumstances existing and manifest, or ascertainable, at the time of the execution of the deed, it is presumable that such lines or corners are those referred to in the deed, the statement of courses and distances is, in construction, controlled by the actual lines and corners referred to. But the mere circumstance that lines and corners are known to have been run and marked, or are found marked near where the courses and distances mentioned in the deed run, is not conclusive that they are the lines and corners of the land referred to in the deed. And when there is no such approximation in the courses or length of the lines, or the marks on the corners, to the description in the deed, as to warrant the presumption that they are the boundaries of the land to which the deed relates, such marked lines should be disregarded. Lines and corners may be marked with the purpose to adopt them in a contemplated deed; but afterwards the marked lines and corners may be abandoned, and mere courses and distances from certain objects or points may be substituted. There is no uniform rule that the length of one line, as mentioned in a deed, shall control the course of another line, or that the latter shall control the former. Other circumstances will determine the adoption of the one or the other. Though the quantity of the land mentioned in the deed will not control the boundary, when ascertained by the description, with other paramount circumstances, nevertheless, the correspondence of quantity given by a line in question, with the quantity mentioned in the deed, or an approximation to such correspondence, may be considered as tending to establish such line as the true one."

But this does not dispose of the ruling on these instructions. We have said there is nothing in the law which precluded the submission of the hypotheses they state, on the evidence relating to the Goff plat and the actual surveying done by Goff. But there was other evidence in the case, of which they take no notice. The plaintiff, Mylius, does not claim lot No. 14 under any deed made by Goff directly to him or to any one from whom he purchased. He derives his title from the deed made by Yocum, commissioner of school lands. As we have seen, there is a claim that the deed, when applied to its subject-matter, locates the land it conveys in accordance with the contention of the defendant. Although it contains no call for any marked trees or other natural monuments and makes no reference to the Goff deed or plat, there is evidence in the case showing the existence of trees, evidently marked about the date of the survey made by Marshtiller in the Yocum land sale proceeding, and these trees stand on lines traced from the maple, claimed by the defendant, as the corner of lot No. 14, agreeing with the courses and distances recited in the deed from Yocum to Baker. This evidence of an actual tying down upon the ground at this place of the land conveyed by Yocum is not found in the deed, and it is to be taken in connection with some additional facts. Yocum, the commissioner of school lands, instituted his proceeding for the sale of lots Nos. 14 and 22 of the Goff sale. In his report to the court, he so describes the land, and so does the surveyor in his report of survey. The decree of sale refers to the report and plat. The commissioner, in his report of sale, describes the lot sold as lot No. 14, and the court confirmed the sale and directed a deed to be made, and the deed refers to the court proceedings. On this evidence, the defendant founds the contention that these instructions do not cover the entire case, but, on the contrary, completely ignore, and shut out from the view of the jury, evidence and factors in the case highly important to the defendant. That they take no notice of it is obvious; but we think it alone constitutes no defense and did not justify the giving of an instruction for the defendant. Conceding the facts to be established, it shows two repugnant descriptions, disclosed by extrinsic evidence, one of which is general and true, the other particular, by metes and bounds, but false. The state owned the Goff lot No. 14, but no part of lot No. 15. The latter has never been forfeited or delinquent, since the conveyance by Goff, so far as the record shows. At the time of the Yocum conveyance, it was owned by the Bakers, one of whom purchased No. 14 from Yocum. These lots were adjacent. The true location of the latter is east of the former; the false description, if followed, would locate it almost wholly within lot No. 15, which the state, the vendor, did not own, and which Baker, the vendee, did own, at the time of the Yocum sale. In all such cases, the false description must be rejected. The criterion for the construction of a deed is the intention of the parties. Chapman v. Coal Co., 54 W. Va. 193, 199, 46 S. E. 262; McDougal v. Musgrave, 46 W. Va. 509, 33 S. E. 281. Of course there must be some language in the deed, disclosing the intention adopted. It cannot be read into the instrument, in the absence of words indicating it. Here, we have terms indicating lot No. 14, located by the Goff plat, as the subject of conveyance. We have also, in the description by metes and bounds, aided by extrinsic evidence, terms indicating other land as the subject of conveyance. It is obvious that the vendor did not intend to sell, nor the vendee to buy, the latter, because the former did not own it, and the purchaser did already own it. Therefore, as applied to the subject-matter, the description of the lot by name, in the record of the proceedings under which the deed was made, is a true description, and the only one that will carry into effect the obvious intention of the parties. In cases of repugnance in description, when both apparently apply, that which is most certain prevails.

[8] When a deed contains two contradictory descriptions of the same premises, one of which is particular and definite, showing the precise location and bounds of the land, and the other general in its terms, the former controls, because that description which undertakes to set out the specific boundary is more likely to have been carefully attended to by the parties and, therefore, to reflect their real intention, than the general one; but this principle is operative only in those cases in which either description may be taken without doing violence to the manifest intention of the parties. It does not apply when one of the descriptions is baldly false and must have been inserted by mistake. A description of a town lot by its number and the number of the block, followed by a description by metes and bounds, including only a part of it, carries the whole lot. Rutherford v. Tracy, 48 Mo. 325, 8 Am. Rep. 104; Masterson v. Munroe, 105 Cal. 431, 38 Pac. 1106, 45 Am. St. Rep. 57. A conveyance describing the land as the grantor's home farm, and then setting out a particular description of the parcel of which it is composed, but omitting several acres, passes the whole farm. Andrews v. Pearson, 68 Me. 19; Marshall v. McLean, 3 G. Greene (Iowa) 363. A description of a lot by number will control a reference to adjacent streets. Nash v. Railroad Co., 67 N. C. 413. See, generally, Baxter v. Tanner, 35 W. Va. 60, 12 S. E. 1094; Smith v. Chapman, 10 Grat. (Va.) 445; Heaton v. Hodges, 14 Me. 66, 30 Am. Dec. 731, and note; Nash v. Railroad Co., 67 N. C. 413; Devlin on Deeds, §§ 1017-1020. This law fits this case exactly. The description by metes and bounds covers only part of the land owned by the grantor; the general description covers all of it.

[7] The facts being uncontroverted, the construction of a deed is a question for the court, not the jury. Snooks v. Wingfield, 52 W. Va. 441, 44 S. E. 277. Hence, if the court had been asked to instruct the jury, concerning the construction of the deed, in the light of the evidence, tending to show that it contemplated conveyance of the land, located otherwise than by the Goff plat, it would have been compelled to say the jury could not do so, and that they must treat it as calling for lot No. 14 of the Goff sale and locate the land accordingly.

The next inquiry is whether the evidence of admissions, and representations already mentioned, was such as to demand recognition in the instructions. If the evidence thus far analyzed were all the record discloses, it might not be material. But there is additional evidence which we think clearly renders it so. The defendant claims under two deeds, one or both of which may cover some parts of the alleged trespass or all of it. Whether they do or not depends upon the location of the lands granted by them. One of these is the deed from Jennings Bros., and the other the one from the plaintiff himself. The plat and evidence disclose two alleged locations of the land conveyed by the former, one almost wholly in lots Nos. 13 and 23 of the Goff plat and the other almost wholly in lots Nos. 14 and 22 of that plat, and the admissions of the plaintiff, made before the purchase from Jennings Bros., tend to establish the latter, provided the muniments of title leave any uncertainty as to the boundary lines. Respecting the location of this land, the evidence and claims of the defendant are indefinite and vague; but there is probably enough to make the admissions material. However this may be, the plaintiff's own deed to the defendant clearly connects them with the issue. It covers land in the region of the trespass. Its boundaries are general and the quantity and location of the land it conveys in controversy. In his dealings with Farnsworth and Kupfer, the plaintiff proceeded upon the location theory of the defendant. It was then to his interest to place the lands he conveyed to them as far west and south as possible, and, in so doing, he asserted, by his conduct, exactly the opposite of his present contentions. Having separated his holdings from theirs by partition, it is now to his interest to press his claims northward and eastward as far as possible. His course respecting the land he conveyed to the defendant is the same that he pursued in his transactions with Farnsworth and Kupfer. The further south and west he can locate that land, the more he will retain in the north. This attitude, however, was not hostile to Farnsworth and Kupfer. They shared in his acquisitions. To some extent, the observation applies to his relations with the defendant also. Inimical to its interests in the north, the plaintiff's representations and former contentions avail it in the south. The peculiar situation of the defendant compels it also to take inconsistent positions. It bought land of Jennings Bros., the location of which, to subserve some of its purposes, must be in lots Nos. 13 and 23, and, to subserve others, in lots Nos. 14 and 22. This may account, in part, for the failure to develop fully the evidence, relating to these lands as well as the tract it obtained from the plaintiff, constituting the real issue in the case. On this issue, namely, whether the trespass is covered by either or both of the conveyances to the defendant, the admissions of the plaintiff are relevant and material.

The description of the land in the deed from the plaintiff to the defendant, reads as follows: "All that portion of his (plaintiff's) land lying on Shaver's and Middle Mountain in said Randolph county, which is situated and which lies on the east side of Gladly Fork and bounded on the west by said Gladly Fork, on the north by the Carl Kupfer land, on the east by the Jennings-Carr land and on the south by the Fridley land." This includes all the land between Gladly Fork and the Jennings-Carr land and all south of the Kupfer land, both now owned by the defendant; but the Kupfer land does not lie north of the trespass. It lies south and east of it, for the most part. The defendant says the deed conveys only two or three acres, if limited by the Kupfer land on the north, a quantity entirely disproportionate, in its opinion, to the purchase money, $1,650, and wholly at variance with plaintiff's representations as to identity and quantity, carrying all the land he had lying east of Gladly Fork, amounting to 160 acres. This statement suffices, we think, to show the materiality of the representations, the descriptions in these two deeds, and the evidence, respecting the location of the lands conveyed by them, none of which is referred to by any instruction given in the case.

It bears more directly on the real issue than that relating to the identity and location of the lots of the Goff plat and conveyances. The trespass may be in lot No. 14 and yet belong to the defendant. Hence the location of that lot is not at all conclusive, nor necessarily vital in the case.

[5] Nevertheless, the instructions given apply to it only, and leave wholly out of view that which is more decisive in character. They also repeat the same proposition several times in different forms. Thus they gave undue prominence to partial and inconclusive evidence, and were obviously liable to mislead the jury. Though not binding in form or effect, they were so drawn as to make the hypothesis embodied in them apparently controlling, and, in our opinion, this was highly prejudicial.

[4] On the trial of an issue as to which there is conflict in the evidence, the instructions, if any, should submit the conflicting theories the evidence tends to prove. Presentation of one of them and silence as to the other virtually amount to a comment on the evidence.

[3] While the instructions are usually prepared by the attorneys, they are the directions of the court and must present the issues fairly. Ordinarily, this result is accomplished by the work of the attorneys on both sides, approved by the court; but presentation of both phases is none the less necessary, when the instructions are prepared by the attorney for only one of the parties or by the court. Of course a case may properly be submitted without any at all; but, if instructions are given at the instance of anybody, they must present the case fairly, else the court, by its action, misleads the jury and thereby errs. Delmar Oil Co. v. Bartlett, 62 W. Va. 700, 59 S. E. 634; Bice v. Wheeling Elec. Co., 62 W. Va. 685, 59 S. E. 626; McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683, 41 Am. Rep. 682; Storrs v. Feick, 24 W. Va. 606; Webb v. Packet Co., 43 W. Va. 800, 29 S. E. 519; Fisher v. Railroad Co., 39 W. Va. 371, 19 S. E. 578, 23 L. R. A. 758. Thus viewed in the light of the evidence and the rules of procedure, the instructions, given at the instance of the plaintiff, were erroneous and prejudicial. They, or one of them, should have been so modified as to direct attention to the evidence we have been discussing, or an additional instruction, embracing it, should have been given along with them.

[8] The refusal of the court to give two instructions requested by the defendant is ground of further complaint. By them the defendant attempts to apply here the rule declared in Stockton v. Morris, 39 W. Va. 432, 19 S. E. 531, requiring, in the case of what is called an inclusive grant, the plaintiff to prove the land he seeks to recover, lies, not only within the boundaries of the grant, but also outside of the tract excepted from it. The grant to Phillips excepted prior surveys containing 800 acres and declared that it should be no bar, in either law or equity, to the confirmation of the title of prior claimants to said 800 acres by grant. If nothing further appeared in the case, the rule invoked would apply; but another important element is disclosed. This whole tract of land, without any exception, was afterwards sold by the state in the proceeding instituted by Commissioner Goff. The deeds, made in that proceeding and conveying every particle of land within the boundaries of the original grant of 19,000 acres, constituted a new grant by the state, without exception. Had the state any title to the land excepted from the original grant? Certainly, if the excepted surveys were never granted, but such title did not accrue from forfeiture of the Phillips grant, which did not include them. The state still held her title as sovereign, provided the excepted surveys had not been subsequently granted. Did the Goff deeds pass that title? No, for the lands were waste and unappropriated, which commissioners of the revenue had no power to sell. They were not subject to sale by judicial procedure, as delinquent and forfeited lands were. They passed only by survey, entry, and grant. Code of 1819, vol. 1, c. 86; Code of 1849, c. 112. For that reason, the deed of a commissioner of the revenue would not pass them. Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Grat. (Va.) 572. No statute vested jurisdiction in the court, or conferred authority upon the commissioner, to dispose of them in that way. But the Goff deeds covered this land, and were defective only in respect to authority to convey a particular title.

[9] The Legislature had power to remedy this defect, and did so by the curative and validating provision of section 19 of chapter 105 of the Code of 1906, saying: "Whatever right, title, interest and estate the state of West Virginia had to any lands at the date of the sale thereof, or instrument purporting to convey the same heretofore made by said state through and by the commissioner of school lands of any county, under an order or decree of the circuit court in any suit or proceeding under said chapter one hundred and five of the Code, however derived or claimed, shall be deemed and held to have passed to and vested in the grantee thereof; whether the land so sold was proceeded against as forfeited, escheated, or waste and unappropriated land, notwithstanding any irregularity or error in such proceeding or informality in such sale or conveyance or purported conveyance, or want of jurisdiction in the court to decree such sale."

[10] This clearly validates the Goff deed and makes it pass this land as waste and unappropriated. The deed did not do so of itself on account of lack of jurisdiction or power in the court to sell it as such; but this statute declares the deed shall do so, notwithstanding the want of jurisdiction or the form of the sale or proceeding. It operates as a legislative release or transfer of state title to the grantees in deeds which did not pass it, because of lack of prior authority in the state's selling agents to do so. This conclusion is within both the letter and the spirit of the statute. So interpreted, it makes a just and equitable provision for a meritorious case and is in perfect accord with the prior and subsequent policy of the Legislature respecting the public domain and land titles emanating from the state. State v. West Branch Lumber Co., 64 W. Va. 673, 63 S. E. 372; State v. Snyder, 64 W. Va. 659, 63 S. E. 385; State v. Jackson, 56 W. Va. 558, 49 S. E. 465; Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214; McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561; State v. Harman, 57 W. Va. 447, 50 S. E. 828; State v. King, 64 W. Va. 545, 546, 610, 63 S. E. 468, 495. Can the want of jurisdiction relieved from by this provision be other than such as appears here? To say it means want of jurisdiction of the former owner of the land would make the clause very narrow in its effect and of little or no practical value. To make it cover this defect of authority relieves the state of the injustice and embarrassment of holding title against her own grantee, rendering it necessary for him to give up the land or buy it over again from her, in the same way and from the same state agencies through which he had already purchased it; there having been no other mode of disposition thereof at the date of the passage of the act nor since. We may well suppose the Legislature intended to provide against a consequence so anomalous, unjust, and inimical to the prosperity of the state, and the terms used in this clause clearly express such intent. The provision quoted is from the section, as amended by chapter 42 of the Acts of 1905. As it stood immediately before that amendment was made, it was more direct and specific as to the intent, leaving no possible ground for doubt. See section 19, c. 105, Code of 1899.

Another view of the case sustains the action of the court in refusing this instruction. Lot No. 14, in which the trespass may be, and part of lot No. 22, were subsequently conveyed by Yocum, commissioner of school lands, in 1879, under a decree in a school land proceeding, and under a statute materially different from that under which the Goff sale of the same land had been made. Chapter 134 of the Acts of 1872-73, in force at the date of that proceeding, sale, and conveyance, provided for the disposition of waste and unappropriated lands in the same manner as forfeited and purchased lands. That method of disposing of them was adopted about the year 1865, and has been maintained ever since. Section 8 of chapter 105 of the Code of 1868 provided that the deed, in such a proceeding, should pass "all the interest of the state" in the lands thereby conveyed, not merely such title as had been acquired by forfeiture or the particular forfeiture ascertained in the cause. The Yocum deed, therefore, clearly passed any title the state had at the date thereof, and, if the land excepted from the Phillips grant had not been previously granted, the state's original title to lot No. 14 and part of lot No. 22, as sovereign, was thereby conveyed to Baker. No prior grant thereof has been shown. If it had been, it would have been superior to these school land deeds and the rule in question no doubt applicable; but, in the absence thereof, we think it clearly inapplicable and the rejection of the instruction proper.

[11] Exception was taken to the admission of the opinion of a surveyor who had run certain exterior lines of the 19,000-acre tract, to the effect that the lines thereof, laid down on the surveyor's plat, were the true lines. Ordinarily, such evidence is inadmissible. The location of boundary lines is not a subject for expert testimony. It always depends upon facts and circumstances which the jury are presumed to be capable of understanding without the aid of expert testimony. The court should have excluded this statement.

[12] Complaint is also made of the admission of an agreement between Mylius and Kupfer, whereby the former bound himself to compensate the latter for any land he might lose out of that conveyed to him by the partition deed, by reason of conflict between it and another tract of land, known as the "Hare land." Mylius put this agreement in evidence to negative the effect of his admission, arising by implication from his transactions with Kupfer, and as a part of his conduct relating to the location of the lands as conveyed by Goff. We perceive no error in the admission thereof. It properly goes to the jury with all the evidence of admissions and conduct, bearing on the questions of location.

For the error in giving plaintiff's instructions in the form in which we find them in the record, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. PHILLIPS.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 208*)—SPECIAL DEMURRER.

Where a paragraph in a petition contains both relevant and irrelevant allegations, it will be purged of the irrelevant matters on special demurrer pointing out such; but if the demurrer goes to the paragraph as a whole, without specification of the irrelevant matter, the demurrant cannot complain that the entire paragraph was not stricken.

2. CARRIERS (§ 319*)—DAMAGES (§§ 171, 181*)—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

According to the plaintiff's testimony, she was a passenger on defendant's road, and entitled to continuous passage from B. to E. She was accompanied by a small child and carried a valise. The terminal point of the train upon which she traveled was Jesup, where she was to change cars. She was told by the conductor, as the train was approaching the station of Odessa, which was within five miles of Jesup, that this was the place for her to get off. The plaintiff alighted as directed, and did not discover her mistake until after the train had left. There were no station facilities, and there were some negroes near by. It was about 10 o'clock at night, and she became frightened, because she was apparently without protection or a place to spend the night. She inquired of the negroes for direction to a house where she could spend the night. They directed her to a place. And on the way there she met a white youth, who invited her to spend the night with his mother, by whom she was hospitably entertained, and on the following morning she continued her journey to destination; the railway company accepting her original ticket. If the jury should find these circumstances to be true, then the plaintiff would be entitled to compensatory, but not to punitive, damages.

(a) Even if the plaintiff had been entitled to punitive damages, the charge that the jury could consider the worldly circumstances of the parties in assessing such damages was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1338-1345; Dec. Dig. § 319.* Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 474, 498, 499; Dec. Dig. §§ 171, 181.*]

Error from Superior Court, Wayne County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Georgia C. Phillips against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Bennet, Twitty & Reese and Littlefield & Poppell, for plaintiff in error. W. M. Clements, W. W. Bennett, and D. M. Clark, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Mrs. Georgia C. Phillips brought suit against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for being put off at a wrong station. The plaintiff, having purchased a ticket, boarded the passenger train of the defendant company at Brunswick on a journey to Empire. It was necessary for her to change cars at Jesup. She was accompanied by her small child and carried a small valise. After she had been traveling for some time, and as the train was slowing up for a station, the conductor announced that it was the place for petitioner to leave the train, at the same time taking up the package and directing her with her child to follow him; and, acting upon the direction of the conductor, she left the train, which, as soon as she disembarked, rapidly moved away, leaving her in darkness. The place where she was put off was Odessa, a place five miles south of Jesup, without depot accommodations or other provisions for her comfort or safety. It was 10 or 11 o'clock at night when she left the train, and for some time the only persons she saw were several negroes. She was very much frightened, and after some time had elapsed a white boy was called to her by the negroes, whom she asked if there were any white people in the community, and he finally secured a place for her to spend the remainder of the night. The plaintiff alleged that the conduct of the conductor in causing her to leave the train at a point other than her destination at a strange place, in the nighttime, was gross negligence and wanton and willful misconduct. The defendant demurred generally and specially to the petition. The demurrer was overruled, and the case proceeded to trial.

On the trial the plaintiff testified that she purchased a ticket over the road of the defendant company, entitling her to a passage from Brunswick, Ga., to Empire. The train upon which she took passage left Brunswick at about 8 o'clock at night. When the conductor took up her ticket, she asked him if she did not have to change at some place between Brunswick and Empire, and he said, "Yes, you change at Jesup," and told her that the train was due to arrive at Jesup at about 10 o'clock. Near that time the conductor came through the coach and called out the station, and she understood him to say Jesup. She was intending to ask some one before the train stopped if the station was Jesup, when the conductor took up her valise and hat box and said, "Here is where you get off at," and when the train stopped the conductor assisted the plaintiff to alight. She thought she was at Jesup until the train had left. She saw some negroes around the station, and also a white lady, who got off the same train she did. When she got off the train, she saw a switch light and started in that direction, thinking it was the depot. She asked the lady who got off the same train with her where she was going, and she replied that she was going home, and she asked her where to go to take the next train, and she said, "Go down there and ask them," waving to the place where some negroes were. She asked them where to go to take the next train, and they replied that there would be no train until the next morning, and said, "You think you are at Jesup, but this is Odessa." She inquired of them where she could spend the night and they directed her to the "captain's house." On their way they saw a young white boy named Carl Moody, who, being informed by the negroes that the plaintiff wanted to spend the night somewhere, invited her to spend the night with his mother. She accompanied Carl Moody to his mother's, a short distance from the depot, and spent the night with her. She did not get to sleep until about 4 o'clock in the morning, on account of the fright brought about by having been put off the train under the circumstances she narrated. The next morning she boarded the train and presented her ticket to the conductor, and explained that she was put off at Odessa when intending to leave the train at Jesup, and she was carried on this ticket to her destination. The servants in charge of both trains treated her civilly and politely. Upon her return home she sent Mrs. Moody $1 for her night's lodging.

The defendant submitted testimony tending to show that the train upon which the plaintiff was traveling as a passenger was a local train, scheduled to stop at Jesup; that when the train was approaching Odessa, a station five miles from Jesup, the conductor announced that station; and that the plaintiff, believing that she had arrived at her destination alighted from the car, being assisted by the conductor. The conductor testified that he did not tell the plaintiff that she had reached her station at the time she left the car at Odessa. The plaintiff boarded another train of the defendant railway company the next morning, and was carried on her ticket to her destination, where she was met by her father. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $250. The railway company made a motion for new trial upon the grounds that the verdict was excessive, and that the court erred in giving certain instructions. A new trial was refused and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The plaintiff's allegations were in some instances redundant, but in the different paragraphs to which special demurrers were directed there were allegations of fact appropriate to the plaintiff's cause of action. The special demurrers moved to strike the entire paragraphs as being immaterial and impertinent; but as some of the allegations in each paragraph criticised were not open to this objection, the court did not err in refusing to strike the entire paragraph. As against a general demurrer the petition set forth a cause of action.

[2] 2. On the subject of damages the court charged as follows: "If you find, in addition to nominal damages, that the facts and circumstances at the time of this transaction were such as to justify the assessing against the defendant of punitive damages, while the law fixes no arbitrary standard by which you can be controlled in that regard, no definite rule fixed by which you can ascertain an amount, the law leaves it to the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors to determine the amount of damages, if any, that should be allowed by the jury. Upon this theory, punitive damages, the law fixes no arbitrary standard to guide you, except that it is left to the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors. The worldly circumstances of the parties, the amount of bad faith in the transaction, if any, and all the attending facts and circumstances, should be weighed in determining upon the amount, if you should decide recovery is justifiable upon this theory of the case under the law and facts and circumstances. The jury should at all times be reasonable and just, and not oppressive." The exception is that the evidence did not authorize a charge on the subject of punitive damages, and because there was no evidence of the worldly circumstances of the parties. "In every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or the intention, and in that event the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass, or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff." Civil Code 1910, § 4503.

We are at a loss to see, from the facts as narrated by the plaintiff, any circumstances of aggravation authorizing a recovery of punitive damages. According to her own testimony the agents of the railway company were civil and courteous in their treatment of her, and her being put off at the wrong station was the result of a mistake. It is her contention that the conductor told her that she had arrived at the place where she was to change cars and invited her to get off, and that she got off at the wrong station on his invitation. If the conductor's version of the incident be accepted as true, the plaintiff misunderstood the station announced "Odessa" to be "Jesup," and voluntarily left the train. Be that as it may, it is clear from both viewpoints that the plaintiff's leaving the train at Odessa was the result of a clear mistake. There is not a line in the evidence which indicates that any servant of the defendant company was influenced by any improper motive, or impelled by any desire to injure or to willfully discommode the plaintiff. The charge on the subject of punitive damages should not have been given. So. Ry. Co. v. O'Bryan, 119 Ga. 147, 45 S. E. 1000; Central Ry. Co. v. Wood, 118 Ga. 172, 44 S. E. 1001; So. Ry. Co. v. Harden, 101 Ga. 263, 28 S. E. 847; So. Ry. Co. v. Davis, 132 Ga. 812, 65 S. E. 131; Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Hughes (Miss.) 50 South. 627; Moss v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 128 Mo. App. 385, 107 S. W. 422; Tenn. Cent. R. Co. v. Brasher's Guardian (Ky.) 97 S. W. 349; Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Quillen, 22 Ind. App. 496, 53 N. E. 1024.

Again, the charge was erroneous, in that it instructed the jury that they might consider the worldly circumstances of the plaintiff. In a tort of this character the worldly circumstances of the plaintiff are not the subject-matter of inquiry; and, even if the evidence had justified the charge on the subject of punitive damages, the charge as given was erroneous. Atlanta Con. St. Ry. Co. v. Hardage, 93 Ga. 457, 21 S. E. 100.

BOYD v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 339*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 673*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF TESTIMONY—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—MURDER.

The state introduced testimony that the defendant stated before the coroner's inquest that he undertook to take a gun from the deceased, and that, "in tussling over the gun, the gun went off." Held, that the refusal of the court to permit the defendant to prove by the witness delivering such testimony that, in the statement about which he was testifying, the defendant also stated that the shooting of the deceased was an accident, was not error requiring a new trial, in view of the fact that the court subsequently reversed such ruling and permitted the defendant to make such proof by the witness.

(a) When the defendant was allowed to prove by the witness that, in the statement referred to in the preceding note, the defendant also stated that the discharge of the gun was an accident, it was error for the court to rule: "I don't allow these words about it being an accident to go in to show it as a fact, to show it was an accident, but as a disclaimer of guilt. The court allows it to go in only to that extent."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 339;* Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1872-1876; Dec. Dig. § 673.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS—INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER IN COMMISSION OF LAWFUL ACT.

The evidence required a charge on the subject of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection, and the court committed error in failing to charge upon that subject.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—HOMICIDE (§§ 146, 269, 340*)—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—MALICE.

Whether or not it would require the grant of a new trial that, in the trial of one indicted for murder, the judge charged the jury that "the law presumes every homicide to be felonious, until the contrary appears from the circumstances of alleviation, or excuse, or justification, and it is incumbent upon the prisoner to make out by a preponderance of the evidence, if a homicide is shown to have been committed by him, such circumstances to the satisfaction of the jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him," this court does not commend the use of the expression that it is incumbent upon the accused to make out his defense by a preponderance of the evidence; and especially is this true where the defense was that the homicide was accidental, rather than intentional.

(a) If a homicide is proved, and the evidence adduced to establish it shows neither mitigation nor justification, malice will be presumed from the proof of the homicide; but the presumption is rebuttable, and may be overcome by evidence of alleviation or justification. If the evidence adduced to establish the homicide presents two conflicting theories, one of malice and the other an absence of malice, it becomes a question of fact to be decided by the jury as to which aspect of the evidence is the real truth of the occurrence. Where the only evidence adduced by the state to show that the accused committed the homicide consists of proof of a dying declaration by the deceased that he killed her, and proof of a statement made by him in which he stated that he killed her, but that it was an accident, the charge set out in the preceding headnote (except in regard to the point therein dealt with as to the charge in regard to the preponderance of evidence) cannot be held to be error requiring a new trial; but, on a new trial, the distinction between the different rules of law applicable where the proof of the homicide rests upon a statement of the accused proven by the state, which includes in itself exculpation, and where the homicide is proved by evidence which does not also include exculpation or mitigation, should be more clearly made. Futch v. State, 90 Ga. 472 (8), 490, 481, 16 S. E. 102; Mann v. State, 124 Ga. 760, 762, 53 S. E. 324, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934.

4. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Except as pointed out in the preceding notes, no error requiring a new trial appears in any of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, or of the amendment thereto.

Error from Superior Court, Terrell County; W. C. Worrell, Judge.

Sell Boyd was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant) was convicted of murder, and to the refusal of his motion for a new trial he excepted.

The evidence on behalf of the state was substantially as follows:

Frank Bowen testified that while sitting in his house, at about 7 o'clock at night, October 21, 1909, he heard a gun fire, and on going out found the deceased lying on the edge of the road just outside of his yard, with a wound about the size of a silver dollar in her stomach. The wound was inflicted by the firing of a shotgun, and was just "a bit to the right of the stomach." When the gun fired, he was 75 or 80 feet from where the deceased was found, and the noise of the gun appeared to come from this place. When he reached her body, no one else was there, and no weapon was near her. "She said something about Sell [the defendant] shooting her, some way or other; but I don't remember how she brought that in. . . . The deceased was his (defendant's) wife, or the woman he was living with as his wife. She lived 15 or 20 minutes after I found her. She lived about 150 or 200 yards from that place on a plantation road. I examined the place where her dress was struck by the load. It was powder-burned. I examined enough to see whether there was any wound on the back side. I noticed that there was a knot pushed higher up on her back than the wound in front. I felt of it. It felt like shot. Her husband came in about 20 or 30 minutes, and stayed there until Mr. Lewis came and brought him to town. * * * This man and woman had been getting along fairly well, as well as negroes generally get along, before the time of the shooting. They had a few little disputes since I had been there. * * * Sell Boyd said at the coroner's inquest that they were tussling over a gun, and she got shot; and that is all that I remember having heard him say at the coroner's inquest. He said that she was drinking, and that she had started up towards your house with the gun; that he overtook her, and told her to give him that gun; that he caught hold of it, and she jerked back; and that the gun went off accidentally. Sell Boyd said at the coroner's inquest that the shooting was an accident; that he was simply trying to get the gun away from her when it fired; that she snatched the gun when he caught hold of it, and that it was all an accident; that she went out of the house and carried the gun, and was going up towards my house when he overtook her and tried to take the gun away from her; that, to the best of my recollection, he said at the coroner's inquest that she was drinking, and what I am now talking about, is what Sell Boyd said at the coroner's inquest. * * * He said that she was leaving the house, and that he followed her, and that in trying to take the gun away from her it went off. * * * I saw Sell Boyd that night after the shooting. He was very little drunk. He may have had a drink. I would not say that he was drunk. I could smell some whisky on him, and her, too. I smelt some whisky on him. I smelt whisky on Ella Boyd, too."

R. B. McLain testified that he was a member of the coroner's jury which held an inquest on the body of the deceased in the house in which she and the defendant lived. "There was a little single-barrel breech-loading shotgun exhibited to us, with which they told us the killing was done. Sell Boyd, I believe, said it was the gun. * * * I think that Sell brought the gun in there. * * * Sell Boyd, at the same time and place in which he told me that this was the gun that the shooting was done with, told me that his wife took the gun and started up the road, and he followed her up there, and attempted to take the gun away from her, and in the tussle it went off. * * * My recollection is that he stated that she went off up the road with the gun, and he followed her, and he followed her up and attempted to take the gun away from her, and the gun went off. He said that, in tussling over the gun, the gun went off. I think that Sell Boyd said, in that same conversation, that he did not intend to kill her."

C. P. Buchanan, the coroner, testified that he failed to find any "powder stains or burns about the wound, if there were any. * * * I examined a dark skirt, and around that hole in the skirt was some sand and dirt. The clothing was not on her at the time I examined them. They had been taken off of her. The woman had been re-dressed at the time I examined her. The clothing that she had worn at the time that she had been shot was on the floor, by the window. They were bloody. The hole in the garments that I examined looked to be about the same size of the hole in the body. The dark skirt had some dirt on it, but I saw no signs of powder stains. The skirt I examined was a dark skirt, and I suppose it was an outer garment. * * * It had dirt, or sand, or something of that nature, on it. * * * I don't know that the clothes I examined were the clothes that she had on at the time she was shot. * * * I can't swear whether that was a skirt or a dress that I found the hole in. I cannot swear positively what part of the stomach that wound was in. I don't know exactly whether it was below the waist, along where the skirt hangs."

The defendant introduced no testimony, and made no statement upon the trial.

LEWIS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 174*)—ISSUES AND PROOF—MURDER—DECREE.

In the crime of murder, the punishment of the principal in the first and second degree is the same, and no distinction need be made between them in the indictment; and the conviction of one of several indicted for murder as principals in the first degree is lawful, though the evidence shows him guilty only as principal in the second degree. McLeod v. State, 128 Ga. 17 (3), 57 S. E. 83; Bradley v. State, 128 Ga. 20, 57 S. E. 237.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 540; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 429*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Will Bruner, Sol Lewis, and Jim Wilkerson were indicted for murder as principals in the first degree. Upon the trial of the plaintiff in error, Sol Lewis, the evidence was sufficient to authorize a finding that Will Bruner was guilty of murder as principal in the first degree, and that Sol Lewis was present, aiding and abetting him in the commission of the crime, and that he was therefore guilty of murder as principal in the second degree. Held, that upon the trial of Sol Lewis it was not error to allow the state to introduce in evidence the indictment and the verdict thereon of guilty as to Will Bruner. Studstill v. State, 7 Ga. 2; Jackson v. State, 54 Ga. 439; Bruce v. State, 99 Ga. 50, 25 S. E. 760.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

(a) It was not error to refuse to allow the defendant to introduce in evidence the motion for a new trial made by Will Bruner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 429.*]

3. INSTRUCTION HELD PROPER.

In view of the entire charge, the following charge of the court was not error requiring a new trial: "Should you believe from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant Sol Lewis, either by himself or acting in concert with Will Bruner, in Terrell county, on or about the 24th day of April, 1910, killed Silas Sutton with malice aforethought, either expressed or implied, in the manner set forth in this indictment, you would be authorized to convict him; otherwise, not."

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1122*)—APPEAL—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW.

One ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred in charging the jury on the subject of conspiracy as set forth and recited in the charge, which was duly reported, approved, and filed as a part of the record in said case, and which is hereby referred to as part hereof." Held that, the charge excepted to not being copied, or its substance set forth in the motion, or in an exhibit thereto properly identified, this ground presents no question for consideration by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2940-2945; Dec. Dig. § 1122.*]

5. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

There is no merit in the ground that the charge of the court, "taken as a whole, put the case too strongly against the defendant Sol Lewis, and was more favorable to the state than to the defendant."

6. VERDICT SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

The evidence warranted the verdict.

TURNER v. WOODWARD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 150*)—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTION WITH DECEDENT — "ASSIGNEE OR TRANSFEREE OF THE TITLE."

An equitable action was brought by a man, alleging that by a deed absolute on its face he had conveyed land to his wife to secure an indebtedness, which he had paid off; that she had destroyed the security deed, supposing that this reinvested him with title, and had subsequently made to him a conveyance in the form of a deed of bargain and sale, but without an order of court approving it; that subsequently she had conveyed the land to her daughter by deed of gift, which the plaintiff sought to cancel as a cloud on his title. Held, that the grantee in the deed of gift was an "assignee or transferee of the title," within the meaning of Civ. Code 1910, § 5858, par. 1, and the plaintiff was incompetent as a witness to testify to transactions between himself and his deceased wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 653-657; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

2. NONSUIT PROPERLY GRANTED.

The evidence failed to sustain the allegations of the petition, and there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by Geo. B. Turner against M. A. G. Woodward. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

T. L. Griner and Hines & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. A. F. Daley, H. P. Howard, and P. L. Wade, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Turner brought an equitable action against Mrs. Woodward, seeking to have a deed which had been made by Mrs. Turner to Mrs. Woodward canceled and the title of the plaintiff decreed to be perfect. The case has been to this court on exception to the sustaining of a demurrer. Turner v. Woodward, 133 Ga. 467, 66 S. E. 160. The plaintiff alleged that he had borrowed money from his wife and had made a deed to her to secure the loan, though the deed was absolute in form; that he had paid the loan, and his wife had destroyed the deed, intending thereby to reinvest the title in him; that his wife thereafter made a conveyance to him by deed of bargain and sale, with warranty of title, but no bargain and sale was in fact made, and such conveyance was not allowed by order of the superior court; that subsequently she executed to her daughter, Mrs. Woodward, a deed of gift. An amendment was made, to the effect that the deed of Mrs. Turner to the plaintiff was a gift, inasmuch as he had paid all the money which she had loaned to him. This court construed such amendment as not substantially varying the allegations of the petition. Presiding Justice Evans said: "In the amendment it is alleged that the deed from the wife to the plaintiff was a gift; but in view of the other allegations we construe this averment to mean only that no consideration passed from the wife to the husband, other than the repayment of the wife's debt due to her by the husband." When the case came on again for trial, after the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the judge granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] 1. The court refused to permit the plaintiff to testify that the deed from his wife to him was a deed of gift to him from his wife, as he had given her this property; that he had made a previous deed to her, because she had given her notes to creditors of his, and was to make the title back when he paid these notes; that he had paid off such notes, and that she had then made this deed back to him. The objection raised was that the witness was incompetent to testify to such facts, because his wife was dead, and this suit was being defended by her assignee or transferee of the land in dispute. The court ruled correctly, under the decision in Hendrick v. Daniel, 119 Ga. 358, 46 S. E. 438, and Hendricks v. Allen, 128 Ga. 181, 57 S. E. 224.

It was contended that these decisions were in conflict with certain previous decisions, which were cited. To this contention we cannot agree. In Heard v. Phillips, 101 Ga. 691, 31 S. E. 216, 44 L. R. A. 369, a transferee of a bond for title had taken a deed from the obligor of the bond, and brought suit to recover possession of the premises, so conveyed to him by deed, from one who acquired possession under the original obligee, who was dead at the time of the trial. It was held that the defendant did not fall within any of the classes of persons excluded as witnesses by the terms of paragraph 1 of section 5269 of the Civil Code of 1895 (Civ. Code 1910, § 5858). In Ray v. Camp, 110 Ga. 818, 36 S. E. 242, it was held that, although one may have been a party defendant and interested in the result of a case instituted by the personal representative of a deceased person, such defendant was not incompetent to testify to what was said in a conversation had, not with him, but in his presence between the plaintiff's intestate and another; such conversation being neither a transaction nor a communication between the witness and the deceased. In Florida Central, etc., R. Co. v. Usina, 111 Ga. 697, 36 S. E. 928, it was held that when, in the trial of a suit against a corporation for a breach of contract, the terms of a contract between the defendant and a deceased individual not a party to the case were collaterally relevant, an agent of the defendant, who acted for it in making the contract with such individual was not, because of the death of the other contracting party, incompetent to testify with respect to the transaction. In Austin v. Collier, 112 Ga. 247, 37 S. E. 434, it was held that legatees under a will were not indorsees, assignees, or transferees, or personal representatives of the deceased, so as to render a plaintiff who sued to recover the land from them an incompetent witness. In Boynton v. Reese, 112 Ga. 354, 37 S. E. 437, a similar ruling was made as to an heir at law. In Harris v. Whitney, 112 Ga. 633, 37 S. E. 883, the suit as it came on for trial under a consent substitution of a party, was between a grantee of an intestate and his widow, claiming a year's support. It was held that the widow did not fall within the description of the statute, so as to render the grantee of the intestate an incompetent witness.

It will readily be seen that the facts of each of these cases differentiate it from the one now before us, and that there is no conflict between the decisions then made and that now rendered. It should also be noticed that they were rendered in cases which arose prior to the act of December 18, 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 57). This act added to the excluding paragraph of the section of the Code, to which reference has been made, these words, "whether such transactions or communications were had by such insane or deceased person with the party testifying or with any other person."

[2] 2. The evidence did not sustain the allegations of the petition, with or without the amendment, and there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

ABBOTT v. PADROSA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JURY (§ 75*)—EXCUSING JURORS UNTIL FUTURE DAY DURING TERM.

A judge of the superior court may, in his discretion, excuse 24 jurors, regularly impaneled and in attendance upon the court, until a future day during the term, when they shall appear to try a given cause then set for trial. Such jurors would not be "without power or authority to serve as such" at the time designated for the trial of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 384-390; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 118*)—TENANCY AT WILL.

Upon the trial of a dispossessionary warrant proceeding to evict a tenant holding over, it appeared from the uncontradicted evidence that the contract of rental was in parol. The plaintiff testified that the term was for one year. The defendant testified that it was for the balance of the current year, "with the privilege of another, and as long as I paid my rent." It also appeared that the plaintiff gave the two months' notice required by Civil Code 1910, § 3709, to the defendant to quit as a tenant at will. Held, under plaintiff's evidence, the term of defendant was ended, as the contract of rental was only for a year, which had expired; also that, according to the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 3693, the evidence of the defendant had the effect of constituting him a tenant at will. Accordingly, under either view of the disputed evidence, considered in connection with that which was uncontradicted, a verdict was demanded in favor of the plaintiff, and the court did not err in directing the jury to return such a verdict. In this connection, see Willis v. Harrell, 118 Ga. 906, 45 S. E. 794; Nicholes v. Swift, 118 Ga. 922, 45 S. E. 708.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 402-415; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The verdict being demanded under the defendant's testimony, it is unnecessary to pass upon rulings of the court upon which error was assigned in refusing to continue the case on his motion on account of an absent witness, who, if he had been present, would merely have corroborated defendant's testimony, and in excluding the testimony of a witness, which, if it had been admitted, would have had the same tendency.

TATE et al. v. CITY OF ELBERTON et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 864*)—INDEBTEDNESS—LIMITATION—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION.

By article 7, § 7, par. 1, of the Constitution (Civil Code 1910, § 6563), it is declared that the debt of a municipal corporation shall not exceed 7 per centum of the assessed value of all the taxable property therein; and no municipality shall incur any new debt, except for a temporary loan or loans to supply casual deficiencies of revenue, not to exceed one-fifth of 1 per centum of the assessed value of taxable property therein, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof at an election for that purpose, to be held as prescribed by law.

(a) The provision as to cities the debt of which did not exceed 7 per centum of the assessed value of the taxable property at the time of the adoption of the Constitution is not material in the present case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 864.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 864*)—INDEBTEDNESS—LIMITATION—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION.

A liability for a legitimate current expense may be incurred, provided there is at the time of incurring the liability a sufficient sum in the treasury of the municipality which may be lawfully used to pay the liability incurred, or if a sufficient sum to discharge the liability can be raised by taxation during the current year. Butts County v. Jackson Banking Co., 129 Ga. 801, 60 S. E. 149, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 567, 121 Am. St. Rep. 244.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 864.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 864*)—INDEBTEDNESS—LIMITATION—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION.

This does not authorize municipal authorities to borrow money (not to supply casual deficiencies of revenue) for the purpose of using it during the year in defraying current expenses as occasion may arise, and to give notes therefor.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 864*)—LIMITATION OF INDEBTEDNESS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Under the constitutional provision cited above, municipal officers have not the right to borrow money, except upon being authorized as therein provided, on the ground that the municipality has sources of revenue, such as charges for furnishing water and electric lights, and fines and forfeitures which may be imposed in a recorder's court, and the like, from which it is contemplated that money will arise which can be used to discharge such indebtedness.

5. INJUNCTION IMPROPERLY RESTRICTED.

Under the evidence adduced on the interlocutory hearing, it appeared that the municipal authorities had borrowed money and given notes therefor, and that such indebtedness was not created in the manner authorized by the Constitution. If the money obtained from such loan was traceable into the payment of legitimate municipal liabilities, and if any rights arose from such facts, either by way of implied contract or subrogation, such fact was not made to appear by the evidence contained in the record. It was therefore error to restrict the injunction against the payment of such notes to be used for that purpose by the money arising from a sale of bonds issued for street improvements and taxes arising from the levy for the year 1910.

(a) This was a proceeding brought by citizens and taxpayers to enjoin the municipal authorities from paying generally and specially certain debts alleged to be unconstitutional. It was not a proceeding by the holders of the claims nor were they parties to the proceeding.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 985*)—INDEBTEDNESS—PAYMENT.

There was testimony tending to show that the open accounts which the municipal authorities intended to pay were incurred for legitimate municipal expenses for the current year, and the presiding judge so treated them. If so, and they were within the constitutional limitation as stated in the previous headnotes, provision should have been made for their payment by taxation. If such provision were not so made, after applying the taxes levied for the year to the purposes specified in the levy, if there should be any residue, it could be applied to the payment of such claims and liabilities. Funds arising from other sources than taxation, if not required by law to be applied in some other particular direction, might also be used for the discharge of such liabilities.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 994*)—PAYMENT OF DEBTS ALLEGED TO BE UNCONSTITUTIONAL—ACTION FOR INJUNCTION—JUDGMENT.

The judge erred in restricting the interlocutory injunction relative to the payment of notes, as ruled in the fifth headnote, and also erred as to the open accounts in merely declaring that their payment should be enjoined, by use of the funds derived from the sale of bonds for street improvements and from taxation for the current year, "unless * * * from funds derived from the levy of taxes there should be funds that can lawfully be so applied, but they are not enjoined from paying said accounts out of any other funds in the treasury available for that purpose and which can legally be applied to the payment of such accounts." It was the duty of the judge to determine, so far as necessary for the purpose of granting or refusing the interlocutory injunction, whether the open accounts represented legitimate expenses as herein defined, and whether certain funds could be lawfully applied to their payment, and, if he so held, to state clearly to what funds he had reference, and not leave that open for determination by the defendants themselves.

BROWN v. DENNIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

This case was before this court on a former occasion. Brown v. Dennis, 133 Ga. 791, 66 S. E. 1080. The petition, which contained allegations in substance as disclosed in the former decision of the case, was not open to general demurrer; nor, under the ruling in the case of Nally v. Nally, 74 Ga. 669, 58 Am. Rep. 458, were any of the separate paragraphs of the petition subject to demurrer upon the ground of irrelevancy, indefiniteness, insufficiency, or immateriality of the allegations made in them.

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

There was no merit in the assignments of error upon the charge of the court, criticising certain portions of it as erroneous statements of the law, and complaining that it restricted the issues and improperly stated the defendant's contentions; nor was there merit in those assignments of error which complained of a failure to charge with respect to certain matters, nor in the assignments of error that criticised the charge as containing expressions of opinion upon questions of fact, and not being adjusted to the evidence.

3. OBJECTIONS TO TESTIMONY NOT TENABLE.

Objections urged to the admissibility of testimony of the plaintiff, as complained of in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth grounds of the amended motion for new trial, were properly overruled.

4. SECONDARY EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY OF FOUNDATION.

Evidence as to the authenticity and loss of a letter from the assured to the agent of the plaintiff, relating to a change of beneficiary in the policy, was sufficient to authorize the admission of parol evidence of its contents.

5. PRIOR DECISION CONTROLLING.

Upon its facts this case is controlled by the principles ruled in the case of Nally v. Nally, 74 Ga. 669, 58 Am. Rep. 458, as applied to the facts of that case disclosed by the original record of file in this court.

6. VERDICT AUTHORIZED BY EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

ATLANTA ICE & COAL CO. v. REEVES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 10*)—ABUSE OF CIVIL PROCESS.

One is liable in an action for malicious abuse of civil process who fraudulently procures a judgment upon a spurious claim, causes a fi. fa. to issue thereon, and directs the seizure of the plaintiff's property by a levying officer, which is averted only by the payment of the fraudulent judgment by the plaintiff's wife during his absence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 11, 12; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 48*)—PLEADING.

Allegations respecting the manner in which a judgment was fraudulently obtained, and the manner in which the payment of the same was exacted, are not irrelevant in a suit of the character described in the preceding headnote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 513*)—TORTS OF OFFICERS—ACTIONS—PLEADING—IDENTIFICATION OF AGENT.

Where a corporation is sought to be made liable in a tort action for the conduct of its agent, an allegation that such agent was "the agent in charge of" the office of the corporation sufficiently identifies the agent upon whose conduct the plaintiff in part bases his right to recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2017-2045; Dec. Dig. § 513.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by W. F. Reeves against the Atlanta Ice & Coal Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The suit was by W. F. Reeves against the Atlanta Ice & Coal Company. The exception is to the overruling of the general and special demurrers. In substance the plaintiff alleged that in July, 1909, he was served with a copy of a summons issued by the notary public and ex officio justice of the peace of the 1,026th district, G. M., Fulton county, Ga., in a suit instituted by the defendant against the plaintiff on an account for one dollar. Upon service of the suit the plaintiff's wife, at his request, took the copy of the suit and went to the office of the defendant and exhibited it to the agent in charge of the office, and informed him that there was evidently a mistake, as the plaintiff was not indebted in any manner to the defendant, and had never had an account with it. The agent of the defendant inspected the copy of the suit and assured the plaintiff's wife that it was a mistake, that the plaintiff was not indebted in any manner to the defendant, and that he would stop the suit, and that the plaintiff need not appear at the court to make defense. The copy of the suit was retained by the agent. Relying upon these statements, the plaintiff made no defense. Notwithstanding the assurances of the agent of the defendant that the judgment would not be taken against him, judgment was entered up and fi. fa. issued thereon. On December 10, 1909, the constable levied upon the household goods of the plaintiff, and was preparing to remove the goods. The plaintiff was away from home at the time, and his wife informed the constable of the foregoing facts, and requested him to wait and speak to the defendant's agent, or allow time for the plaintiff's wife to call him up over the telephone to speak to him about it. The constable refused all of these requests, and was proceeding to remove the household goods, when the plaintiff's wife, in order to prevent such removal, paid him the amount of the fi. fa. and the costs, to wit, $5.45. The constable was acting under the direction and instruction of the defendant. It is alleged that the constable carried with him a dray when he went to execute the levy, and that the plaintiff's neighbors saw the constable go to his house with the dray, and knew that it was his purpose to levy and carry away the household goods of the plaintiff, which conduct of the constable caused him much humiliation, anxiety, and mental suffering, by being placed in a false light before his neighbors. He denied that he was indebted to the defendant in any sum, and further alleged that "the acts of defendant in instituting the suit against petitioner, and in misleading petitioner, and in leading petitioner to believe that said suit would be dismissed and discontinued, and in willfully and fraudulently carrying on said suit to judgment after having represented that said suit would be discontinued, and in causing execution to be issued on said suit, and in causing the constable to go to petitioner's house with a dray to levy on and carry away petitioner's household goods, were done maliciously and with the purpose of injuring and damaging petitioner, and that there were aggravating circumstances accompanying both the acts and intentions of said defendant in said matter." The prayer was to recover actual and punitive damages.

Payne, Little & Jones, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Branch, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The wrong of which the plaintiff complains is the malicious abuse of civil process. The substance of the complaint is that the defendant fraudulently procured a judgment upon a spurious claim against the plaintiff, which judgment was maliciously and oppressively enforced by directing the seizure of the plaintiff's property, which was averted only by the payment of the fraudulent judgment by the plaintiff's wife during his absence. If civil process is unlawfully made use of for a purpose not justified by the law, this is an abuse for which an action will lie. Hathaway v. Smith, 117 Ga. 946, 43 S. E. 984; King v. Yarbray, 136 Ga. —, 71 S. E. 131; Barnett v. Reid, 51 Pa. 190, 88 Am. Dec. 574; Juchter v. Boehm, 67 Ga. 534. The general demurrer was properly overruled.

[2] There were many alleged grounds of special demurrer, most of which attacked certain allegations as immaterial. The narrative of facts upon which the plaintiff predicated his right to recover included the circumstances under which the fraudulent judgment was obtained, and its oppressive enforcement by the defendant. These allegations were neither irrelevant nor immaterial. The special demurrer, which called for the name of the agent of the defendant who is alleged to have given the assurance that the suit would be dismissed, was properly overruled.

[3] Where a corporation is sued for the tortious acts of its agents or servants, it is entitled to such notice as will serve to identify the person in connection with the transaction out of which the cause of action arises. This does not mean that the name of such agent must be given, or the particular designation of his official relation with the company, if the allegations sufficiently show the person intended. The defendant is a domestic corporation, sued in the county of its residence, and is informed that the agent alleged to have given assurance for the dismissal of the suit was that in charge of its office. This sufficiently identifies the person referred to. Riley v. W. & T. R. Co., 133 Ga. 413, 65 S. E. 890, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379. No ground of the special demurrer was meritorious.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. GRANT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON (§ 6*)—PLEADING.

Where a suit against a corporation is brought on account, and an itemized statement thereof is attached to the petition, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to set forth in the petition the grounds upon which he contends that the defendant is liable to pay him the account.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Action on, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 17*)—SPECIAL AGENT—AUTHORITY—NOTICE—MEDICAL AID.

One dealing with a special agent is bound to take notice of the extent of his authority.

(a) A physician, who, under a written contract between him and a railroad company, is thereby employed to give first medical attention to persons injured in the operation of the road of the company, when ordered by it to attend them, but by the terms of the contract of employment is prohibited from admitting any such persons "to hospital or private quarters on account of the company without specific authority from the head of the department to which such injury is accredited, or some other officer of the company," in the absence of such authority cannot bind the company by contracting with a hotel keeper to furnish, on its account, board and lodging for such injured persons, or for those in attendance on them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 36-38; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 22*)—RAILROADS (§ 25*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

Declarations of an agent are not admissible to prove his agency.

(a) The fact that the defendant, acting on the recommendation of the same physician, who, as claimed by the plaintiff, incurred the account with the plaintiff on which the present suit is brought, had on a previous occasion paid to the plaintiff the board of a person injured by the defendant, was an immaterial one, and proof thereof was inadmissible.

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by B. W. Grant against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Robt. McMillan and A. G. & Julian McCurry, for plaintiff in error. J. C. Edwards, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The defendant in error (hereinafter called the plaintiff) brought suit against the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant), alleging that the defendant was a corporation having an office and doing business in the county in which the suit was brought, and was "indebted to petitioner in the sum of $123 on account, a copy of which is hereto attached and made a part of this paragraph and petition, and marked 'Exhibit A.'" The account attached to the petition was as follows: "Southern Railway Company, in Account with B. W. Grant, Prop'r Hotel Grant, Cornelia, Ga. To board for injured boys, Tom Brock and Gordon Logan, and for nurses, assistants, and doctors for the same, from March 16 to April 5, 1907. To one week's board for Gordon Logan $10.00." Here followed other items, consisting of charges for board, for a specified time, for named persons, and the amounts respectively charged for the same, except that in two items the persons named were described as nurses, assistants, or physicians. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and to the order of the court refusing the defendant a new trial it excepted.

[1] 1. The defendant made a motion to dismiss the action, on the ground that the petition "contained no allegation showing any legal liability of the defendant for the payment of the account sued on; and that the pleadings did not set forth a prima facie case of liability of defendant for the payment of the account sued on." Exceptions pendente lite were filed to the ruling of the court overruling this motion, and error was assigned thereon in the bill of exceptions. The court committed no error in overruling the motion to dismiss the petition. The plaintiff had the right to bring the suit upon an account, attaching to his petition a bill of particulars or statement of the account, and to recover upon proof of an express or implied promise to pay the same. If, as in this case, the account be against a corporation, and it was not in fact incurred by it, or was incurred by one of its agents not authorized to bind it in that regard, there can be no recovery. If the account was incurred by some agent authorized to bind the corporation, but not its agent to make payment, it would be the duty of the agent to notify the proper authorities of the corporation to discharge it; and if the agent failed to so notify them, they would nevertheless be charged with knowledge of its existence, knowledge of the acts of an agent within the scope of his authority being in law imputed to his principal. Under either view, the corporation cannot require more specific pleading in a suit against it of this character than would be required of a plaintiff bringing a like suit against an individual defendant. It was unnecessary to set forth in the petition the grounds upon which the plaintiff claimed the defendant was liable to him on the account upon which the suit was brought. Talbotton Railroad Co. v. Gibson, 106 Ga. 229, 234, 32 S. E. 151; Jackson v. Bulce, 132 Ga. 51, 63 S. E. 823; 1 Cyc. 778.

made no contract with the plaintiff on behalf of the company to board and lodge Brock and Logan, or any other person; that he had no authority to make such a contract; that under his contract with the railroad company his authority as surgeon or agent of the company was so limited that he had no authority to bind the company by virtue of any contract which the plaintiff contended was made; and that he made no such contract. The defendant introduced the contract between it and its surgeon, Hathcock.

The brief of evidence sets forth the following provisions of the contract as being the ones material to be considered: "Said contract, after being a contract entered into January 1, 1902, between the Southern Railway Company and Jiles Hathcock, as surgeon of said road, fixing the fees for service, and regulations governing said surgeons when employed by the Southern Railway Company, after fixing fees for services, provides as follows, to wit: In all cases of injury to employes, passengers, or others, when first or temporary attention is ordered, first attention should be construed as authorizing the surgeon to control hemorrhages and relieve pain and shock, together with temporary aseptic and surgical dressing. The patient should then be turned over to his friends, or, in the case of tramps, to the authorities or charitable institutions. When temporary attention is ordered, no further expense will be incurred or paid by the company; and surgeons are requested to strictly comply with this rule. A surgeon is an agent of the company only after he has been properly called, and then limited as to such to the immediate necessities of the injury. When attention is rendered to persons not in the employ of the company, or in its employ and the accident be due to the carelessness of the person, the surgeon, after having been notified by the company that it does not hold itself responsible for any claim for damages sustained by such injured person, may present his bill for a reasonable sum for such attendance to such person for payment; but the company shall not be liable for the payment of such bill. No case of injury must be admitted to hospital or private quarters on account of the company without specific authority from the head of the department to which such injury is accredited, or some other officer of the company." There was other evidence introduced; but, under the view we take of the case, we deem it unnecessary to set forth the same.

There was no testimony to show that Hathcock was a general agent of the railroad company. The evidence shows that, when he was sent by the company to attend Brock and Logan (injured on its railroad), the written contract between him and the company was in force. This contract shows that Hathcock was a special agent of the company when he rendered services for it to the injured parties. Under this contract, "without specific authority" from one of those referred to in the contract, he had no authority to make a contract by which the company would be bound to pay for the board and lodging of the injured persons, or of any one nursing or otherwise rendering them services in a "hospital or private quarters." By the express terms of the contract such authority was denied him. The contract provides: "No case of injury must be admitted to hospital or private quarters on account of the company, without specific authority from the head of the department to which such injury is accredited, or some other officer of the company." No officer of the company, specially or otherwise, authorized any one to admit either of the injured parties "to private quarters on account of the company," nor did the head of any department do so. If Hathcock made the contract with Grant which the latter testified he made, he had no authority to do so; and the evidence does not show that such a contract, if made, was ratified by any agent or officer of the company. It is well settled that any one dealing with a special agent is bound to take notice of the extent of his authority. Inman v. Crawford, 116 Ga. 63, 42 S. E. 473; Americus Oil Co. v. Gurr, 114 Ga. 624, 40 S. E. 780. In this case Hathcock was a special agent of the company, without authority to bind the company by any agreement that the company would pay for the board and lodging of the injured parties, or any one serving them, and Grant was bound to take notice of the lack of such authority. If Hathcock made such an agreement, the company was not bound by it. In 2 Cyc. 1044, it is said: "A railroad physician or surgeon, employed by the corporation to render professional services to its servants or other persons injured in the operation of the road, cannot, in the absence of express authority, engage the services of others at the expense of the company to attend such injured persons or furnish them with the necessary supplies." See Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Price, 106 Ga. 176, 32 S. E. 77, 43 L. R. A. 402, 71 Am. St. Rep. 246; Bond v. Hurd, 31 Mont. 814, 78 Pac. 579; Mayberry v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. (Mo.) 11 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cases, 29, and cases cited in note on page 30; 1 Elliott on Railroads, §§ 222-225.

The ruling we make does not conflict with the decisions, referred to in 2 Cyc. 1044, and 1 Elliott on Railroads, § 222, to the effect that subordinate officers or agents of a railroad company are clothed with the powers of the corporation itself for the purposes of meeting an immediate emergency when a person is injured on the road, nor with the principle that an agent's authority will be construed to include all necessary and usual means for effectually executing it. The record does not show that the company held Hathcock out as its agent authorized to make the agreement which Grant says he made, or that he was apparently acting within the scope of his authority in making such contract, if he made it. The evidence shows that Hathcock was a special agent, and, if he made such an agreement, in doing so he was acting without the scope of his authority and the company is not bound by it. The court erred in refusing the written request of counsel for the defendant to give certain instructions to the jury, which request was properly constructed and was in conformity to the principles above announced. The charge of the court of which complaint is made in one ground of the motion for a new trial was not in accord with the ruling herein made, and was error.

[3] 3. Complaint is made that the court erred in admitting the following testimony of a witness for the plaintiff: "I had a conversation with Dr. Hathcock about Tom being here at the Grant Hotel. He told me that he was an agent of the Southern Railway. I don't know as I can say in what capacity; he said he was a railroad agent or doctor for the railroad." It was error to admit this testimony, as the fact that one is agent for another cannot be proved by the declarations of the former.

Complaint is also made that the court erred in admitting the following testimony of the plaintiff: "The Southern Railway paid the expenses of Addison staying at my house at the time he was hurt." It appears from the testimony that, before Brock and Logan were injured, one Addison was injured, and was taken to the hotel of the plaintiff, who was paid for boarding him by the defendant on the recommendation of Hathcock after he left the hotel. This testimony was irrelevant, and should have been excluded. There was no effort to show, nor any contention, that it was the custom of the company to pay for boarding persons injured by it, and those attending them, or that it had ever done so, except in the instance above referred to, where Addison was injured by the company, and it paid his board upon the recommendation of Hathcock.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. et al. v.
ROBERTS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 10, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§§ 36, 49*)—SEPARABLE
CONTOVERSY—JOINDER OF PARTIES.

An action, brought in a state court by a resident plaintiff against a nonresident railroad corporation and certain of its servants, some of whom are residents, jointly, to recover damages in excess of $2,000 on account of alleged personal injuries to the plaintiff, involves no separable controversy between the plaintiff and the nonresident defendants, entitling the latter to remove the cause on that ground to the Circuit Court of the United States, where the declaration states a prima facie case of joint and concurrent liability against all of the defendants.

(a) Even though one of the defendants may have been alleged, in the petition for removal, to have been fraudulently joined for the purpose of defeating the right of removal, this will not destroy the right of the state court to retain a case in which there remains a proper party defendant who resides in its jurisdiction, and who is jointly liable with the other defendants sued for the injuries of the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Cherokee County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by J. B. Roberts against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and others. From an order refusing to grant a removal to the federal court, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Tye, Peeples & Jordan and D. W. Blair, for plaintiffs in error. R. R. Arnold, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The defendant in error brought suit in the state court against the plaintiffs in error, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, Thomas Jarvis, and two other defendants, who were employees of the railroad company. The railroad company and Jarvis, alleging they were nonresidents, filed petition and bond to remove the case to the United States Circuit Court on the ground that a separable controversy was presented between them and the plaintiff. The court declined to grant an order of removal, and they excepted.

In the original petition the plaintiff alleged that he was injured in a wreck caused by the train on which he was a passenger running into a washout. He charged negligence on the part of one defendant (the engineer) in running at a dangerous rate of speed and in failing to keep a proper lookout, so as to discover the washout in time to prevent the wreck; negligence on the part of another defendant (the fireman) in failing to keep a proper lookout, and, though he discovered the washout, in failing to take any steps to stop the train; and negligence on the part of another defendant (the section boss) in failing to perform his duty of "keeping up the track," and in failing to inspect it and discover the alleged washout. The alleged acts of negligence on the part of these various defendants were detailed, and it was averred: "In each and all of the particulars herein mentioned the defendant railroad company was negligent, through its engineer, Dobbs, through its fireman, Jarvis, and through its section boss, Casteel, and their joint and combined negligence caused the said wreck and consequent injury to plaintiff." The allegations of the petition did not make a separable controversy between the plaintiff and the nonresident defendants, giving the latter the right to remove the case to the federal court. Vanzant v. So. Ry. Co. 135 Ga. 444, 69 S. E. 721, and authorities therein cited.

In the petition for removal it was averred that the allegations of negligence as to the section boss, one of the resident defendants, were falsely and fraudulently made, and that the only object in joining such defendant was to defeat the right of petitioners to have the case removed to the United States court. These allegations do not affect the right of removal, there being still another defendant (the engineer) alleged in the petition bringing the suit to be a resident, and with respect to whom no allegation of fraudulent joinder is made in the petition for removal, or that his residence is falsely stated in the original petition. In the petition bringing the suit it was alleged that the engineer "was negligently running at a speed, at this dangerous part of the track, of from 25 to 30 miles per hour, and, as representing said railroad company, he negligently failed to avail himself of a view which he had of said washout and defective place in the track for fully 200 to 300 yards ahead, within which time he could have stopped his train or reduced its speed to where there would have been no wreck and no injury to any person. * * * The defendant Jarvis, representing said railroad company as fireman on said engine, negligently failed to keep a proper lookout ahead, and, had he done so, would have discovered said washout, and in fact did discover it, but negligently failed to take any steps to bring the train to a stop, or to slow up the speed thereof." The engineer, a resident defendant, was jointly liable with the company and the fireman, alleged in their petition for removal to be nonresident defendants. Vanzant v. So. Ry. Co., supra; So. Ry. Co. v. Miller, 1 Ga. App. 616, 57 S. E. 1090; Id., 217 U. S. 209, 30 Sup. Ct. 450, 54 L. Ed. 732; Eining v. Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co., 123 Ga. 458, 66 S. E. 237. If the section boss was not liable, and this fact was known to the plaintiff, who falsely and fraudulently joined him as a defendant to prevent removal of the case to the federal court, or if the section boss had never been joined as a defendant, the petition for removal filed by the company and the fireman, who were alleged therein to be nonresidents, was not sustainable; no allegation of fraudulent joinder of the engineer as a defendant, or that he was not in fact, a resident, being made in the petition for removal, and the original petition alleging acts of negligence making jointly liable for the injuries received by the plaintiff the engineer, the company, and the fireman.

Judgment affirmed.

AULD v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 10, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The act of crossing from one car platform to another on a moving train is not per se negligence, in the absence of a rule or notice warning the passengers from such act. A passenger who undertakes to go from one car to another while the train is in motion assumes only the risk incident to such undertaking in the ordinary operation of the train; and if such passenger is injured by being thrown from the platform by a sudden jerk, questions of negligence of the defendant in causing the injury and of the passenger's contributory negligence are for the jury.

2. CARRIERS (§ 317*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—PASSING FROM ONE CAR TO ANOTHER.

In a suit against a carrier for an injury to a passenger from being precipitated from a moving train while crossing from one coach to another, testimony of a known usage or custom of passengers to cross is competent evidence, not to justify or excuse the passenger from attempting to cross when it would be an obviously hazardous act, but as illustrating the character and nature of the act as bearing on the passenger's alleged contributory negligence in crossing.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 473*)—OPINION EVIDENCE.

If data supplied by a witness can be placed before the jury in such a way that they may draw the inference as well as the witness, it is superfluous to add by way of testimony the inference which the jury may well draw for themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2220-2223; Dec. Dig. § 473.*]

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by W. N. Auld, administrator of Eliza Auld, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Burton Smith, for plaintiff in error. McDaniel, Alston & Black, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. W. N. Auld, administrator of Mrs. Eliza Auld, brought suit, in the superior court of De Kalb county, against the Southern Railway Company, to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of the plaintiff's intestate. The injury resulting in Mrs. Auld's death occurred in the state of South Carolina, and the action was in virtue of a South Carolina statute authorizing suit by an administrator. The plaintiff was consulted.

The substance of the evidence was that Mrs. Auld, a married woman, 44 years of age, the mother of seven children, on the day previous to her death had been discharged from a sanitarium, and was returning to her home in company with her husband and brother. She had been in failing health for two or three years before being sent to the sanitarium. She was despondent, morose, and gloomy. At the time of her injury her mental and physical health was a great deal better than it had been. Her party boarded the cars of the defendant at Toccoa, Ga. The particular coach in which she entered was vestibuled. The coach in the rear was not vestibuled. The train was about two hours behind time. The country traversed by the defendant's road was mountainous. The train was running fast, trying to catch up the lost time. A passenger testified that the husband and brother were in the rear coach; that he observed her leave her seat, and go to the rear of the car, and pass through the door. * * * As she left the door there was a sudden plunge or jerk of the train, and we all had to hold our seats, just at the point she was thrown from the train." She was found lying near the track in an unconscious condition, and died from her injuries. One of the plaintiff's witnesses testified that "the train was about two hours late that night," and in the absence of any other testimony on the subject we infer that the injury occurred at night.

[1] 1. It is not negligence as matter of law for a passenger to pass from one coach to another while the train is in motion. Whether or not a passenger is negligent in so doing depends upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Cotchett v. S. & T. Ry. Co., 84 Ga. 687, 11 S. E. 553; A. S. Ry. Co. v. Snider, 118 Ga. 146, 44 S. E. 1005. Some early cases may be found in other jurisdictions in which it is said that a passenger's attempt to cross the platforms between the coaches while the train was running was a negligent act. The later cases are harmonious that it is not per se negligence for a passenger to go from one coach to another while the train is in motion. The modern view results from the great improvement in constructing cars, and the tacit or implied invitation by railroad companies in the make-up of the trains, including a smoking car, a dining car, and other coaches, that the passenger may pass from one to the other for his comfort or convenience. A passenger who undertakes to pass from one coach to another while the train is running assumes the risk of injury caused by the ordinary movements of the train. If he is injured in his effort to go from one car to another, and the railway company is not guilty of negligence proximately causing the injury, the passenger cannot recover. Hicks v. Ga. So. & Fla. Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 304, 32 S. E. 880. Or, if the railway company is negligent, and the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences thereof by the use of ordinary care and diligence, he cannot recover. Blitch v. Central R. Co., 76 Ga. 333; So. Ry. Co. v. Strickland, 130 Ga. 779, 61 S. E. 826. The circumstances attending the injury to the plaintiff's intestate, as developed on the trial, were sufficient to make a prima facie case against the carrier, and the burden was upon it to overcome the imputation of negligence or to show the passenger's contributory negligence. It appeared from the testimony that the train was behind time and running fast to catch up the lost time, and that it gave a sudden plunge and jerk as Mrs. Auld passed to the platform. These facts are not conclusive that Mrs. Auld was thrown or fell from the train by a jerk usual and incident to the ordinary operation of the train. Under the rule just stated, it was a question for the jury to determine whether the defendant was negligent in the operation of the train, and whether under all the circumstances the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of such negligence in undertaking to pass from one coach to another as would defeat a recovery. Branan v. So. Ry. Co., 135 Ga. 24, 68 S. E. 793.

[2] 2. A witness was examined by interrogatories. He was asked: "If you say anything about her moving from one place to another, state how and where she moved. State whether or not there was any custom with reference to moving. If so, what was the custom? Answer fully." To which he replied: "I saw her get up and start back through the car, and as she passed the door I did not see her any more. It is the custom of passengers to go from one car to another whenever they want to, and go to the toilet whenever they want to go." The court excluded the following part of the answer: "It is the custom of passengers to go from one car to another whenever they want to, and to go to the toilet whenever they want to go." We do not think that the question was too indefinite to apprise the defendant of an effort to prove a custom or usage among the passengers to go from one car to another of a moving train. It is competent to show a known usage or custom of passengers to pass from one car to another while in motion, not so much as an act of license by the defendant, but as explanatory of the custom and usage of passengers on moving trains. If passengers commonly go from one car to another, the very commonness of the custom tends to show that it is known to the defendant. Of course, no custom to do an obviously dangerous act will excuse contributory negligence; but, as we have seen, this court cannot say as matter of law that it is negligence to go from one car to another.

[3] 3. The court refused to allow a witness to testify that, from certain facts which he enumerated, it was his opinion that the jerk of the car threw Mrs. Auld from the train. There was no error in this. The jury were as competent to draw the deduction from the facts as the witness. Taylor v. State, 135 Ga. 622, 70 S. E. 237.

DAVIS & BRANDON v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CARRIERS (§ 181½, * New, vol. 12, Key No. Series)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTION—NATURE.

Under a proper construction of the petition, the suit in this case was not brought to recover damages for a breach of contract of carriage, or for a breach of the common-law duty of a common carrier, but was based on sections 2771 and 2772 of the Code of 1910, which require common carriers, on application by a shipper, to trace freight which may have been lost, damaged, or destroyed, and to inform the applicant in writing, within 30 days, of the time, place, and manner of the loss, damage, or destruction, and the names of the parties, and their official position, if any, by whom such facts can be established, and which provide that, on failure to do so, the carrier shall be liable for the value of the freight lost, damaged, or destroyed, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said loss, damage, or destruction occurred on its own line.

2. CARRIERS (§ 185*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—FAILURE TO TRACE PLACE—ACTION—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In such an action, although the bill of lading stated that it was subject to the conditions on the face and back thereof, and was signed by the shipper, as well as the agent of the carrier, and although one of the conditions on the back thereof was that no carrier should be liable for loss or damage not occurring on its portion of the route, it would not defeat a recovery to show that the initial carrier delivered the property in good order to the next connecting carrier for transportation to its destination. Evidence to show such fact was inadmissible, over objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 180*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—FAILURE TO TRACE—ACTION.

A bill of lading, which was signed both by the shipper and the agent of the carrier, contained on its face a statement that the property shipped was received subject to the conditions on the face and back of such bill. On the back of the bill, among the printed conditions, was the following: "Claims for loss or damage must be made in writing to the agent at the point of delivery promptly after the arrival of the property, and if delayed for more than 30 days after the delivery of the property, or after due time for the delivery thereof, no carrier hereunder shall be liable in any event." At the bottom of the conditions was printed the following: "N. B.—All claims for loss or damage to freight, or for overcharge under this bill of lading, will be promptly investigated upon application to O. B. Bidwell, Jr., freight claim agent, Portsmouth, Va., with original bill of lading and paid freight bill attached." An action was brought against the initial carrier, under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 2771, 2772. Held, that the fact that the demand for tracing was made more than 30 days after the arrival of the goods at their destination did not authorize a nonsuit.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 242*)—EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 8*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF BILLS OF EXCEPTION.

Where the plaintiff introduced evidence to show the market value of goods shipped at the point of shipment and also at the point of destination, and that they arrived in a damaged condition and were of less value than the market value at either place, but the presiding judge granted a nonsuit, on the ground that he was not entitled to recover at all, a mere general statement in the bill of exceptions that, during the introduction of evidence by the plaintiff, the court "held" that under a provision in the bill of lading the measure of damages would be fixed with reference to the market value at the point of shipment, rather than at the point of destination, without more, stated no such actual ruling or judgment as to invoke a decision of this court thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1417-1425; Dec. Dig. § 242; * Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Error from Superior Court, Camden County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by Davis & Brandon against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. D. Meader, for plaintiff in error. Crovatt & Whitfield, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Davis & Brandon brought suit against the Seaboard Air Line Railway, alleging that they made a shipment of potatoes from a station on the line of the defendant to a point on the line of another connecting carrier; that demand was made upon the initial carrier to trace the freight and make a report to the shipper, as provided by the statute; that there was a failure to comply with this demand; and that suit was brought accordingly against the defendant for the difference between the market value of the potatoes at the time and place when they should have been delivered and their value as delivered. After both sides had closed their evidence, the defendant moved for the direction of a verdict in its favor. The court declined to give such direction, but granted a nonsuit. The plaintiff excepted.

[1] This was not an action for damages arising out of a breach of the contract of carriage, or from a breach of the common-law duty resting upon the carrier. It was distinctly an action based upon the statutory provisions contained in Civil Code 1910, §§ 2771, 2772. In McCall v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 602, 605, 48 S. E. 157, it was said that the liability of a railroad company under these sections is not incidental to the transportation of the freight, springing out of the contract of affreightment, but is in the nature of a penalty, prescribing damages for noncompliance with a statutory duty; that the initial carrier may have performed its contract to carry and deliver the freight in good order to its connecting carrier; yet if the freight was delayed, damaged, or destroyed after leaving its possession, the refusal to trace and give the information required by the statute would give a cause of action against the initial carrier.

[2] Following this ruling, a provision in the bill of lading, although the contract was signed by the shipper, to the effect that each carrier should only be liable for loss or damage occurring on its portion of the route did not furnish a defense to such action; nor was evidence admissible to show that in fact the carrier who failed to trace the freight, as required by the statute, had delivered the potatoes in good order to the connecting line.

[3] Neither did the provision of the bill of lading that claims for loss or damage must be made in writing to the agent at the point of delivery promptly after arrival of the property, "and if delayed for more than 30 days after the delivery of the property or after due time for the delivery thereof, no carrier hereunder shall be liable in any event," limit the right of the shipper to make demand upon the initial carrier to trace the freight in accordance with the statute. Even if it were otherwise, considering together the two statements contained in the printed conditions on the back of the bill of lading which are quoted in the third headnote, it is not altogether certain as to what would be required of the shipper by one provision stating that a claim must be made for damages within 30 days upon the agent at the point of delivery, and a notice at the close of the printed conditions that all claims for loss or damage to freight would be promptly investigated upon application to the freight claim agent at Portsmouth, Va.

In view of what has been said, it will be seen that the presiding judge erred in granting a nonsuit. The granting of a nonsuit, after the close of the evidence introduced by both sides, and upon a motion for a direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant, was not altogether regular; but if a nonsuit were proper, this method of procedure would seem to furnish no ground for complaint on behalf of the plaintiff, who would only be cut off from proceeding with his case when he might have had a verdict directed finally barring him from suing again.

[4] The plaintiff introduced evidence to show the market value of the potatoes at the place of shipment and also at the place of delivery. One of the printed conditions on the back of the bill of lading was that "the amount of any loss or damage for which any carrier becomes liable shall be computed at the value of the property at the place and time of shipment under this bill of lading, unless a lower value has been agreed upon or is determined by the classification upon which the rate is based," etc. It was recited in the bill of exceptions that "the court held, during the introduction of the evidence for the plaintiffs," that under the terms of the bill of lading the measure of damages would be based upon the value of the potatoes at the point of shipment, rather than at the point of delivery, and to this exception was taken. Such a statement raises no question for decision by this court. There must be a concrete ruling or decision of some point or matter in the case, not a mere anticipatory announcement of the view of the judge, in order to furnish a subject-matter for exception. It does not appear that the judge excluded any evidence bearing on this point, or admitted any over objection, and that to such exclusion or admission exception was taken. He did not reach the point of charging the jury in the case. His grant of a nonsuit was not based upon what would have been the extent of the plaintiffs' recovery, had there been one, but upon his opinion that they were not entitled to recover at all. It is thus evident that the so-called "ruling" was not in fact a decision of any question practically applying to the case, but must have been some general announcement of the views of the judge on that subject. Moot questions cannot be brought to this court, but only actual rulings or decisions. We think it would be a bad precedent to have the decision of this court invoked upon mere theoretical questions, instead of actual rulings affecting the trial as it took place. If this were permitted, bills of exceptions might be filled with statements of the general views and opinions of the presiding judge in the trial court, announced in an anticipatory way, which might never ripen into actual rulings. It is actual, not anticipated, error which forms a subject of correction by a court of review. We must therefore decline to pass upon the question on which it is thus sought to obtain a ruling of this court, and which evidently played no part in the grant of a nonsuit in the court below.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BROOM v. GRIZZARD.GRIZZARD v. BROOM.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Under the pleadings and evidence in this case, the court properly refused to render a final judgment upon the hearing of the petition for certiorari, and properly remanded the case with appropriate directions.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. EASEMENTS (§ 36)—RIGHT OF WAY—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held not to show the acquisition of a right of way by prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. EASEMENTS (§ 27*)—RIGHT OF WAY—MERGER IN FEE.

One cannot have an easement upon his own property, since the lesser estate, represented by the easement, would be merged into the fee, upon which it was subservient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

4. EASEMENTS (§ 61*)—RIGHT OF WAY—ACTION TO ENFORCE—PLEADING.

In an action for obstructing an alleged private way, where the petition contained allegations pertinent to an application for removal of obstructions from a way that had been used for one year, and also alleged a right of way by prescription, defendant was entitled, upon demurrer, to have plaintiff show distinctly, by proper averments, whether his petition was based on Civ. Code 1910, § 819, relating to rights of the user of a way for as much as one year, or under section 824, relating to a prescriptive right of way.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by S. S. Grizzard against W. P. Broom. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error; defendant filing cross-exceptions. Affirmed on both bills.

J. F. Golightly and Jno. B. Suttles, for plaintiff in error. A. C. Broom, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. S. S. Grizzard filed his petition to the ordinary of Fulton county against W. P. Broom, alleging that the petitioner was the owner of a house and lot in said county; that there was a private way leading from his house to a certain road, known as the "chert road" from Atlanta to College Park, and that the defendant had obstructed the alleged private way by erecting a wire fence across it, so that petitioner and those who had been in the habit of traveling over the way could not pass over it; that defendant had given no notice of his intention to close the road; that petitioner and those under whom he claims have used the road for about 30 years, "and the same is a private way, which cannot be obstructed without legal steps." Thereupon the ordinary issued a rule nisi in terms of the statute. Broom demurred, on the ground that the petition set forth no cause of action, and specially on the ground that the petition did not locate the petitioner's house and lot with reference to the alleged private way, and did not show with sufficient particularity the location of the private way, the width of the same, when and at what times it had been repaired, who had been in the habit of traveling over it, who originally laid it out, and when it was laid out, and whether or not the present alleged private way was the same as had been originally laid out, and upon other grounds calling for greater particularity in the allegations of the petition. The plaintiff amended his petition, and alleged "that the said right of way has been worked by petitioner and kept in repair since he owned the place, to and for 14 months last past; that the persons under whom he claims, to wit, Mary A. Baugh and Edward Baugh and the East Point Land Company, all kept it in repair, and when it needed work they worked the same."

Upon the trial, there being evidence to show that the defendant had obstructed the way referred to in the petition, the ordinary rendered a judgment requiring the defendant to remove the obstructions. Upon the hearing of a petition for certiorari and answer, the judge of the superior court ordered that the certiorari be sustained, and the case be remanded for a new trial or hearing, holding that the demurrer ought to be sustained, with leave to amend; that under the pleadings the two remedies sought were set forth in such contradictory and confused manner as not to put the defendant on proper notice of what he had to defend. The plaintiff excepted, and the defendant took a cross-bill of exceptions.

[1] In the direct bill of exceptions error is assigned upon the order of the judge sustaining the certiorari, on the ground that the court erred in adjudging that the certiorari be sustained, and that upon the new hearing in the court of ordinary the demurrer be sustained, with leave to amend, and upon the further ground that the court erred in holding that the remedies sought under the petition to the ordinary are set forth in a contradictory and confused manner. In the cross-bill error is assigned upon the ground that the court should have sustained the certiorari and entered up a final judgment in favor of the defendant, without remanding the case for another hearing or direction that the plaintiff be allowed to amend his petition before the ordinary. We are of the opinion that the court below, upon the hearing of the petition for certiorari, passed the proper order.

of the party complained against. While there was evidence to authorize the finding by the ordinary that the road referred to had been continuously used for more than seven years, it clearly appears from the evidence that the use had been by those who were the owners of the land over which it passed. The house and lot of the complainant, Grizzard, and the lands of the defendant, had been the property of the East Point Land Company until the year 1904, when the defendant purchased the land from that company. The complainant purchased his house and lot in the year 1907. The land company, the immediate predecessor in title, had purchased the tract of land embracing both the lots of the complainant and defendant from Mary and Edward Baugh, who appeared to have been the owners of the entire property at the time when the way in controversy was first used.

[3] Certainly prior to the date of Broom's purchase from the land company, when the two tracts of land belonging, respectively, to Grizzard and to Broom, became the property of different owners, no prescriptive right of way could have been acquired over the tract of land now owned by Broom. Neither Baugh nor the land company, who owned the land over which the way passed, could acquire a way by prescription over their own land. "It is axiomatic that one cannot have an easement upon his own property, for the lesser estate, represented by the easement, will be merged into the fee, upon which it is subservient. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 433." Railway Co. v. Fleming, 118 Ga. 699, 45 S. E. 664. From the time when the use of the way by one who was not the owner of the land over which the way passed commenced, sufficient time had not elapsed for the establishment of a prescriptive right of way; and so far as relates to the contention of the complainant that he had a prescriptive right of way as against the defendant over the latter's land, there was an entire failure to support by evidence the allegation in the petition embodying this contention.

[4] But it is alleged in the petition that the road had been used for over one year, and that it had been closed up without giving the notice required by law. While it has been held that "proof that a private way which has been in use for more than one year has been obstructed without giving the 30 days' notice required by Civil Code 1895, § 673 (section 819, Civil Code 1910), will not authorize the ordinary to direct the removal of such obstructions upon an application for such removal, based solely on a prescriptive right to the use of such private way" (Kraley v. Nabors, 131 Ga. 457, 62 S. E. 527) the petition in the present case, as we have seen, contains allegations pertinent to an application for the removal of obstructions from a way that has been used for one year. The defendant in the case before the ordinary was entitled, upon demurrer, to have the complaining party show distinctly by proper averments whether his application was based on the provisions of section 819 of the Code of 1910, relating to the rights of the user of a way for as much as one year, or upon section 824, which relates to a prescriptive right of way. And this result could be accomplished under the order and judgment passed by the judge of the superior court upon the hearing of the petition for certiorari, upon which error is assigned in both the direct bill of exceptions and the cross-bill. Under that order the complaining party is compelled to state distinctly which cause of action he relies upon, and to eliminate the allegations which tend to confuse it with some other cause of action. Such is the meaning of the order passed by the judge of the superior court, and as such it should be given effect.

Judgment affirmed, on both bills. All the Justices concur.

SAME v. YOUNG.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

WORK AND LABOR (§§ 4, 20*)—VENUE (§ 22*)—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 21*)—EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—ACTS OF PUBLIC OFFICERS—SERVICES RENDERED UNDER COMPELSION—JOINDER OF PARTIES DEFENDANT—PARTIES.

The defendants in error brought separate suits against the same defendants, in Cobb superior court, making in their respective petitions substantially the following allegations: Two of the defendants resided in Cobb county and the other defendant in Fulton county. The defendants, and each of them, through agents, guards, and bosses named, and others "whose names petitioner cannot remember," took charge of and chained the plaintiff and caused him to do work in grading for a railroad for a specified time in 1906 and 1907. The defendants were jointly interested in the services rendered by the plaintiff, "and are jointly responsible to plaintiff for the value of said services so rendered and here sued for; the said defendants having jointly received the benefits of said services and having converted the same into cash. His labor was worth a stated sum, and he waives the tort and sues for the value of the services rendered. A verdict was rendered in each of the cases in favor of the plaintiff against all of the defendants, who complain that the court erred in overruling their demurrers and in refusing them a new trial. The two cases, being practically identical, are considered and decided together. It is held:

(1) If A. wrongfully compels B. to render him valuable services, B. can maintain against A. an action of assumpsit to recover their value; a promise to pay on the part of A. being implied in law. 1 Addison on Contracts, § 30 et seq.; 3 Addison on Contracts, § 1399; 2 Street on Foundation of Legal Liability, §§ 208, 209, 215, 217; 3 Street on Foundation of Legal Liability, 199; Patterson v. Crawford, 12 Ind. 241; Peter v. Steel, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 250; Greer v. Oritz, 53 Ark. 247, 13 S. W. 764; Hickam v. Hickam, 46

(a) In the action B. can join as defendants all who jointly compel the service and receive the benefits thereof. Elliott v. Bell, 37 W. Va. 834, 17 S. E. 399.

(2) The superior court of the county of either of the persons sued has jurisdiction of the suit against all, though one of them may not reside in that county.

(3) The petition alleging that the services were rendered within four years prior to the time the suit was instituted, it was not subject to demurrer on the ground that the right of action was barred by the statute of limitations.

(4) The petition was not subject to any of the grounds of special demurrer.

(5) It was not error to charge: "I give you this law: Ordinarily when one renders services or transfers property valuable to another, which the latter accepts, a promise is implied to pay the reasonable value thereof."

(6) It was error for the court to refuse, upon the trial of the first case stated above, a written request of counsel for the defendant to charge the jury as follows: "The presumption of law is that all public officers or authorities do their duty as prescribed by law; and in the absence of satisfactory proof that any officer or county authority has violated his duty or done an illegal act, that it will not be held that the officer has done any illegal act."

(7) There was no error in the failure of the court to charge, or in the charges given, of which complaint is made, other than as above pointed out.

(8) The evidence in each case shows that the plaintiff therein, while performing the services for the value of which the suit is brought, was at work in a chain gang under a sentence for a misdemeanor imposed by Cobb superior court. The presumption is that the officers did their duty, and that the plaintiffs were being worked in accordance with law. The evidence was insufficient to overcome this presumption.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 641*)—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCES—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JUDGE.

On a trial before the recorder of a police court, the recorder, after a lengthy cross-examination of a witness, remarked to the attorney for the accused, in effect, that it seemed to him that he had "pumped the witness dry," and that, as he had a heavy docket, he wished the attorney would expedite the examination, and that the attorney took up more time in the trial of cases in his court than any other attorney. Held, that this language of the recorder does not indicate that the accused did not have a fair and impartial trial, especially in view of the fact that the recorder told the attorney, in the same connection, that he would stay on the bench until midnight, if necessary, to conclude the case.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 642*)—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCES—WRIT OF ERROR—ABANDONMENT—FAILURE TO REFER TO QUESTION IN ARGUMENT OR BRIEF.

The constitutional question raised in the petition for certiorari, not being referred to in the argument or brief, will be treated as abandoned.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 31*)—DRAINS—STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Revisal 1905, § 3995, provides that whenever there shall be a canal or ditch, in the keeping up of which two or more persons shall be interested and receive actual benefit therefrom, and the duties and proportion of labor which each shall perform is not fixed by agreement or by a mode previously prescribed, any of the parties may have the same assessed by applying to a justice of the peace, who, on notice, shall summon two disinterested freeholders, and they, with the justice, shall assess the damages sustained by the applicant, and the justice shall give judgment in favor of the applicant for damages, or for work done on the ditch or lands, etc. Held, that such section was constitutional.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by J. H. Forehand and another against Alex Taylor. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Robinson, for appellant. Wentworth W. Pierce, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action which was begun before a justice of the peace under Revisal 1905, § 3995, which is in chapter 88, providing for the establishment of drainage districts, and in subchapter 2 thereof. Said section 3995 provides:

"How Amount of Contribution for Repair Ascertained.—Whenever there shall be a dam, canal, or ditch, in the repairing or keeping up of which two or more persons shall be interested and receive actual benefit therefrom, and the duties and proportion of labor which each one ought to do and perform therefor shall not be fixed by agreement, or by the mode already in this chapter provided for assessing and apportioning such labor, any of the parties may have the same assessed and apportioned by applying to a justice of the peace, who shall give all parties at least three days' notice, and shall summon two disinterested freeholders who, together with the justice, shall meet on the premises, and assess the damages sustained by the applicant, whereupon the justice shall enter judgment in favor of the applicant for damages or for work done on such ditch or lands. The cost of this proceeding shall be in the discretion of the justice."

In the summer of 1910 the plaintiffs did certain work repairing and cleaning out a canal which runs by certain land of the defendant, who owns on one side of the canal only, and also runs through the lands of others in the vicinity. The jury finds that the defendant, together with others, was interested in repairing the canal in question and received actual benefit therefrom. The adjoining landowners paid their proportional part for repairing and cleaning out the canal. The defendant refused to pay the amount claimed of him, upon the ground that he had not been benefited that much. Thereupon, in September, 1910, the plaintiffs warranted the defendant before a justice of the peace for the nonpayment of $82 for his share of the cost of cleaning out and repairing the canal, alleging defendant's liability both upon contract and on a quantum meruit. The magistrate dismissed the action, doubtless on the ground that there had been no agreement shown, and that plaintiffs could not recover on quantum meruit because of plaintiffs' failure to comply with the prerequisite required by Revisal 1905, § 3995; the cost not having been assessed by a justice of the peace and two freeholders. Subsequently, in November, 1910, the plaintiffs complied with the requirements of said section 3995 by applying to a justice of the peace, who, after summoning two disinterested freeholders, and the defendant being present, viewed the canal and decided that the plaintiff was entitled to $82 for damages which they assessed. The defendant appealed to the superior court. In that court the jury found that the defendant was interested in the repair of the canal, and was indebted to the plaintiffs for $82 for his proportional part of the cost. The defendant appealed to this court, and makes two assignments of error.

[1] 1. For the refusal of the court to nonsuit, on the ground that Revisal 1905, § 3995, is unconstitutional. He cites no authorities to support his position. The drainage act has been held constitutional in several cases. Staton v. Staton, 148 N. C. 490, 62 S. E. 596; Adams v. Joyner, 147 N. C. 77, 60 S. E. 725; Norfleet v. Cromwell, 70 N. C. 634, 16 Am. Rep. 787; Sanderlin v. Luken, 152 N. C. 738, 68 S. E. 225; White v. Lane, 153 N. C. 14, 68 S. E. 695.

[2] 2. The second exception is that the plaintiff was estopped by the judgment in the former action. But it appears from the facts stated that at the time of the former action the plaintiff had not taken the steps required by Revisal 1905, § 3995, to entitle him to recover under the drainage act. It was only thereafter in November that he applied to the justice and had two disinterested freeholders appointed, who, after giving him notice, met on the premises and with the justice assessed the damages. When the former action before the justice was brought, the plaintiff was therefore not entitled to recover. His action was premature, and the justice properly dismissed it. There is, therefore, no estoppel. Tyler v. Capeheart, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 108, and cases citing the same in the Annotated Edition.

It is not distinctly stated, as it should be, that this canal had been laid out and dug under the drainage act; but both briefs treat it as such, and the whole proceeding is taken under Revisal 1905, § 3995, concerning the apportionment of repairs of a canal of that kind.

No error.

JOYNER & LONG v. SCOTTISH FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 17, 1911.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 229*)—POLICY—CANCELLATION—NOTICE.

Plaintiffs, having noticed a mistake in a fire policy written by the V. Company, notified its agent to make the correction. The agent wrote plaintiffs that he had been directed to cancel the policy by the V. Company, and inclosed a policy of the same tenor and amount in defendant company. The letter with policy inclosed was mailed on Saturday, and was received by plaintiffs on Monday morning following; but late Saturday night the property was destroyed by fire. The policy in the V. Company provided that it could not be canceled without five days notice to insured. Held, that defendant's policy had not taken effect at the time of the fire, and that plaintiff could not recover thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 570*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—DISMISSAL—EFFECT.

In a suit on a fire policy, the granting of a nonsuit did not prevent defendant's joinder, as party defendant in a subsequent action, with another insurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1028-1045; Dec. Dig. § 570.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Biggs, Judge.

Action by Joyner & Long against the Scottish Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiff, Joyner, held a policy of insurance on his store and goods in the Atlantic Fire Insurance Company. W. A. Stone, agent for the Virginia State Insurance Company, asked him to take, instead, a policy in that company, which he agreed to do, telling said agent to make out the policy exactly like the other, merely changing the name to Long & Joyner, as he had sold a half interest in the business to Long. By mistake Stone sent the policy made out, as before, in the name of Joyner alone. This policy took effect September 22, 1908. On discovery of said mistake, Joyner notified Stone to make the correction. On October 24th Stone, who was also agent for the Scottish Fire Insurance Company, mailed a letter to Joyner, telling him that he was directed by the Virginia State Insurance Company to cancel the policy, as they did not wish to carry insurance upon country property, and inclosing a policy of the same tenor and amount in the Scottish Fire Insurance Company. This letter, with policy inclosed, was put in the mail, addressed to Joyner, on Saturday, October 24, 1908, and was received by him on Monday morning following. In the interval, late Saturday night, the property was destroyed by fire. The policy of the Virginia State Company contained a provision that it could not be canceled without giving a notice of five days to the insured.

L. T. Hartsell and J. F. Newell, for appellants. O. W. Tillett, Jr., and J. F. Flowers, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. [1] The judgment of nonsuit is affirmed. An examination of the record indicates that the Virginia State Insurance Company is liable to the plaintiffs; but we refrain from expressing an opinion in regard thereto until it has the opportunity of being heard.

It is clear that the plaintiffs cannot recover on both policies, but equally clear, upon the evidence before us, that one of the insurance companies should be required to pay.

[2] The judgment of nonsuit will not prevent the joinder of the defendant in this action with the Virginia State Insurance Company in a new action, as was done in Lee v. Insurance Co., 70 S. E. 819, at this term. Affirmed.

GAZZAM v. GERMAN UNION FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 26, 1911.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 90*)—FIRE INSURANCE CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

A standard fire policy, containing the provision, approved by statute, that in the matter relating to the insurance no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of insurer, does not impose on insured the duty of showing that the agent issuing the policy had written authority to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 372*)—FIRE INSURANCE—STIPULATIONS—WAIVER.

Stipulations in a fire policy as to the conditions on which it shall have its inception and become operative as a contract may be waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 941; Dec. Dig. § 372.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 146*)—FIRE INSURANCE—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

The rule that doubtful terms in a fire policy must be construed favorably to insured applies to the construction of a standard fire policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 292-298; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 90*)—FIRE INSURANCE—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

A stipulation in a fire policy that, "in matters relating to this policy no person unless duly authorized in writing shall be deemed the agent of" insurer, relates to matters connected with the insurance after the policy has become a valid contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 137*)—FIRE INSURANCE—CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION.

A fire insurance company became insolvent, and its general agent contracted with another insurance company, whereby the latter company agreed to insure the outstanding risks of the insolvent company. A holder of a policy issued by the insolvent company surrendered the policy and his right to the return premium thereon in consideration of receiving a policy of the latter company, which under the contract gained new business by reinsuring risks of the insolvent company. Held, that the new policy was supported by a valid consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 231-245; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

6. INSURANCE (§ 137*)—FIRE INSURANCE—PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS.

An insured cannot pay the premium on a fire policy by satisfying a private debt due him by the agent of insurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 231-245; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 137*)—FIRE INSURANCE—PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS.

A fire insurance company became insolvent, and its general agent contracted with another insurance company through its agent, whereby the latter company agreed to reinsure the outstanding risks of the insolvent company. A holder of a policy issued by the insolvent company surrendered the policy and his right to the return premium thereon in consideration of receiving a new policy issued by the latter company. Without knowledge of the policy holder, it was agreed between the agents that the return premium should be applied to an indebtedness existing between them. Neither of the agents was the agent of insured. Held, that an action on the new policy could not be defeated on the ground that the premium therefor had not been received by the latter company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 231-245; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 244*)—DECLARATIONS OF AGENTS—ADMISSIBILITY.

A declaration of an agent of a corporation, consisting of a narrative of a past occurrence, is incompetent against the corporation; but a declaration made within the scope of his agency and while engaged in the very business about which the declaration is made is competent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 916-936; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

9. EVIDENCE (§ 244*)—DECLARATIONS OF AGENTS—ADMISSIBILITY.

A letter, signed in the name of an insurance company and its president and secretary, addressed to an agent issuing policies for the company, which recites that F. & Co. had resigned as general agents of the company, and directs the agent to report directly to the company, sent while the agent was regularly reporting to F. & Co. in due course of business, and a prior letter by F. & Co., received by the agent while reporting to them, to the effect that an individual had been appointed general agent for a state, and directing the agent to report to him, etc., are admissible against the company as declarations made by agents within the scope of their agency while engaged in the business about which the declarations are made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 916-936; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Joseph M. Gazzam against the German Union Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover $2,500 on a policy of fire insurance.

The defendant denied that it issued the policy, or that it was issued by its authority. Prior to November 22, 1908, the plaintiff held a fire insurance policy, issued by the Ohio German Fire Company, for $2,500 on the property described in the policy in controversy in this action, and on said day said company became insolvent, and a receiver was appointed to take charge of its assets and business. M. W. Nash was the general agent, and the firm of Alston, Rawls & Co., the local agent of said company.

The plaintiff contends that the firm of W. E. Fowler & Co. was the general agent of the defendant company; that, after the failure of the Ohio German Company, the said Nash, as its general agent, entered into an agreement with the defendant, through Fowler & Co., by which he (said Nash) was appointed the general agent of the defendant in this state; that it was a part of this agreement that the defendant would reinsure the outstanding risks of the Ohio German Company; that thereafter the defendant, through said Nash, issued the policy declared on.

The defendant denies that Fowler & Co. or Nash had authority to issue the policy, and contends that under the provision in the policy that, "in the matter relating to this insurance no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company," authority to represent the defendant cannot be shown by parol, and, as no written authority has been produced, that the policy is void; that the evidence of the plaintiff fails to show any consideration to sustain the policy; that evidence admitted to prove agency was incompetent; and that on the whole evidence judgment of nonsuit should have been entered.

The policy of the defendant was delivered by Nash to Alston, Rawls & Co., who sent it to the plaintiff, and he surrendered his policy in the Ohio German Company and his right to the return premium thereon, the amount of which is not stated.

Nash was indebted to Alston, Rawls & Co., and it was agreed between them, without the knowledge of the plaintiff that the return premium should be applied to this indebtedness. The following agreement was made by the parties on the trial: "First. It is admitted by the plaintiff that the defendant, the German Union Fire Insurance Company, did

"While many of the unfair features of the earlier policies have been eliminated from the modern standard policy, the courts still apply to this instrument the same rule of construction as the considerations just mentioned led them to apply to the old forms. Any doubtful terms are always construed in favor of the insured. It has been contended that inasmuch as the law compels the use of the standard policy, and will not allow any variance from it, excepting in certain limited particulars, the insurer cannot be regarded as selecting the terms of the contract, and subjected to an unfavorable rule of construction on that account. This contention, however, has been held to be without merit, for the terms of these statutory policies were chosen with reference to the construction given by the precedent cases to similar terms in other policies, and therefore ought to be regarded as being used in the sense of their previous construction. It is also apparent from an examination of the instruments themselves, as well as the history of their adoption, that their terms were really chosen by the underwriters with particular reference to their own interests."

Again he says, on page 493, with reference to the clause on which the defendant relies: "It may be stated here, however, that the condition in the standard policy stipulating that 'no person shall be the agent of the insurer unless authorized in writing,' has no contractual significance whatever. It does amount to notice to the insured, and, as such, is binding on him, if true; otherwise not."

The decisions of our court, in so far as the questions have been considered, are in accord with these views.

In Floars v. Insurance Co., 144 N. C. 235, 56 S. E. 916, it was held: "That the enactment of a statute which establishes a standard form for a policy, the statute being only affirmative in its terms, will not invalidate an oral contract." And in Black v. Insurance Co., 148 N. C. 170, 61 S. E. 672, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 578, the provisions considered did not affect the validity of the contract in its inception.

[4] If, however, it should be held that the stipulation is contractual, the language used will reasonably lead to the conclusion that it relates to matters connected with the insurance after the policy has become a valid contract.

It does not say, "in matters relating to this policy, no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company," but does say that "in matters relating to this insurance."

There is no "insurance" until a valid contract in one form or another has been entered into. We therefore conclude that the part of the policy quoted is not contractual, and that it does not relate to the acts of the agent in issuing the policy. [5] Nor do we agree with the contention of the defendant that there is no consideration to support the contract.

The surrender of the policy in the Ohio German Insurance Company, and the relinquishment of the right to the return premium thereon by the plaintiff, furnished a consideration, and in addition, while the defendant may not have received the full premium on this policy, it gained new business by its contract of reinsurance of the risks of the old company.

The defendant, while admitting the force of this view, says it has no application to the facts appearing on the record. It says that the plaintiff admits that the defendant never received any consideration for the premium; that the firm of Alston, Rawls & Co. was the agent of the plaintiff; and that the evidence of the plaintiff shows that the policy was issued by virtue of an agreement between Nash and the agent of the plaintiff that the return premium should be used to liquidate an indebtedness existing between Nash and the agent, and it relies on Folt v. Insurance Co., 133 N. C. 180, 45 S. E. 547.

[6] The authority is decisive of the proposition that the insured cannot pay the premium on the policy by satisfying a private debt due him by the agent of the company, and might be controlling if it appeared that the firm of Alston, Rawls & Co. was the agent of the plaintiff; but this is not our interpretation of the evidence, and there is nothing in the record to show that the plaintiff knew anything of the transaction.

[7] It is true that a witness of the plaintiff spoke of the firm as the insurance agents of the plaintiff; but, when this statement is considered in connection with the other evidence, it means that the firm of Alston, Rawls & Co. was a local insurance agency, with whom the plaintiff insured. It is not unusual to hear the inquiry, "Who is your insurance agent?" meaning "With whom do you insure?"

The record discloses that Nash was the general agent of the Ohio German Insurance Company and the firm of Alston, Rawls & Co., its local agent; that, after the failure of this company, Nash attempted to make a contract with the defendant, through Fowler & Co., to reinsure its risks; that Nash assured said firm he would take care of the policies of the old company, and gave him the policy in suit to be sent to the plaintiff, which was done, and the plaintiff then returned the policy he had held in the Ohio German Company, and released his right to the return premium thereon.

The exceptions to evidence and to the refusal to give the special instructions requested, and to parts of the charge, were entered principally to preserve the exception as to the competency of parol evidence to prove the authority of the agent, and this question has already been considered; but the defendant also insists that the two letters were incompetent because they were declarations of an agent, and that the evidence as to the location of the office of Fowler & Co. was immaterial and prejudicial.

[8] The competency of the declarations of an agent of a corporation rests upon the same principle as the declarations of an agent of an individual. If they are narrative of a past occurrence, as in Smith v. Railroad, 68 N. C. 107, and in Rumbough v. Improvement Co., 112 N. C. 752, 17 S. E. 536, 34 Am. St. Rep. 528, they are incompetent; but, if made within the scope of the agency and while engaged in the very business about which the declaration is made, they are competent. McComb v. Railroad, 70 N. C. 180; Southerland v. Railroad, 106 N. C. 105, 11 S. E. 189; Darlington v. Tel. Co., 127 N. C. 450, 37 S. E. 479.

[9] The letters come within the last class. The evidence as to the location of the office was a slight circumstance on the question of agency, and standing alone would be entitled to little consideration; but we think it was not error to admit it.

There was evidence fit to be considered by the jury, on the issues submitted to them, and the motion for nonsuit was properly refused. We have considered all the exceptions appearing on the record and find no error.

No error.

FORD v. PIGEON RIVER LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 17*)—CONSENT—EXCEPTIONS TO ORDERS.

Where a defendant takes no exceptions to an order extending the time within which to file the complaint and answer, it becomes a consent order, and a voluntary submission by defendant to the jurisdiction of the court, and a waiver of a right to remove the cause to the United States court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Cline, Judge.

Action by Arthur Ford, administrator, against the Pigeon River Lumber Company. From an order denying a petition for removal from the superior court to the Circuit Court of the United States, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Moore & Rollins, for appellant. S. Brown Shepherd and G. W. Ferguson, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The summons was returnable to September term, 1910, at which term an order was made in this cause as follows: "Plaintiff allowed 40 days to file complaint. Defendant has 40 days to file answer." The defendant did not except to this order, and did not move to dismiss the action for failure to file complaint, as it had a right to do.

It may be, as contended by defendant, that a petition for removal need not be presented until the complaint is filed and the record then discloses a removable controversy as to the sum demanded, but under our decisions the defendant has waived his right to remove and submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court by not excepting to the order we have quoted. By failing to except to it, the defendant is taken to have consented to it. Lewis v. Steamboat Co., 131 N. C. 653, 42 S. E. 969; Bryson v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 594, 54 S. E. 434; Garrett v. Bear, 144 N. C. 26, 56 S. E. 479.

Where an order of reference is made in a cause, and it is not excepted to and the exception noted on the record, it is taken to be a reference by consent, upon the principle that "silence speaks consent," and a jury trial is thereby waived. Driller Co. v. Worth, 117 N. C. 515, 23 S. E. 427. Upon same principle, when the defendant takes no exception to the order extending the time within which to file complaint and answer, the order is a consent order, and a voluntary submission by defendant to the jurisdiction of the court, and a waiver of a right to remove.

Affirmed.

HENRY et al. v. HILLIARD et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 152*)—PLEADING STATUTE AS DEFENSE—NECESSITY.

A vendee under a parol contract in regard to land, after payment of the purchase price, can compel the execution of a deed to him, where the statute of frauds is not pleaded, or the contract denied, and there is no objection to the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 363-366; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 152*)—PLEADING STATUTE OF DEFENSE—NECESSITY.

In an action to compel a conveyance of land under a parol contract, after payment of the purchase price, the party to be charged may simply deny the contract, or deny it and set up a different contract, and avail himself of the statute of frauds without pleading it by objecting to the evidence, or he may admit the contract and plead the statute; and in either case the contract cannot be enforced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 363-366; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Cline, Judge.

Action by W. L. Henry and others against W. L. Hilliard and others. From a judgment overruling exceptions to the report of a referee, and holding that the defendant Stringfield was not entitled to a conveyance of land, defendant Stringfield appeals. Reversed.

This is an action instituted a number of years ago by certain of the heirs of James R. Love, deceased, against W. L. Hilliard, the then sole surviving executor of the last will and testament of said Love, by which will certain lands of the said Love, of which the land in question is a part, were devised to his executors to be sold and the proceeds divided among his heirs at law. Some time after the institution of the action, Hilliard died, whereupon all the heirs at law of the said Love were made parties, and R. D. Gilmer was appointed by the court trustee, with all the power and authority of an executor under the will. During his executorship, W. L. Hilliard employed the appellant W. W. Stringfield as a surveyor for the purpose of locating and surveying the lands belonging to the estate, and agreed with the said Stringfield that he, the said Hilliard, would sell and convey to him the two tracts of land mentioned in the petition of Stringfield at the price of $11.25 per acre, the purchase price to be paid by Stringfield by services as surveyor. The land referred to in this agreement was immediately surveyed, and Stringfield entered into possession, and has been in possession thereof for 20 years. After the death of Hilliard, Gilmer, trustee, recognized the claim of Stringfield, and continued to employ him as surveyor. At Fall term, 1907, of the superior court for Haywood county, Mrs. M. E. Hilliard, one of the heirs at law of James R. Love, deceased, moved in the cause to require R. D. Gilmer, trustee, to account; and at the same time appellant W. W. Stringfield filed his petition, set out in the record, alleging his contract with Hilliard for the land in question, and that the purchase money had been paid in full, and praying that the court direct the trustee to execute to him a deed for the land. To this petition no answer was filed by any of the parties, and the whole matter, including the Stringfield claim, was referred by consent. It was admitted that the said Hilliard had authority to make said contract with said Stringfield, and that the whole of the purchase price for the land had been paid. The original and supplemental report of the referee and the exceptions thereto are as follows: "The report of the undersigned referee would respectfully show that pursuant to the order of reference made at Fall term, 1907, of this court, a copy of which is hereto attached, I designated the 23d day of May, 1908, at 1 o'clock p. m., as the time when the hearing the matters referred to me would begin at the courthouse at Waynesville, N. C., and gave notice by mail to the parties as I was advised and as shown by the first page of the evidence. The various hearings were had and the adjournments taken as therein noted."

Claim of W. W. Stringfield: "The referee finds as a fact: (1) That W. W. Stringfield began to act as agent for Dr. Hilliard, former trustee, in 1893 or 1894, and continued after the appointment of R. D. Gilmer as trustee in 1891. That he also acted as surveyor whenever needed, and performed various services in and about the Love lands in both of said capacities. (2) That during the lifetime of W. L. Hilliard, former trustee, the said Stringfield made a verbal contract for the purchase of the two lots of land known as exceptions Nos. 70 and 71, in the deed from R. D. Gilmer, trustee, to S. A. Jones, of the boundaries therein given, and that the contract of purchase was never reduced to writing. That the heirs at law and the trustee have recognized the said Stringfield's claim to the said parcels of land, and that he has been in possession of the same for at least 20 years, and that the same were excepted from the deed to S. A. Jones by reason of and because of the said Stringfield's claim thereto. That on the 26th day of August, 1908, counsel for Mrs. M. E. Hilliard sent to the referee a paper writing, which is marked 'Exhibit No. 203,' in which it was stated as follows: 'Mrs. Hilliard will not oppose a report to the effect that Stringfield is the owner of the land excepted in the Jones deed as sold to Stringfield—rather she will consent to such a decree.' And on the same day R. G. A. Love and Maggie L. Marshall, by her attorney in fact, handed to the referee a paper writing in the following words and figures: 'We hereby give our consent for Maj. W. W. Stringfield to be allowed his amount in full as filed with you and find as a fact W. W. Stringfield is entitled to the deed for 70 and 71 exceptions in the deed from R. D. Gilmer, trustee, to S. A. Jones for lands in Jackson county.' This is also marked 'Exhibit No. 203.' And I concluded as a matter of law that W. W. Stringfield is not entitled to a deed for the exceptions Nos. 70 and 71 in the Jones deed, the contract of purchase thereof not having been in writing and the former trustee with whom said contract is claimed to have been made being dead; but in good conscience and equity the said Stringfield is entitled to a judgment for $1,150.93, to be paid out of the funds now on hand. Your referee herewith sends all the evidence taken by and before him and the papers filed with him, and respectfully reports to the court that his actual expenses have been paid except the sum of $7 for the past two trips he made to Waynesville, and that $100 has been paid to him as a part of his allowance. Signed in triplicate. Filed Oct. 4th, 1910."

Supplemental Report: "The referee desires to submit the following supplemental report as to claim of W. W. Stringfield to that heretofore filed by him in the case, deeming it advisable to do so, because additional facts may be necessary, and that in his conclusions of law he finds that an error has been made as follows: Add to findings of fact No. 2 the words, 'and fully paid for the same at the dates shown in Exhibit No. 2, in the amounts herein given.' I desire to strike out the conclusions of law submitted and substitute in lieu thereof the following: I conclude as a matter of law that said W. W. Stringfield is not entitled to a deed for the exceptions Nos. 70 and 71, the contract of purchase therefor not being in writing, and the former trustee, with whom said contract is alleged to have been made, being dead, but that in good conscience and equity he must be paid the sums shown to have been paid by him for said exceptions, with interest from the date on which they were paid, unless by agreement the heirs convey said exceptions to him. That said W. W. Stringfield is entitled to a judgment for $1,150.93, balance of account. This the 4th day of October, 1910. Filed Oct. 4, 1910."

Exceptions of W. W. Stringfield to the report and the supplemental report of referee: "That whereas the said referee found as a fact that there was a verbal contract made between W. L. Hilliard, one of the executors and trustees of the said Love estate, who had power to make said contract with W. W. Stringfield, whereby W. L. Hilliard, former trustee, sold to said W. W. Stringfield the said known as exceptions Nos. 70 and 71 in the deed from R. D. Gilmer, trustee, to S. A. Jones, and whereas the said referee found as a fact that the said land was fully paid for by the said W. W. Stringfield, who has been in possession for more than twenty years, and whereas the said referee in his said reports found as a fact that the heirs at law and those who are interested therein recognized the right and claim of the said Stringfield to have a deed to said land, and filed no plea of objection to his said claim and petition for title deed to said land in the hearing of this cause or at any other time, all which facts the said petitioner, W. W. Stringfield, admits to be true. That the said referee in his said reports erred in his conclusions of law upon the above found facts, whereby he concluded as a matter of law that the said Stringfield was not entitled to a deed for said land because it was a verbal contract made with W. L. Hilliard, former trustee, who is dead. The said referee should have found as a conclusion of law that the said W. W. Stringfield was entitled to a deed to the said exceptions Nos. 70 and 71 in the deed from R. D. Gilmer, trustee, to said S. A. Jones. Wherefore, the said W. W. Stringfield prays the court to correct and modify said report and to issue a decree appointing a commissioner to execute a deed to the said Stringfield for the said land. W. J. Hannah, Attorney for said W. W. Stringfield."

A judgment was rendered overruling the exceptions to the report, and holding that the said Stringfield was not entitled to a conveyance of the land, but that he could recover the purchase money paid by him, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

No pleading was filed relying on the statute of frauds, or denying the contract, and no objection to evidence was entered except by Mrs. Hilliard, and this has been withdrawn.

Adams & Adams, for appellant. W. T. Crawford, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] A single question is presented by this appeal, and that is, Can the vendee, under a parol contract, in regard to land, after the payment of the purchase price, compel the execution of a deed to him, when the statute of frauds is not pleaded, the contract is not denied, and there is no objection to the evidence? The authorities seem to be uniform that the vendee is entitled to a conveyance under such circumstances. In 20 Cyc. p. 312, note 4, the decisions of the highest courts of 16 states are cited in support of the text that "if he [the vendor] admits the making of the contract, and fails to claim the benefit of the statute or to demur, he will be taken to have waived it." Browne on Stat. Frauds, § 135, says: "As the statute of frauds affects only the remedy upon the contract, giving the party sought to be charged upon it a defense to an action for that purpose, if the requirements of the statute be not fulfilled, it is obvious that he may waive such protection, or rather that, except as he undertakes to avail himself of such protection, the contract is perfectly good against him." Also Story, Eq. Pl. § 763: "It seems now understood that this plea extends to the discovery of the parol agreement, as well as to the performance of it, although it has been said that the defendant is compellable by answer, or by plea, to admit or to deny the parol agreement stated in the bill. But this seems utterly nugatory, for it is now well settled that if the defendant should by his answer admit the parol agreement, and should insist upon the benefit of the statute, he will be fully entitled to it, notwithstanding such admission. But if he admits the parol agreement, without insisting on the statute, the court will decree a specific performance, upon the ground that the defendant has thereby renounced the benefit of the statute." The decisions of this court announce the same doctrine.

In Loughran v. Giles, 110 N. C. 426, 14 S. E. 966, the court says: "The statute of frauds (said Justice Ruffin in McCracken v. McCracken, 88 N. C. 276) was intended to 'close the door upon temptations to commit perjury and the assertion of feigned titles to property.' The evil intended to be guarded against in the enactment of the statute was the attempt to enforce pretended verbal agreements by resorting to perjury, and though it became necessary in attaining this end to put it in the power of a party to avoid, at his election, his own verbal promise to convey land, the statute was not construed as a declaration that all such contracts not in writing and signed by the party to be charged were to be treated ipso facto as null and void. Wilkie v. Womble, 90 N. C. 254; Green v. Railroad, 77 N. C. 95; Davis v. Inscoe, 84 N. C. 396. 'A verbal contract for the sale of land, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them (said the court in Thigpen v. Staton, 104 N. C. 40, 10 S. E. 89), is good between the parties to it, and will be enforced if they agree upon its terms, and the party to be charged does not plead the statute." The cases of Syme v. Smith, 92 N. C. 338, Thigpen v. Staton, 104 N. C. 40, 10 S. E. 89, and Hall v. Lewis, 118 N. C. 510, 24 S. E. 209, are to the same effect. The rule does not, however, apply except when there is no denial of the contract, and the statute is not pleaded.

[2] The party to be charged may simply deny the contract alleged or deny it and set up a different contract, and avail himself of the statute, without pleading it, by objecting to the evidence, or he may admit the contract and plead the statute, and in either case the contract cannot be enforced. Browning v. Berry, 107 N. C. 235, 12 S. E. 195, 10 L. R. A. 726; Jordan v. Furnace Co., 126 N. C. 147, 35 S. E. 247, 78 Am. St. Rep. 644; Winders v. Hill, 144 N. C. 617, 57 S. E. 456.

We are of the opinion there was error in the ruling of the court on the record as it is presented to us, and that the appellant is entitled to a conveyance as prayed for.

Reversed.

STACEY CHEESE CO. v. PIPKIN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 141*)—APPEAL—JURISDICTION—DETERMINATION.

The jurisdiction of the superior court on appeals from a justice of the peace is entirely derivative, so that, if the justice had no jurisdiction in an action as it was before him, the superior court can derive none by amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 472; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 45*)—JURISDICTION—COUNTERCLAIM—AMOUNT.

Where one sued before a justice of the peace has a valid counterclaim against plaintiff's demand, it may be pleaded, and, if established to an amount equal to or more than plaintiff's claim, may avail to defeat plaintiff's action, though the counterclaim is in excess of the justice's jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 174; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 44*)—PLEADING—CONSTRUCTION—JURISDICTION.

Neither a particular form of statement nor a special prayer for relief is determinative or controlling of the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, which is determined by the facts alleged and proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 157-172; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

4. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 45*)—JURISDICTION—COUNTERCLAIM.

Though a defendant sued before a justice of the peace pleads as a counterclaim a cause of action against plaintiff for an amount greater than the justice's jurisdiction, he may not recover an affirmative judgment for the excess.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Stacey Cheese Company against R. E. Pipkin. From a judgment dismissing defendant's counterclaim for lack of jurisdiction, on appeal from a justice of the peace, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The action was instituted by plaintiff to recover $199 due by contract. Defendant denied the indebtedness, and set up a counterclaim for breach of contract of warranty on other sales of cheese. On the hearing before the justice, there was judgment in defendant's favor for an excess of $38.38. Plaintiff having appealed on trial in superior court, four issues were submitted as follows: "First. In what amount, if any, is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? Second. In what amount, if any, is the plaintiff Stacey Cheese Company indebted to the defendant? Third. What amount, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Fourth. What amount, if any, is the defendant entitled to recover?" And it was agreed by parties that the court should answer the third and fourth issues according to the findings of the jury in the first and second. The jury rendered verdict as to defendant's indebtedness to plaintiff. Answer first issue $199 and second issue as to plaintiff's indebtedness to defendant $210. On the verdict defendant moved for judgment that plaintiff take nothing by his suit, and defendant recover his costs. The court being of opinion that as the counterclaim of defendant was in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, and that defendant had at no time remitted the excess or offered to do so until after verdict, the court in accordance with the agreement answered the third issue $199, and fourth issue nothing, and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff for said amount of $199 and costs and dismissed defendant's counterclaim for lack of jurisdiction, etc. Defendant excepted and appealed, assigning for error that the court refused to sign the judgment as tendered by him; second, to the judgment as entered.

Aycock & Winston and W. T. Dortch, for appellant. M. T. Dickinson, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). There is apparent conflict of authority with us on the question presented, and at least two or more decisions of this court would seem to be in direct support of his honor's ruling. Raisin v. Thomas, 88 N. C. 148; Meneely v. Craven, 86 N. C. 364. [1] The cause having originated in the court of a justice of the peace, questions of jurisdiction must be considered and determined in reference to that fact, and numerous and repeated cases with us are to the effect "that the jurisdiction of the superior court on appeals from a justice of the peace is entirely derivative, and, if the justice had no jurisdiction in an action as it was before him, the superior court can derive none by amendment (*I*James v. McClamroch, 92 N. C. 362)—a principle fully approved by the present Chief Justice delivering the opinion of the court in Robeson v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 49, 11 S. E. 263, and reaffirmed and applied at the present term in Wilson v. Insurance Co., 71 S. E. 79.

[2] Considering the present case in that aspect, however, we are of opinion that it is a fair and correct deduction from the better considered decisions of our court, and is in accord with the better reason and the enlightened policy and expressed purposes of our present Code, that, whenever one is sued in a court of justice of the peace and has a valid counterclaim against plaintiff's demand, though the same may be in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, it may be pleaded, and, if established to an amount equal to or greater than plaintiff's claim, it may avail to defeat the action. On a counterclaim resting in contract no recovery for an excess can be had in favor of defendant except on demands for $200 or less, or unless the excess over $200 has been remitted in the justice's court and in apt time (*I*James v. McClamroch, supra); but whether set up strictly as a counterclaim or not, where it exists and has been pleaded and established, it should avail as a defense and defeat recovery by plaintiff, where the amount is sufficient for the purpose. This position is not in violation of our Constitution, limiting the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in actions ex contractu to cases involving $200 or less. Though a larger counterclaim may be presented, the question determined is limited to $200 or less, to wit, the amount required to defeat the plaintiff's claim, and is no more forbidden by the Constitution than in cases where the excess of a larger counterclaim is remitted to $200, or an equitable defense has been entertained in bar of plaintiff's demand. Under our former system and in actions at law, this principle of balancing one claim against another was much more restricted than at present and was included in the general term, "set-off," confined usually to actions of debt or indebitatus assumpsit for a moneyed demand and of a liquidated nature. It was so held with us (Lindsay v. King, 23 N. C. 401), but under the present system, by which actions at law and suits in equity are instituted and determined in one and the same court, and as far as permissible in one and the same action, the doctrine has been included and very much extended under the general term "counterclaim." In Smith v. French, 141 N. C. 6, 53 S. E. 437, the court said: "Our statute on counterclaim is very broad in its scope and terms, is designed to enable parties litigant to settle well-nigh any and every phase of a given controversy in one and the same action, and should be liberally construed by the court in furtherance of this most desirable and beneficial purpose." And, after quoting our statutory provisions on the subject, said further: "Subject to the limitations expressed in this statute, a counterclaim includes well-nigh every kind of cross-demand existing in favor of defendant against the plaintiff in the same right, whether said demand be of a legal or an equitable nature. It is said to be broader in meaning than set-off, recoupment, or cross-action, and includes them all, and secures to defendant the full relief which a separate action at law, or a bill in chancery, or a cross-bill would have secured to him on the same state of facts." Several of the earlier New York decisions showed a disposition to establish some of the common-law restrictions on the relief available under their statutory counterclaim, and confine this user of one claim against another to the old technical doctrine of set-off, and Mr. Green, in his work on Code Pleading and Practice, comments on the doctrine of these cases as follows: "Now if the term 'counterclaim' includes set-off and recoupment, and, in fact, nearly all counterclaims are either set-offs or recoupments, how is it, and why is it, that a set-off may be interposed as a defense, and that a counterclaim cannot? Or why should the same state of facts be a good defense when called a 'set-off' and liable to demurrer when called a 'counterclaim'? There seems to be literally no sense at all in the distinction here made between a 'counterclaim' and a 'set-off'; and such hair splitting is even worse than that under the old system in regard to the distinctions between the actions of trespass and case." And further the author says: "Indeed, it makes no difference what name a party may give to his pleading under the code system, if the facts constitute a good cause of action or ground of defense." In the line of these comments and in direct support of the disposition we make of the present appeal are the well-considered decisions in our own court of Hurst, Miller & Co. v. Everett & Everett, 91 N. C. 399, and McClenahan v. Cotten, 83 N. C. 333. In Hurst v. Everett plaintiff sued before a justice of the peace in five separate actions on five separate promissory notes, aggregating $800. These actions were consolidated in the superior court, but this in no way affects the bearing of the decision on the point presented. Defendant claimed damages for breach of warranty in failing to supply goods of the quality contracted for to the amount of $400; the sale and warranty attaching to one entire transaction, to wit, a single sale. It was objected that, as this was for breach of warranty in an indivisible transaction, the claim was not available as a set-off to plaintiff's actions in the court of a justice of the peace. The lower court sustained plaintiff's objection, and on appeal this court, in reversing the judgment, after referring to the effect of our statute extending the doctrine of set-off to all matters embraced within our statutory counterclaim, said further on the question chiefly involved: "This view of the case, founded upon the statutes, the authorities, and the 'reason of the thing,' leads us to the conclusion that when the defendants were sued, no matter whether for goods sold and delivered or upon one of the notes given in payment therefor, they had the right to recoup the damages they had sustained to the amount of the sum claimed in the plaintiff's complaint, and so on in each action, 'tillies quoties,' until the amount of their damages should be exhausted. And this defense, having attached to the action while in the justice's court, followed the cases on appeal; and, when the several actions were consolidated in the superior court, the defendants had the right to recoup the whole amount of such damages, as they might be able to prove they had sustained, from the plaintiff's recovery." In McClenahan v. Cotten, the court spoke of the rights available to a defendant under a counterclaim as follows: "The question now arises, How may a party use and rely on his cross-demand? The answer is, he may plead it or not at his will, but, if he elect to plead it, he may do so, and then, if it be equal to or greater than the opposing demand, he may plead it in bar as formerly, or plead it as a defense, so called, under the Code, the plea or defense having the operation merely to defeat the action, and not to admit of any judgment for an excess, or he may, if he will, instead of pleading it as a bar merely, set up his demand under the name and with the proper prayer of a counterclaim as introduced by the Code, and then the defendant will have judgment for the excess. This construction is within the words of the Code, and is just in itself, for no reason can be given why A. having a debt of $200 against B., who has a debt of $1,000 against him, should have judgment for his debt without the right in B. to defeat the action by a plea of his larger debt as a set-off in bar. Such a distinction between set-off set up as a bar and as a technical counterclaim is laid down as proper to be taken by an intelligent writer (Bliss on Code Pleading, § 368), and is recognized and admitted under the Code in New York. Tillinghast Shearn, Prac. 158; Burrall v. De Groot, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 379; Prentiss v. Graves, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 621. In our opinion, therefore, the judgment, if not otherwise liable to objection, was properly pleadable as a defense, formerly a plea in bar, without any remittitur whatever, and that there was no error in the ruling on this point except in requiring the excess above plaintiff's demand to be remitted, which was an error against the defendant of which the plaintiff cannot complain." And in that case the decision of the court expressly holds: "A defendant, sued on contract in a justice's court, may plead as a defense an independent cross-demand arising ex contractu, the principle of which is beyond the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace." The same principle is applied in many well-considered decisions of this court holding that an equitable defense may be interposed to defeat a recovery in a justice's court, though affirmative equitable relief in such court is not allowed as in Garrett v. Love, 89 N. C. 205; Lutz v. Thompson, 87 N. C. 334. In all the cases examined, except the two heretofore mentioned, which are seen to uphold a contrary view, as in Electric Co. v. Williams, 123 N. C. 51, 31 S. E. 288, Derr v. Stubbs, 83 N. C. 539, etc., the claimant continued to insist on his right to recover on his counterclaim an amount in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, and such claim was very properly denied. Even the two cases referred to—that is, Ralsin v. Thomas, supra, and Meneely v. Craven—perhaps permit of that interpretation but to the extent that these cases hold that a valid demand by way of counterclaim cannot be had as a defense to an action in justice's court because the entire amount of same is in excess of such jurisdiction. We are of opinion that these cases are not well decided. In the cases themselves and in others which refer to them, with apparent approval, the decisions seem to lay much stress upon the form of the statement that it was set forth as a counterclaim, but substantial rights should not to that extent be made a matter of form.

[3] In numerous and repeated decisions of this court, we have held that neither a particular form of statement nor a special prayer for relief should be allowed as determinative or controlling, but that rights are declared and justice administered on the facts which are alleged and properly established. Peanut Co. v. Railroad, 71 S. E. 71, present term; Williams v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 498-505, 57 S. E. 218, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 191; Vorhees v. Porter, 184 N. C. 591, 47 S. E. 31, 85 L. R. A. 736; Bowers v. Railroad, 107 N. C. 721, 12 S. E. 452. Defendant having pleaded and the verdict having established a counterclaim in his favor of $210, and plaintiff's claim being for a lesser sum, said defendant is entitled to have judgment entered that he go without day and recover costs. Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft, 71 S. E. 61 (at the present term).

[4] He is not entitled to a judgment for the excess, for that would be to uphold the justice's jurisdiction in excess of the constitutional provision, but to the amount required to defeat plaintiff's demand, to wit, $199, such court has jurisdiction, and may award relief by rendering judgment that defendant go without day.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the judgment of the superior court must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Reversed.

CLARK, C. J., concurs that Ralsin v. Thomas, 88 N. C., and Meneely v. Craven.

86 N. C., should be overruled, but finds no authority in the Constitution for the doctrine of derivative jurisdiction. It has been created solely by judicial construction. The jurisdiction of the superior court is fixed by the Constitution, and contains no limitation because the case may have been previously tried in another court. When the case gets into the superior court, its jurisdiction is general and unlimited, and it can make no difference whether the case was brought into the superior court by summons or by appeal. In either event, the case is in that court which has full jurisdiction to give an adequate remedy. I am therefore of an opinion that judgment should be rendered against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant for the excess of the counterclaim pleaded and proven over and above the amount of the claim proven to be due the plaintiff by the defendant.

If on appeal from the justice of the peace to the superior court the inquiry were confined to the question whether error had been committed in the court below, there would be a logical basis for the doctrine of "derivative jurisdiction." But on such appeal the trial is de novo, and it is proceeded with precisely as if it had been begun in the superior court, without any consideration as to whether the action of the justice was erroneous or not. There is therefore no reason to restrict the remedy to the limits of the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace. The case is tried exactly like any other case in the superior court, and the remedy should not be restricted to that which might have been granted by a justice of the peace.

SMITH et ux. v. ELLINGTON-GUY TIMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 439*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION OF TESTATOR.

In construing a will, the intention of the testator must govern, as ascertained from the whole will in the light of the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 952, 955-961; Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

2. WILLS (§ 450*)—CONSTRUCTION—MEANING OF WORDS.

The court in construing a will must give effect, if possible, to every part thereof before one clause can be held repugnant to another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 966; Dec. Dig. § 450.*]

3. WILLS (§ 602*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES ACQUIRED—"LAWFUL HEIRS."

A devise of land to testator's children, subject to the provision that the share of any child dying without issue of his body shall descend to the survivors of the children, or the lawful heirs surviving any of the children, gives to the children an estate in fee, defeasible as to each on his dying without leaving lawful issue, and on the death of a child, without issue surviving, his interest passes to the surviving children or grandchildren surviving any of the children; the words "lawful heirs" meaning surviving children and grandchildren of the devisees, who take and hold as purchasers directly from testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1351-1359; Dec. Dig. § 602.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4029; vol. 8, p. 7702.]

4. PARTITION (§ 95*)—JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where devisees of a tract of land holding an estate in fee, defeasible on each dying without issue of his body surviving, with gift over to the surviving devisees, or to the lawful heirs surviving any of the devisees, instituted partition to determine their respective interests, a judgment awarding a share to a devisee did not give her complete title, because, on her death without issue living, her estate would pass to the surviving devisees or surviving children of deceased devisees, who would take as purchasers under the will, and hence would not be bound by the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by Lonnie Smith and wife against the Ellington-Guy Timber Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Civil action heard on case agreed May, 1911. On the hearing it was properly made to appear that plaintiffs had contracted in writing to sell defendant an interest in a certain tract of land in said county, stipulating that a good title should be made, and, having tendered a deed for the property in correct form, defendant resisted payment, claiming that the title offered was defective. On the question of title it appeared that Bryant Smith, now deceased, was the owner of this and other lands, and had in the third item of his will devised his real estate, including this tract, to six of his children, to wit, Penelope, Lemuel, Hepsey, Nancy (the plaintiff), Cella, and Bryant. The devise containing and affected by a limitation explained as follows: "And it is further my will and desire that if any of my said children mentioned in this item of my said will should die without leaving lawful issue of his or her body surviving, or to be born within the period of gestation after his death, then it is my will and desire that the part therein given and devised to said child shall descend to and upon the survivors of my said children mentioned in this item of this my will, or upon the lawful heirs who may be surviving any of my said children mentioned in this item." By a subsequent clause of this will, another child, Saprionia, having married contrary to her father's wishes, was given $1 as her full share of the estate. After the death of Bryant Smith, the six children mentioned in item 3 of the will instituted proceedings, and partition of the land was duly made between these devisees; that portion of the land, the subject of this contract, being duly assigned to fame plaintiff. The case further states that one child had been born to plaintiff which lived a short time, and is now dead. Upon these facts, the court, being of opinion that plaintiffs could convey a good title, entered judgment enforcing the contract, and defendant excepted and appealed.

G. V. Cowper, for appellant. H. D. Williams, for appellees.

HOKE, J. Under several recent decisions of the court, the children under the third item of this will took an estate in fee simple defeasible as to each on an uncertain event, in this case "a dying without leaving lawful issue of his or her body surviving or to be born within the period of gestation after death." Perrett v. Byrd, 152 N. C. 220, 67 S. E. 507; Dawson v. Emmett, 151 N. C. 543, 66 S. E. 566; Harrell v. Hagan, 147 N. C. 111, 60 S. E. 909, 125 Am. St. Rep. 539; Sessoms v. Sessoms, 144 N. C. 121, 56 S. E. 687; Whitfield v. Garriss, 134 N. C. 24, 45 S. E. 904; Smith v. Brissan, 90 N. C. 284. And we have held, also, in these and other cases, that when a devise is limited over on a contingency of this kind, unless a contrary intent clearly appears in the will, the event by which each interest is to be determined must be referred, not to the death of the deviser, but to that of the several holders, respectively. Speaking to this question in Harrell v. Hagan, supra, the court said: "Under several of the more recent decisions of the court, the event by which the interest of each is to be determined must be referred, not to the death of the deviser, but to that of the several takers of the estate in remainder, respectively, without leaving a lawful heir. Kornegay v. Morris, 122 N. C. 199 [29 S. E. 875]; Williams v. Lewis, 100 N. C. 142 [5 S. E. 435, 6 Am. St. Rep. 574]; Buchanan v. Buchanan, 99 N. C. 308 [5 S. E. 430]. And by reason of the terms in which the contingency is expressed, 'that if each or all of the girls die without leaving a lawful heir, then the land,' etc., and other indications which could be referred to, the estate does not become absolute in the other daughters on the death of one of them without leaving such heir, but the determinable quality of each interest continues to affect such interest until the event occurs by which it is to be determined or the estate becomes absolute. Galloway v. Carter, 100 N. C. 112 [5 S. E. 4]; Hilliard v. Kearney, 45 N. C. 221."

[1-3] Construing this will in reference to these authorities, and bearing in mind the well-recognized positions that as to wills "the intent of the testator, as ascertained from the consideration of the whole will in the light of the surrounding circumstances, must govern (Holt v. Holt, 114 N. C. 241 [18 S. E. 967])," and that as to both wills and deeds the intent as embodied in the entire instrument must prevail, and each and every part must be given effect, if it can be done by fair and reasonable intendment, before one clause may be construed as repugnant to or irreconcilable with another (Davis v. Frazer, 150 N. C. 447, 64 S. E. 200), we are of opinion that the will conveys to the children mentioned in the third item an estate in fee defeasible on dying without leaving lawful issue of his or her body surviving and in that event as to either, and, when it occurs, the interest passes to the surviving children or to the "lawful heirs who may be surviving any of my children," and that by these words the testator did not intend "heirs" in the ordinary or general meaning of the term, but surviving issue, and in the sense of children and grandchildren, etc., of the devisees named, and that, in case this interest should arise to them, they would take and hold as purchasers directly from the deviser. To hold, as plaintiffs contend, that the words "lawful heirs who may be surviving any of my children" were intended to and did include the heirs general of the devisees named or issue in the sense of "heirs of the body" which last under our statute are established as equivalent to heirs general, would be to declare such devisees the absolute owners, and in direct contravention of the words just used by the testator, and by which their interest and ownership was made contingent on either dying without issue of the body living at the time of his or her death, and would also frustrate the purpose expressed in the item just succeeding, by which the daughter Saprionia was disinherited, for she would come within the description and definition of "lawful heirs who may be surviving any of my children" as contended for by plaintiff. There are numerous decisions, here and elsewhere, by which the words "heir or heirs or issue" in wills are construed to mean children and grandchildren when such construction would effectuate the manifest purpose of the testator. Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 314, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172; Sain v. Baker, 128 N. C. 256, 38 S. E. 858; Patrick v. Morehead, 85 N. C. 62, 39 Am. Rep. 684; Campbell v. Cronly, 150 N. C. 458, 64 S. E. 213. In this last case on matter relevant to the present inquiry it was held: "An estate to one, with a declaration of the use to grantor's wife and two named children in fee, 'and to the survivors of them,' the conveyance further providing that, if the said daughters 'shall die leaving issue, then to the use of such surviving issue, who shall take the same per stirpes, and not per capita,' does not vest the fee in the daughters upon the death of the wife; the grantor's intent appearing, both from the usual and legal significance of the language employed, to create in the daughters a determinable fee, and, upon the death of either, the use would shift and vest in the 'surviving issue.'" An estate in trust to the use of grantor's two daughters, providing in the deed that if said daughters "shall die leaving living issue then to the use of such surviving issue, who shall take the same per stirpes, and not per capita," creates a succession of survivorships in the living children and grandchildren of the daughters, who may take as purchasers upon the happening of the event, and the daughters named cannot convey to a purchaser a good and indefeasible title. And the decision is an apt authority on the interpretation placed on the present devise.

[4] Having held the estate in the devisees to be a fee simple, defeasible on certain contingencies, by which the interest of one or more of them might pass to the children or grandchildren of the others as purchasers, it follows that the judgment in the partition proceedings to which the original devisees were all parties does not operate to perfect this title. True, we have held in Carter v. White, 134 N. C. 466, 46 S. E. 983, 101 Am. St. Rep. 853, that "a judgment in a partition proceeding determining the respective interests of the parties thereto is binding on said parties as against an after-acquired title." But this position obtains only as between the parties and their privies in estate, and does not prevail as against third persons. Gillam v. Edmonson, 154 N. C. 127, 69 S. E. 924. Suppose this present feme plaintiff should die without issue living at her death, under the terms of the will her estate would pass to her surviving sisters and her brothers mentioned in the third item of the will. Suppose, further, that one of her surviving sisters should then die, leaving sons and daughters. These last would take and hold, not under their mother who was a party to the proceedings, but as purchasers under the will of their grandfather. They would claim, not under the partition proceedings, but above it and so would not be bound by it.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the plaintiffs are not now in a position to offer the defendant company a good title to the property, and that the decree enforcing performance of the contract must be reversed.

STATE v. MAYHEW et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS (§ 5*) —FEES—CRIMINAL "PROSECUTION."

Revisal 1905, § 2768, allows the solicitor, for "every conviction on an indictment which he shall prosecute for a capital crime," $20 to be taxed against defendant, but where he is insolvent the solicitor's fee shall be one-half to be paid by the county, "except that for convictions in capital felonies," forgery, perjury and conspiracy, he shall receive full fees. On trial of an indictment for murder in the first degree the solicitor stated that he would only ask for a conviction of murder in the second degree, which was not a capital crime, and the conviction was for that degree. Held, that the prosecution was for a capital crime, "prosecution being the whole or any part of the procedure which the law provides for bringing offenders to justice," but as there was no conviction of a capital crime the solicitor's fee could be only $10 (quoting 6 Words and Phrases, p. 5737).

Clark, C. J., and Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Union County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by the State against George Mayhew and others. Appeal by the county commissioners from an order retaxing costs for fees due the solicitor. Error.

This is an appeal by the commissioners of Union county from an order retaxing the costs or fees due the solicitor in above case.

The following are the findings and judgment: "(1) That at January criminal term of Union county the solicitor sent a bill of indictment before the grand jury, charging George Mayhew and two others with murder in the first degree, and that said indictment was returned into open court on Monday, January 28th, indorsed, 'A true bill.' (2) That on the 31st day of January at said term the solicitor announced that he would not ask for murder in the first degree, but for murder in the second degree or for manslaughter, as the jury might find the facts to be. (3) That said defendants were put on trial and convicted of murder in the second degree at said term, and were sentenced to terms of years in the penitentiary. (4) That said defendants are insolvent, and are unable to pay the costs in the case. (5) That in making out the bill of costs in the case to be presented to the county commissioners the clerk taxed a fee of $10 for each defendant, and the bill was ordered paid by the commissioners of Union county. (6) That upon due notice to the commissioners of Union county the solicitor moved to retax the bill of costs, claiming that he is entitled to fee of $20 for each defendant; and, by consent, the motion was heard before the court at the February term of the superior court."

Upon the foregoing facts the court is of the opinion that the solicitor is entitled to a fee of $20 for each defendant convicted upon said indictment, and the clerk is hereby directed to retax the bill of costs in accordance with this order.

Adams, Armfield & Adams, for appellants.
J. J. Parker, for appellee.

BROWN, J. [1] The fees of the solicitor in this case are fixed by the following paragraphs, section 2768 of the Revisal 1905:

"The solicitor shall, in addition to the general compensation allowed them by the state, receive the following fees, and no other, namely:

"For every conviction upon an indictment which they may prosecute for a capital crime twenty dollars.

"The fees in all the above cases are to be taxed in the costs against the party convicted; but where the party convicted is insolvent, the solicitor's fees shall be one-half, to be paid by the county in which the indictment was found, except that for convictions in capital felonies, forgery, perjury, and conspiracy, when they shall receive full fees."

The record in this case raises only one point, viz., is the solicitor entitled to full fee of $20 for each defendant or to only $10—half fees? It is admitted by the counsel for the appellants, the commissioners, that the solicitor is entitled to $10—half fees—for each defendant convicted in this case. The prosecution, as commenced by bill of indictment, was undoubtedly for a capital crime, but the conviction was for murder in the second degree, which is not a capital crime. It would therefore seem plain that under the express language of the act, the defendants being insolvent and the county taxed with the costs, the solicitor is entitled to only half fees, admitted by appellants to be $10 in each case. There was no conviction for a capital felony, and therefore the case is not brought within the exception contained in the statute.

Since the division of the crime of murder into two degrees, the solicitor's fees have remained unchanged. It requires about as much labor to convict of murder in the second degree as of the capital crime, and a conviction for the former should be put on the same basis as forgery, perjury, and conspiracy, but that can be done only by the Legislature.

It is suggested that the solicitor never prosecuted an indictment for a capital crime and that he is entitled to only $4. We are of opinion that he commenced a prosecution upon an indictment for a capital crime, and that had he convicted the defendants of the capital felony he would have been entitled to $20 for each defendant, but as he did not so convict he is entitled to only half that sum. The prosecution commenced when the solicitor drew the indictment for murder, a capital felony, and sent it to the grand jury. The prosecution for a capital felony continued when the bill was returned a true bill and the solicitor caused the prisoners to be arraigned, as the record shows, for a capital felony. "Prosecution is the whole or any part of the procedure which the law provides for bringing offenders to justice." Words & Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5737, citing Ex parte Fagg, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 573, 44 S. W. 294, 40 L. R. A. 212.

No degrees of murder were recognized in this state prior to 1893, and all murder was punishable with death. The act of 1893 created no new crime. It merely classified the different kinds of murder, leaving it to the petit jury to say of what degree of murder the accused is guilty. Pub. Laws 1893,

c. 85; State v. Ewing, 127 N. C. 555, 37 S. E. 332; State v. Banks, 143 N. C. 656, 57 S. E. 174. As pointed out above, this court has held that the solicitor must send a bill charging murder in the first degree, and the grand jury must so find it, before the solicitor can prosecute the accused for murder in the second degree. State v. Ewing, supra. Therefore, when the solicitor after arraignment decided to ask for a verdict of murder in the second degree only upon the evidence, so far as his fees are concerned he occupied the same position as if he had asked for a conviction for the capital felony and secured one for the second degree only. We cannot suppose for a moment that when the Legislature divided the crime of murder into two degrees it intended as a consequence to reduce the solicitor's fees to $4 in case of a conviction for murder in second degree. This would reduce the fee in such cases to a much smaller figure than is allowed in perjury, forgery, counterfeiting and seven other offenses of much less gravity than homicide, where the fee is fixed at $10. Revisal, § 2768.

We think our opinion that the indictment and arraignment constituted a prosecution for a capital felony, although there was a conviction for murder in second degree, is strongly supported by the opinion in Coward v. Commissioners, 137 N. C. 300, 49 S. E. 207, where Clark, C. J., says: "The question presented is the liability (300) of the county of Jackson for costs of state's witnesses in State v. Long, who was indicted in that county for murder, but whose cause was removed to the superior court of Macon. After the removal to the latter a nolle prosequi was entered as to murder in the first degree, and the witnesses were subpoenaed to the next term, at which the prisoner was tried for murder in the second degree and convicted of manslaughter. The witnesses for the state were entitled to their mileage and fees in full so long as attending court as witnesses upon the capital charge, including the term at which the nol. pros. was entered." In that case there was a trial for murder in second degree only and yet the witnesses were allowed full fees so long as attending court upon the capital charge.

We take the true intent and meaning of the law is that the solicitor shall receive $20 for a conviction in a capital felony, and where he indicts and arraigns the prisoner for the capital felony and the jury returns a verdict of murder in second degree or manslaughter the solicitor is entitled to $10 only. Error.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). Revisal 1905, § 2768, provides that the solicitors shall "receive the following fees and no other." In the list is the following: "For every conviction upon an indictment which they may prosecute for a capital crime, $20." Revisal, § 3245, provides the form of indictment for murder and Revisal, § 3271, provides that the same form shall be used whether it is murder in the first degree or murder in the second degree. In State v. Ewing, 127 N. C. 555, 37 S. E. 332, it was held that the grand jury could not make the distinction by indorsement upon the bill, and in State v. Hunt, 128 N. C. 587, 38 S. E. 474, it was said that when the case is reached for trial the solicitor determined that the trial or prosecution was for murder in the second degree by then so stating. The court held that "such action was equivalent to a nol. pros. as to murder in the first degree," and that consequently the prisoner was not entitled to a special venire or 23 challenges. This has been approved in State v. Caldwell, 129 N. C. 688, 40 S. E. 85; Coward v. Com'rs, 137 N. C. 300, 49 S. E. 207. In Coward v. Com'rs, supra, the court held, approving the above cases, that when a nol. pros. is entered as to murder in the first degree the state's witnesses subsequently attending are entitled to only half fees. The solicitor having entered a nol. pros. the prisoner, it was held, was not prosecuted for murder in the first degree and was deprived of all his challenges but 4 and of the right to a special venire. After such nol. pros. the witnesses also were not entitled to be considered witnesses in a capital felony, and were deprived of the pay which they would have otherwise received as such.

How then can it happen that the solicitor, notwithstanding the nol. pros. entered by him shall be entitled to pay for prosecuting a capital felony? As to the prisoner, it is held that he was not prosecuted for a capital felony. As to the witnesses, it is held that they are not attending a prosecution for a capital felony. How then could the solicitor be prosecuting for a capital felony so as to earn an allowance which is given for the extra labor involved in prosecuting an offense in which a special venire is ordered, and 23 challenges are allowed, and with the responsibilities incident to a trial in which a verdict is sought for a capital offense?

The grand jury certainly could not prosecute. The bill is a very ample one of a few lines and is simply a bill for "murder." It is not a bill specifying either degree of murder, and whether it is to be "prosecuted for a capital felony" or not cannot be determined till the prosecution or trial begins, at which time the solicitor in this case stated that the trial or prosecution would be for "murder in the second degree"—which is not a "prosecution for a capital felony." The solicitor prosecuted for murder in the second degree and entered of record that he would not prosecute—i. e., would not try the prisoner—for the capital felony. He cannot be entitled to an allowance for "prosecuting for a capital felony" when he has done nothing of the kind. The "prosecution" by the solicitor means "the trial," and begins only when the trial begins. This is plainly stated by Chief Justice Marshall in Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. Ed. 257, who said: "To prosecute a suit is, according to the common acceptation of language, to continue a demand which has been made by the institution of process in a court of justice."

It may be that the Legislature has not been as liberal to the solicitors in this respect as they ought to be, and that there ought to be a larger allowance than $4, for prosecuting for murder in the second degree, which is the actual service that the solicitor in this case rendered. But it is for the Legislature to fix the fees of the solicitor and if they are too low, it is for that body, and not for the courts, to amend the allowance.

WALKER, J. (concurring in the dissent). I agree that there is error in the judgment, but not for the reason stated by the majority. The definition in the opinion of the court of the word "prosecution," as being the whole or any part of the procedure which the law provides for bringing offenders to justice, is statutory and was taken from a Texas enactment. It does not conform to the accepted definition of the word, but was evidently intended, for some reason, to modify it. The courts have generally adopted Chief Justice Marshall's definition, as given in the opinion of the Chief Justice. The court, in Buecker v. Carr, 60 N. J. Eq. 300, 47 Atl. 34, says there is a clear distinction between the prosecution of a proceeding or suit, and the bringing or initiation of it. The same court held in State v. McDonald, 2 N. J. Law, 355-360, that "a prosecution is not an action, it is not a suit, for none of our books confound it with those two words. It is the following up or carrying on of an action or suit already commenced, until the remedy be attained." In Schulte v. Keokuk County, 74 Iowa, 292, 37 N. W. 376, a case involving the amount of fee due a solicitor, the court adopted the definitions of the word given by Bouvier and Burrill, substantially the same, as follows: "A prosecution is the means adopted to bring a supposed offender to justice and punishment by due course of law" (Bouvier's Law Dict.); or "the institution and continuance of a criminal suit; the process of exhibiting formal charges against an offender before a legal tribunal, and pursuing them to final judgment on behalf of the state or government, as by indictment or information" (Burrill's Law Dict.). "To prosecute an action or suit is to follow up or to carry on such action or suit." Inh. of Knowlton Township v. Read, 11 N. J. Law, 321. "The requirement to 'prosecute' means that the suit or proceeding shall be followed up to the conclusion and is not complied with by a return of the suit to the court, for that is but one of the series of acts which go to make up the prosecution of the suit." Marryott v. Young, 33 N. J. Law, 337; 6 Words & Phrases, p. 5734. Having regard to its Latin derivation, the word means not to go backward or abandon, but to pursue or to go forward. It clearly involves the idea of continuance and not suspension. Blackstone and Webster agree that "to prosecute" means "to institute and carry on a legal proceeding." All this is according to the high authority of Chief Justice Marshall. But our statute plainly contemplates that the indictment shall first be returned by the grand jury and then prosecuted. It so says: "For any conviction upon an indictment which they may prosecute for a capital crime, twenty dollars." As you cannot carry on what is not commenced, the indictment may, in that sense, be a part of the criminal prosecution, but not by any means all of it, and the prosecution intended by the statute is that which follows the finding of the bill. We do not even require the aid of a definition to guide us in ascertaining the meaning of this provision. It sufficiently explains itself.

My strong inclination would be to decide in favor of the full allowance of $20, believing, as I do, that it would be but inadequate compensation for the services rendered in such cases, but the language of the statute is clear and the meaning too plain even for construction. The defendant must be prosecuted for the capital felony to entitle the solicitor to the fee of $20. It seems to me that the expression used, "for convictions in capital felonies," when providing for half fees, and the other, "for conviction upon an indictment which they may prosecute for a capital crime," should have the same meaning, and if the construction of the majority is correct, namely, that the prosecution intended by the statute is the commencement of the proceeding by the finding of the bill, the solicitor should have the full fee of $20, and the judgment should, therefore, be affirmed; but for the reasons above stated, my opinion is that the solicitor is not entitled to even the half of the fee of $20, as he did not prosecute for the capital crime. Coward v. Commissioners, 137 N. C. 300, 49 S. E. 207, sustains our view. As long as there was a prosecution for the capital crime, the fees were allowed to the witnesses, as claimed by them, but not so after the solicitor had abandoned the prosecution for the capital felony and had agreed to prosecute only for murder in the second degree. This shows clearly that there must be a continuance of the prosecution for the capital felony in order to entitle the solicitor to the fee of $20.

STATE v. HOLLY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 485*)—EXPERT TESTIMONY—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION—BASIS.

In a murder trial, it was error to permit an expert witness to be asked a hypothetical question as to the cause of decedent's death based on a supposition that a chemical examination disclosed strychnine in the stomach, liver, and lungs, where the only examination in evidence was that of the stomach.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 485*)—EVIDENCE—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS—BASIS.

A hypothetical question need not be based upon all the facts in evidence; opinions being properly asked upon different combinations of facts in evidence, but a question based on facts not in evidence is error.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 163*)—EVIDENCE—ACCUSED'S CHARACTER.

In a murder trial, it was improper to allow the state to ask a witness to accused's good character if he had not heard that accused had been charged with killing his wife.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Peebles, Judge.

J. G. Holly was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed for new trial.

The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree. He was sentenced to be electrocuted, and appeals to this court.

The defendant offered no evidence.

That introduced on the part of the state tends to show: That the defendant, J. C. Holly, was the proprietor of a hotel in the city of Wilmington, known as the Rock Spring Hotel. That the deceased, Edward Cromwell, was a boy about 18 years of age, who lived with the defendant, and the defendant spoke of adopting him. It does not appear what relation, if any, the deceased bore to the defendant. That about March 27, 1910, the Life Insurance Company of Virginia received an application for a $1,000 policy on the life of Edward Cromwell, but declined to issue same for lack of information as to the parentage of the young man. The agent of the Virginia Company told Holly and Cromwell that they might get a policy with the Greensboro Life, and also told the agent of the Greensboro Life that he might get an application from these people. That about June 20, 1910, application was made to the Greensboro Life Insurance Company for a $5,000 policy on the life of Edward Cromwell. The company issued a $2,500 policy, the beneficiary named being the estate of Edward Cromwell, and the policy was delivered to Holly and Cromwell jointly, Holly paying the premium. That about a week after the policy was delivered Holly and Cromwell requested the agent of the Greensboro Life to make out the papers for the transfer of the policy to Holly and the transfer was duly made, and probated on the evening of August 8th. That Holly said he intended to adopt the young man and educate him and will him all his property, and that he expected the boy to take care of him in his old age. That the agent said to Holly that the transfer would have to be sent to the home office and be approved before the assignment would be valid, and that Holly, so far as the agent of the Greensboro Life knew, had never been notified that the policy had been transferred to him by the home office. That Holly had insured his furniture for $1,250, stating to the insurance agent at the time the policy was issued that the furniture was worth $1,700. That the agent of the company made an examination after the fire, and valued the furniture at $450. That something was said to Holly about there not being much furniture in the house, and Holly said he had shipped a part of it away. That in June, 1910, the defendant, Holly, bought one dram of strychnine from a drug store in Wilmington, saying that he wanted it for the purpose of killing rats, and on August 3, 1910, he bought another dram for the same alleged purpose. That on the night of August 9, 1910, the boy, Cromwell, came into the hotel about 10 o'clock eating an ice cream cone. That some time after 10 o'clock, one Matthews, the occupant of the room No. 8 in the hotel, heard some one who seemed to be in great agony. Room No. 4, where deceased was found, was about six feet from room No. 8, occupied by Mr. Matthews. That Matthews heard a low voice like some one crying to another, and then heard a little whiffing sound which he recognized as a peculiar noise made by Holly with his nose. That after the fire witness asked Holly what all the trouble meant in the house that night, and Holly said he was having one of his spells and his boy was fanning him. That on the same night—that is, about 2:30 a. m. on the morning of August 10th—an alarm of fire was turned in, and Holly's hotel was found to be on fire.

W. P. Monroe, assistant chief of the fire department, testifies as follows: "I am assistant chief of the fire department of the city of Wilmington. On the morning of August 10, 1910, we had an alarm of fire from box 25, and upon responding to that alarm we found the fire in the old Rock Spring Hotel, occupied by the prisoner, at No. 8 Chestnut street. I heard people hollering, and ordered the men to rescue the people from the windows, which they did. I went in the building from the front, and, when I came out, the prisoner asked me if I had seen his boy, the one that worked in the kitchen, and I asked him where he was, and he said he usually occupied room No. 4, on the right side of the passage. I went back in the building, and found the boy lying in the room No. 4 dead. His head was to the south, his feet to the north, and he was lying on an old comfort, which was burned up, except the part which was underneath him. I went back to the street and told Holly that the man was dead in No. 4, and that, if he had told me in time, I could have gotten him out. When I told him the boy was dead, he cried. I examined the room, and found that there was a bed, bedstead, mattress, and a grip in the room. The head of the bed was towards the north and the body was lying between the bed and the door, with his feet towards the north. The body was near the foot of the bed. There was nothing on the bed except the sheet and pillow, and the bed did not look like it had been occupied. Mr. Farrow, Mr. Frost, and myself took the body out. It was then stiff and cold. I discovered the body somewhere between 30 and 40 minutes after I got to the fire. The fire was then out. The body was stiff, with hands drawn upon the breast clenched. He had the thumb placed between the two fingers (turned under the forefinger). He appeared to be about 18 years old, and would weigh about 110 pounds, and was about 4 feet and 6 inches tall. The main fire was in the adjoining room, and the partition between this room and room No. 4, where the boy was, had burned out. The mattress which I found in this room was saturated with kerosene on it, and it had burned up to where the boy's body was on it. I detected odors something like kerosene. The fire was burning very badly in the adjoining room. It seemed to have originated there. After I took the body out, I placed it in the front room until the coroner was notified. I did not see the coroner. The body was taken to King's undertaking shop. I asked the prisoner about his furniture, and he said he had shipped some that belonged to Mr. Flowers in Pikeville; didn't say when he shipped it. There didn't seem to be very much furniture in the house. When I opened room No. 4, it was full of smoke and steam. Chief Schibben was there at that time. The windows were shut down, and we broke the glass out. The body was dressed in socks and underwear. I saw two kerosene oil cans in the room where the fire originated and an empty vinegar barrel."

An autopsy was held, and a part of the liver, a part of the lungs, and the stomach were sent to W. A. Withers, professor of chemistry in the College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, who analyzed parts of the stomach and found two-fifths of a grain of strychnine in the stomach. Five tests were made, and all of these disclosed the presence of strychnine in the stomach. Prof. Withers and the doctors testified that one-half of a grain of strychnine is the minimum dose that will produce death, but that the strychnine which kills is the portion assimilated and distributed through the blood, and not the portion that remains in the stomach, and that he made no tests of the liver and lungs. The court put the following hypothetical question to Dr. Russell Bellamy: Dr. Russell Bellamy, a witness for the state, testified as follows: "I am a physician. Witness is admitted by the defendant to be an expert. I have heard the evidence in this case, and am acquainted with the effect of poison on the human system. Q. By the Court: If the jury should find that the deceased was a young man about 18 years old, weight from 110 to 140 pounds, was found dead between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, stiff and rigid, with his hands clenched and his thumbs between his forefingers, and upon a chemical examination of the contents of his stomach and a part of his liver and a part of his lungs the jury should find that such chemical examination showed that those parts had about two-fifths of a grain of strychnine in them, what in your opinion would be the cause of the death of the deceased? A. Strychnine or the salt of strychnine." Dr. Bell, a witness for the state, testified upon a cross-examination that the general character of the defendant was good. Upon the redirect examination the witness was asked by the state if he had not heard that the prisoner had been accused of killing his wife. The witness answered: "Not until after the present charge was brought." To this question and answer the defendant objected and excepted. Two expert witnesses on the part of the state expressed the opinion that the cause of the death of the deceased was suffocation by smoke. The evidence was entirely circumstantial.

C. D. Weeks and Wm. J. Bellamy, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett and G. L. Jones, for the State.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We have examined the record with the care the importance of the case demands, and conclude that there is error which entitles the prisoner to a new trial. The hypothetical question propounded by the court to the medical expert, Dr. Russell Bellamy, included an important circumstance, as to which there was no evidence, to wit, that there had been a chemical examination of a part of the liver and a part of the lungs of the deceased, and that strychnine was found in each. Prof. Withers, who made the chemical examination, stated expressly that he made no tests of the liver and lungs, and that his test was confined to the stomach. The clear inference from the evidence is that, but for the incorporation of this circumstance into the question, the answer of the expert would have been different, and the prisoner would have had the benefit of an opinion favorable to him, instead of the disadvantage of one that was injurious. The evidence indicates that strychnine may be in the stomach and death ensue from other causes, and that the quantity found in the stomach does not contribute to death, as it has not been assimilated. It is the strychnine taken up by the system which is dangerous, and this is traced in the liver, lungs, and other organs. The materiality of the answer to the question and its effect on the jury is apparent when it is remembered that the cause of the death of the deceased was in dispute; the state contending it was caused by strychnine administered by the prisoner, and the prisoner contending it was from suffocation by smoke, and that two expert witnesses for the state testified the latter was the cause of death. The injurious effect of this evidence is intensified by the fact that the question was propounded by the court, and not by counsel. It not only elicited an opinion upon facts not in evidence, but the jury might well infer that the court thought there was evidence that strychnine had been found in the liver and lungs.

[2] It is not necessary in the statement of a hypothetical question that all the facts should be stated. Opinions may be asked for upon different combinations of facts on the examination in chief and on the cross-examination, but "to allow on the direct examination an hypothetical question to be put, which assumes a state of facts not warranted by the testimony, is error, and counsel will never be permitted on the direct examination to embrace in an hypothetical question anything which the testimony does not either prove or tend to prove." Rogers, Ex. Ev. § 27; People v. Hall, 48 Mich. 489, 12 N. W. 665, 42 Am. Rep. 477; Reber v. Herring, 115 Pa. 609, 8 Atl. 830.

[3] We also think there was error in allowing the state to ask Dr. Bell, who testified to the good character of the prisoner, if he had not heard that the prisoner had been accused of killing his wife, and his reply: "Not until after the present charge was brought."

[4] The defendant did not testify in his own behalf, but he was entitled to introduce evidence of his good character as a circumstance tending to show the improbability of his having committed the crime alleged against him. State v. Laxton, 76 N. C. 216;

State v. Hice, 117 N. C. 783, 23 S. E. 357. When he availed himself of this right, the state could introduce evidence of bad character, but could not by cross-examination or otherwise offer evidence as to particular acts of misconduct. The rule is just, and based upon sound reason. A party charged with crime may be prepared to defend an attack upon his general character, which is a single fact, but he could not have at the trial witnesses to explain the conduct of a lifetime. Again, questions of this character, if permitted, would tend to multiply issues, would needlessly prolong trials, and would be calculated to distract the minds of jurors from the real issue. If a witness may state that he has heard that the defendant had been charged with killing his wife, the defendant ought to be allowed in reply to show that the charge is false, and to do so might involve the examination of many witnesses. If one collateral question of this character can be raised and tried, the same rule would permit a hundred others. The authorities in this state are numerous and uniform that it is error to allow such questions on the cross-examination of a witness as to character.

In Barton v. Morpheus, 13 N. C. 520, it was held inadmissible to ask "if he had not heard Morton accused of stealing a penknife"; in Luther v. Skeen, 53 N. C. 357, that "there was a current report in the neighborhood that plaintiff had sworn to lies while living in Randolph"; in State v. Bullard, 100 N. C. 487, 6 S. E. 192, "Do you not know that it was extensively talked about and said that the defendant practiced a fraud upon the firm of Worth & Worth?"; in Marcom v. Adams, 122 N. C. 222, 29 S. E. 338, "Have you not heard that defendant had committed forgery?" "Do you not know the defendant had been indicted for forgery?"; and in Coxe v. Singleton, 139 N. C. 362, 51 S. E. 1019, "Have you not heard that the defendant committed rape on a negro girl?" "Have you not heard he padded his pay roll at the mill?"

The first of these cases, Barton v. Morpheus, supra, which has been frequently approved, is of special importance, in that Chief Justice Henderson considers the ground frequently urged as a reason for admitting questions like the one under consideration as a means of testing the character witness. He says: "The ground on which the counsel for the defendant placed the question cannot render the evidence admissible, namely, that, although not evidence in chief, it is admissible to impeach the character of the supporting witness; that witness having given the first a good character, when he knew such reports had been circulated. This would be doing that indirectly which the law forbids to be done directly, viz., impeaching the character of the witness in chief by specific charges, and that, too, not by common reputation, but by a mere report, which is very different; for the law supposes the latter to be true, and therefore admits it as evidence. But it makes no such supposition in favor of a mere report, which we know to be most commonly false. Reports may ripen into common reputation and common belief. When they arrive at that stage, it is supposed that they are true. They have then the best test of their truth, common opinion, and belief, and cease to be mere reports."

[5] There is another objection to the answer of the witness, as applied to the facts of this case, and that is that the evidence related to a fact affecting the character of the defendant, subsequent to the time of the commission of the offense alleged against him. When the defendant is not a witness, evidence of his general character should be confined to the time preceding the crime charged. State v. Johnson, 60 N. C. 151. The rule is otherwise if he testifies in his own behalf, as his credibility is then involved. State v. Spurling, 118 N. C. 1250, 24 S. E. 533. That the evidence was prejudicial cannot be doubted. The prisoner was charged with murdering by poison a member of his household, and the evidence was circumstantial. It was calculated to excite feeling against him in the minds of the most intelligent and upright jurors to know that he had been charged with killing his wife.

[6] It is permissible to test the character witness by inquiring as to his sources of information (State v. Perkins, 66 N. C. 126), and he may be asked if there was not a general reputation prior to the controversy as to particular matters tending to discredit, but, when this is done, the jury should be instructed that such evidence can only be considered as bearing on the evidence of the witness who testifies as to character. The evidence was not withdrawn from the jury, and the error in admitting it was not cured in the charge.

The competency of the record of the druggist as the evidence is now presented is doubtful, but it is not necessary to pass upon it, as the state can produce the witness who made the entries at the next trial.

There must be a new trial.

CABE v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURY TO BRAKEMAN—DUTY OF ENGINEER.

It is not the duty of the engineer of a train, which is backing, to look along it or along the ends of the ties to discover immediately that a brakeman has fallen between the cars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 277; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action for the running over of a brakeman, who fell between the cars of a train that was backing, held insufficient to show that the engineer could have stopped the train in time, had he seen him immediately after he fell.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

Clark, C. J., and Allen, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Council, Judge.

Action by S. L. Cabe, administrator of W. H. Sigmon, against the Southern Railway Company and another. There was a judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Craig, Martin & Thomason, for appellant. Moore & Rollins and W. B. Rodman, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff brings this action against the defendant Lon Roberts to recover damages for the death of his intestate, W. H. Sigmon, attributing his death to the negligent conduct of Roberts, an engineer of defendant railway company's freight train. Sigmon was a brakeman on the train, and on the 6th of May, 1908, was killed by falling between two cars. The facts are that the engineer was backing his train of three cars from the main track on to a siding at Balsam, the engine and tender pushing the cars. The three cars were coal cars loaded with wood. As the train was partly on main track and turning on to the siding Sigmon undertook to step from the second car to the one next to the tender, and fell between them. As he fell one foot was caught in the air hose coupler between the two cars, and Sigmon was thrown on his stomach across the rail. He grasped the ends of the cross-ties with his hands and endeavored to move his body along so as to keep out of the way of the wheel, but one wheel caught his leg and severed it, from which he died. It is admitted that if Roberts was guilty of such negligence as caused Sigmon's death, the railway company is liable, along with Roberts, for the resultant damage. The learned judge of the court below ruled that there was not sufficient evidence that Sigmon's death was occasioned by Roberts' negligence to require the matter to be submitted to the jury, and in that we agree with him.

We infer from the eloquent remarks of the learned counsel for plaintiff in defense of the right of trial by jury that he feels that his client was deprived of a fundamental right by the action of the judge. The record shows that the jury were duly impaneled and heard the case. At its conclusion his honor ruled that the plaintiff had failed to make out a case by proof as he was required to do. If his honor was correct, then there was nothing for the jury to try. Speaking for the court, in State v. Walker, 149 N. C. 530, 83 S. E. 77, Mr. Justice Hoke well says: "The controlling principle on a question of this character is very well stated by Merri-mon, J., in State v. White, 89 N. C. 464-465, as follows: 'It is well-settled law that the court must decide what is evidence, and whether there is any evidence to be submitted to the jury, pertinent to an issue submitted to them. It is as well settled, that if there is evidence to be submitted, the jury must determine its weight and effect. This, however, does not imply that the court must submit a scintilla—very slight evidence; on the contrary, it must be such as, in the judgment of the court, would reasonably warrant the jury finding a verdict upon the issue submitted, affirmatively or negatively, accordingly as they might view it in one light or another and give it more or less weight, or none at all.' " This is a settled rule of law which obtains in all courts where the practice and principles of the common law obtains, and is quoted and affirmed by Mr. Justice Allen in State v. Hawkins, 71 S. E. 326, at this term. This practice is conducive to the dispatch of business and the orderly determination of litigated rights, and has been crystallized into a statute, Revisal 1905, § 539, which bears the name of an eminent lawyer of this state.

[1] There are four grounds of negligence set out in the complaint, but plaintiff rests his case upon one only, viz., that the defendant Roberts failed to stop his train, when he knew or should have known of Sigmon's imminent danger, and that he could have stopped in time to have saved his life. It was stated upon the argument that there was a man stationed on the end of the train to keep a lookout as the train was being backed, but it was admitted that he could have rendered no assistance and could not possibly have prevented the injury. As to whether the engineer under such conditions must also look out of his cab window when he is backing his train or can well do so and manage his train it is unnecessary to determine. This engineer admits he was looking out of the cab window and towards the end of the train and in the direction in which his train was moving. The learned counsel for plaintiff admits with characteristic candor and humanity that if the defendant Roberts had seen the predicament of Sigmon he would have done all in his power to avert the catastrophe. But it is contended that by the exercise of due diligence the said defendant could have seen him, and that if he had seen him he could have stopped the train in time to have saved his life. All the evidence shows that when Sigmon fell Roberts could not have possibly seen the fall. He was in his cab and the tender and a car loaded high with wood was between him and Sigmon. When Sigmon fell, one foot was hung in the air hose coupler and his stomach was on the rail, and his head and hands about at end of cross-ties. He grasped the ends of the ties with his hands and endeavored by moving his body to keep the car wheel from catching him. He commenced to halloo as soon as he fell, and according to the witnesses it was about two seconds from the time he fell and commenced to halloo before one wheel ran over him, and the train stopped before the next wheel reached him. The plaintiff Cabe was examined as a witness in respect to the letters of administration, but he was not present on the occasion and knew none of the circumstances.

Plaintiff introduced three witnesses who were present and saw the occurrence. Witness Bryson states that he saw Sigmon twisting the brakes when train was backing on side track; "heard him commence hollering and the train was then slowing up—stopping." "Train did not run over ten feet after I heard Sigmon holler." On cross-examination Bryson stated that he did not really know how far the train moved after Sigmon commenced to holler—but repeats his statement that train was then slowing up and very shortly stopped. The witness was asked these questions: "Q. The train at the time of the accident was backing in on the sidetrack at Balsam? A. Yes. Q. And was preparing to stop at that time? A. Yes. Q. I will ask you if it was not only two or three seconds after the hollering until the train stopped? A. I don't know. Q. Wasn't it an instant? A. It was all done in a short time. Q. Almost a thought or an instant? A. Yes; something like that."

C. H. Perry saw Sigmon fall. On direct examination he states that after Sigmon fell the "train went a little piece, could not say exactly how far." Being pressed to estimate the distance witness said "probably a car length." Upon cross-examination the witness materially qualified his estimate of the distance the train moved after Sigmon fell, as following shows: "Counsel: Q. There was a car between where Sigmon stood and the engine, loaded with wood? A. Yes. Q. At that time you say you saw him fall down on the track, did he say anything at first or did it knock the breath out of him? A. He hollered pretty soon after he fell. Q. Did he holler the same instant he fell or a second or two afterwards? A. Yes, a second or two afterwards; about the same time. Q. I ask you if about the time he hollered twice if the train did not stop, wasn't it all over in a second or two? A. It was not but a short time until the train stopped. Q. It was only a thought or a second or two? A. Yes; he hollered a few times before the train stopped. Q. Would you swear positively that the train moved over 8 or 10 feet or 15 feet at the outside? A. No, sir; I did not measure it."

Mrs. C. H. Perry saw Sigmon just as he fell. His foot caught in something between cars. He fell between cars and had his hands hold of ends of cross-ties. The following excerpt from the evidence gives Mrs. Perry's estimate of the distance train moved after Sigmon fell: "Q. How far do you think the car ran while he was trying to keep out from under the wheels? A. Not very far. Q. What is your best judgment, a car length? You give us your best judgment? The Court: Q. Can you give any idea about the length from any object? A. It was only a few feet between the wheels. Mr. Craig: Q. What was he doing when the wheels caught him? A. He was trying to get out from under. Q. Did he seem to be hanging to anything? A. He was just lying there trying to get out. I don't know whether he was hanging to anything or not. Q. What was he doing, was he moving along? A. He had his hands outside abohd of the ends of the cross-ties. Q. How far did the train run after he fell before the train ran over him? A. Just a few feet; it just pushed him along a few feet and caught him. Q. How far? A. About as far as from here to the end of the table. Court: (Witness indicating about four or five feet.)"

Upon cross-examination Mrs. Perry testifies as follows: "Q. I ask you if he did not look like he was stepping from one car to the other, and either slipped or fell between them? A. Yes; that was the way it looked to me. Q. How far were the closest wheels to him when he fell on the track, was it over two or three feet? A. No, sir; I think not. Q. And you said that when he was standing he was in the middle of the car? A. Yes. Q. And when he fell he fell on the track? A. Yes. Q. And the car ran immediately on his body as the train moved on? A. Yes; it was just a second or two. Q. And it pushed his body along before he fell not exceeding 10 or 15 feet? A. Yes. Q. Don't you know it was not over 8 feet? A. I don't know. Q. You know it was done in a short distance? A. Yes. Q. I ask you if his falling and his hollering and the stopping of the train was not all in a few seconds? A. Yes. Q. Almost in a thought, wasn't it? A. Yes."

This is all the evidence introduced by the plaintiff of those who witnessed the occurrence. The plaintiff's case is not aided by anything cropping out in the evidence introduced by the defendant as an examination of the evidence plainly discloses.

J. R. Warren, witness for defendant, saw Sigmon as he fell; was 10 feet from him; he fell on his stomach across rail; his hands caught hold ends of cross-ties; sliding along in front of wheels; one foot hung in air hose. "Q. Which rail did he fall across? A. The left-hand rail going west. Q. That is the south rail? A. Yes. Q. When he fell in that position, what did you hear and what did you see, and what was done? A. He hollered once or twice, he did not have time to holler much, it was done in a very short time. Q. It was all done in how long? A. In one or two seconds. Q. One or two seconds from the time he fell until the train stopped? A. Yes. Q. How far did the train move, how many feet before it stopped? A. It could not have moved but a short distance. Q. Can you give an idea of how many feet or yards, how many feet? A. I never did measure it. Q. Give us your best impression? A. It was something between 6 or 10 feet, I guess that train moved. Q. That the train moved? A. Yes, before the train stopped. Q. Was there a car between Sigmon at the time he fell, and the engineer? A. Yes, one car. Q. What was that car loaded with? A. Wood. Q. How many seconds was it from the time he fell until the train stopped? A. About two seconds. Q. How fast was that train going? A. Three or four miles an hour, just was barely moving, it was stopping when he fell." This witness further testifies that when Sigmon fell across the rail his head was about even with the end of the cross-ties.

D. C. Ensley saw Sigmon fall and gives substantially same account as other witnesses. He helped to pull Sigmon out after train stopped and was asked this question: "Q. Did you make any measurements of how far it was from where he fell to where you pulled him out? A. No, sir; only we saw the print where it looked like he had been in the cinders. It was about four ties. Q. How far would that be? A. Something like two feet from the center to center. Q. And you say there were four? A. Yes; we counted four. Q. From where he fell to where you pulled him out? A. Yes."

F. L. Potts saw the occurrence and stated: "Q. I wish you would state to his honor and the jury just what you saw in regard to this matter? A. I heard him holler and I ran out a few steps and looked, I was facing the railroad and could have seen him if I had looked. And the train was just barely stopping when I saw him flounce on his stomach and his heels came over and I started towards him. Q. From the time you heard him holler until the train stopped how far did the train run? A. Not over six feet. Q. How many times did you hear him holler? A. Three times—I am not certain. Q. From the time he first hollered until the time the train stopped, how much time elapsed? A. Not over two or three seconds."

The defendant Roberts testifies that he was backing from main track to switch at from four to six miles an hour, that he could not see Sigmon from the engine as there was a curve from the side track and he could not see Sigmon for that; that he was looking back from cab window in direction in which he was going; that he did not know Sigmon had fallen until train stopped; that he examined the distance and it was six feet from where Sigmon fell to where train stopped; that he could not have stopped his train of three loaded cars under 8 or 10 feet.

Before the plaintiff can recover, or "go to the jury" in this case he must offer evidence of sufficient probative force to justify the establishment of these propositions: First. That Roberts saw or had actual knowledge of Sigmon's peril. As this is not contended by counsel it may be dismissed without discussion. Second. That, although Roberts had no actual knowledge of Sigmon's peril, it was his legal duty to have discovered it, and hence the law fixes him with such knowledge. Third. That after Sigmon fell between the wheels of the cars Roberts could have stopped the train in time to have avoided the injury.

Upon the second proposition we have been cited to no authority and have been able to find none, which fastens upon an engineer the duty to watch his brakemen, as they move over the train in the discharge of their duties, or to discover immediately that one has fallen between the cars. It is manifestly impossible and inconsistent with the management of an engine. Neither have we any authority for the contention that it is an engineer's duty, while moving his train backward to look under it or along the cross-ties and in the vicinity of the rails for persons who may have fallen between the cars. The engineer is not required to anticipate such accidents, and unless he actually discovers them, neither reason, authority, nor ordinary justice requires that he be held culpable if he fails to see them. In looking back from his cab window at the end of his train in the direction in which it is going, the engineer may well fail to see a person struggling under the wheels of the cars, for he is not required to look there, or anticipate such accidents as befell Sigmon. And as said by this court: "Where the law does not impose the duty of watchfulness it follows that the failure to watch is not an omission of duty intervening between the negligence of plaintiff in exposing himself, and the accident unless he actually be seen in time to avert it." Pickett v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 636, 23 S. E. 267 (30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611). In this case there was no legal duty on the part of the engineer, Roberts, to watch under the cars, the place where Sigmon fell, and therefore the failure to discover him cannot be imputed to his negligence. When moving his train forward it is the engineer's duty to keep a vigilant lookout in front of him along the tracks. For that reason he is chargeable with knowledge, not only of what he actually sees on the track, but of what by reasonable diligence he might have discovered. This is the principle settled by Bullock's Case, 105 N. C. 180, 10 S. E. 988, Deans' Case, 107 N. C. 686, 12 S. E. 77, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, Pickett's Case, supra, and many other cases. But when a train is backing, the engineer from his cab cannot see the track ahead of his cars. Therefore the company must place a watchman on the end of the last car so he can watch the track and guard against injuring persons in front of him. When the engineer is backing and looking in the direction in which he is moving his vision is of course directed at end of his train. He is looking from an elevated position far above the track rails. His purpose in looking is to note signals, and, as far as possible, guard against any obstruction ahead of his train, and not what may be under its wheels or the ends of the cross-ties. The duties of an engineer are many and weighty, and he is held to a degree of vigilance and responsibility that is placed upon no other servant of the public. But if, in addition, he is to be charged with knowledge of everything that happens on his train and under it he would require the 100 eyes of the fabled Argus. But if perchance Roberts had been looking from his cab directly at the place where Sigmon fell there is no reasonable proof that he could have seen him. The train was being switched from the main track to a siding at the time Sigmon fell, and this formed a curve, throwing the car further out of the line of vision. All the evidence shows that Sigmon's head and hands were at the end of the cross-ties, and that the cars themselves extend 14 inches beyond the rail. The plaintiff's witnesses who were on the ground heard Sigmon halloo but did not see him until they looked for him. Roberts testifies that not only did he not see or hear Sigmon, but that he could not then have seen him from his position in the cab window. Edge's Case, 153 N. C. 212, 69 S. E. 74, is no authority for the positions advanced by the plaintiff. In that case the train was at a standstill in the switching yards. A messenger of the company approached it with the evident purpose of going between the cars. The plaintiff testified that "he (the engineer) was looking straight at me." When plaintiff was between cars the engineer, who should have known of his perilous position, started his train and injured plaintiff. The court thought the evidence of negligence sufficiently strong to be submitted to the jury. The great difference between that case and this is too obvious to justify discussion.

[2] As to the third proposition it is not contended that Roberts could have seen Sigmon as he fell between the cars, and, if he had afterwards actually discovered him struggling on the rail and between the wheels the plaintiff's evidence falls short of showing that Roberts could have stopped his train in time to have avoided the injury. Plaintiff's witnesses all say the train was slowing up when Sigmon fell, that it did move over 8 or 10 feet after that. One witness said about a car length but afterwards materially qualified that statement as the evidence we have quoted will show. Upon cross-examination all plaintiff's witnesses say it was "only a thought," "two or three seconds," from time Sigmon commenced to "holler" until train stopped, and that he commenced to "holler" as soon as he fell. All the evidence shows that this train could not have been stopped at the rate of speed it was moving under 8 or 10 feet. We understood it to be contended on the argument that Roberts, the engineer, testified that he could have stopped his train in 10 or 12 inches. That is erroneous. He stated he could stop one car in 10 or 12 inches provided the slack was all out. There is some two feet slack between the cars and as the train was backing the "slack was all in." This train consisted of three heavy coal cars loaded with wood, and the engineer stated repeatedly it could not have been stopped under 8 or 10 feet.

We have reviewed this case at some length because of its importance, and are unable to find any sufficient evidence to warrant the contention that the defendant Roberts was responsible for the injury Sigmon received, or that it can be fairly attributed to Roberts' negligence. From the evidence it appears to us to have been an accident pure and simple, and, however lamentable, no omission of duty by the defendant Roberts was the proximate cause of it.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOKE, J. (concurring). I concur in the result. All of the testimony tends to show that the deceased fell beneath the train from a position where his fall could not possibly have been noted by the engineer, and that he was run over in about two or three seconds from the time that he fell. All of the witnesses except one testified that the distance the train moved was from 6 to 10 feet, and that he was standing some distance off, and that the train moved about a car length, and the witness afterwards qualified this testimony by saying that he could not positively say that the train moved over 10 or 15 feet. All of the testimony tends to show further that the tender and a car loaded with wood was between the engineer and the intestate at the time that he fell; that the deceased only gave a cry or two, and that if any part of his person was exposed to view at all it was only his hands about the end of the cross-ties and close to the ground, affording slight if any opportunity to either see or hear him, under any circumstances. I assume that the duty was on the engineer, in so far as consistent with proper attention to his engine, to keep an outlook over his train in the direction in which it was moving, and to be properly regardful of the safety of employes upon it, but on the facts of this case, considering the point from which the deceased fell, that it could not have been observed by the engineer, the shortness of the time—not more than two seconds—the necessary attention of the engineer to the proper operation of his engine and the noise attendant upon its movement, I am of opinion that this was an excusable accident, and there is no testimony, within the definition of legal evidence, that there was a breach of duty on the part of the engineer, or that an actionable wrong has been committed by the defendants.

ALLEN, J. (dissenting). I do not concur in the views expressed by the court, but the opinion has been filed so late in the term that I cannot do more than suggest my reasons for dissenting. The opinion of the court is based on two propositions: (1) That it was not the duty of the engineer to keep a lookout in the direction the train was backing, except for the purpose of seeing if there was any obstruction on the track in front of the rear of the train, and consequently the defendants owed no duty to the plaintiff's intestate, a brakeman, who was between the first and second cars. (2) That if such a duty should be imposed there is no evidence that, by the exercise of ordinary care, the dangerous position of the intestate could have been discovered and his death averted. If either position can be sustained, the judgment of nonsuit should be affirmed. It is noticeable that in the first part of the opinion it is stated that it is not necessary to decide the first proposition, but after a review of a part of the evidence, it was thought best to do so.

1. The authorities agree that it is the duty of an engineer, while running his train, to keep a lookout, and that he and the company he represents are chargeable with what he sees, and with all that can be discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. By the term "keeping a lookout," I understand looking in front when the train is moving forward, and to the rear when it is moving backward. If there is any difference in the degree of care to be observed in the performance of this duty, dependent on the movement of the train, I would say that greater care should be required when moving backward, as the operation is more dangerous. I do not think that the purpose of requiring the engineer to look to the rear when it is backing, is to enable him to see obstructions in front of the train, as stated in the opinion of the court, but that it is that he may overlook the train and note the signals of the trainmen, and to do this he must observe their positions. In this case, the train consisted of an engine, tender, and three cars, and it was backing into a siding for the purpose of leaving the cars. J. R. Warren, a witness for the defendant, explains this: "Q. State to his honor and the jury exactly how it occurred and all about it. A. The train comes there, it has a mountain to come up, and they were to put those cars on the side track, and Mr. Sigmon was riding the car when he passed the switch, and he put on the first brake on the rear car and he jumped off by the side of me, and he jumped up between the cars and got out of my sight then, and they went down about 30 or 40 feet, and I saw him down under the car, and he rolled out in front of the wheels." The plaintiff's intestate was setting the brakes in order that the cars might remain on the siding, and in the position desired. Suppose the brakes had not held, was it not the duty of the brakeman to notify the engineer and, if so, his duty to see. I do not wish to see a harsh or unreasonable rule imposed on engineers, who are usually prudent, intelligent, and brave, but the position of the brakeman is a very dangerous one, and he should not be left without protection. If this is a correct view of the relation of the parties, it was the duty of the engineer to look towards the rear of the train, that he might note its condition and might receive signals, and if he failed to look, or if he looked and failed to see what could have been seen by the exercise of ordinary care, he was negligent.

(1) Did he look? I do not know, and it is not for me to say. My duty is at an end when I consider the question whether there was any evidence that he did not look. The engineer testified that he was looking west towards the rear of the train. C. H. Perry, a witness for the plaintiff, described the fall of the deceased, his crying out, etc., and was then asked the following questions: "Q. Which way was the engineer looking when this was going on, what was standing on the other side of this train? A. There was a train pulling out just as they headed in there; pulling out towards Asheville, a freight train. Q. What was Mr. Roberts looking at? A. He had his face turned towards the east, towards Asheville when I noticed him. Q. Away from this train? A. Yes. Q. And Mr. Sigmon was which way from him? A. He was west." It is true he stated on cross-examination that he was not looking at the engineer the instant the deceased fell, but this witness was not a partisan of the plaintiff. It is in evidence that the defendant furnished him a pass to attend the trial, and that he notified witnesses for the defendant to attend. Again, Mrs. C. H. Perry says: "Q. Do you know which way the engineer was looking when he fell? A. He was looking east before the accident, but I don't know which way he was looking when he was under the car." It seems to me this is some evidence that the engineer was not keeping a lookout.

2. But suppose he looked, did he fail to observe what a man exercising ordinary care would have discovered? There was one car and a tender between the deceased and the engineer, a distance of perhaps 60 feet. The deceased began crying out about the time he fell, and this continued until the train stopped. C. H. Perry says: "Q. At that time you say you saw him fall down on the track, did he say anything at first or did it knock the breath out of him? A. He hollered pretty soon after he fell. Q. Did he holler the same instant he fell, or a second or two afterwards? A. Yes, a second or two afterwards about the same time. Q. I ask you if it was not a second or two after he fell that he hollered, and if his hollering and the stopping of the train was not almost at the same time? A. No, sir; the train did not stop when he fell. Q. I mean did not the train stop almost as he hollered? A. As I recollect the train stopped while he was hollering. (This witness was 65 or 70 yards from the train.) Q. How far were you away? A. About 65 or 70 yards." Mrs. C. H. Perry testified that she heard the crying out and she was asked, "How far away were you? About 65 yards. Did you hear him holler? Yes." F. L. Potts, a witness for defendant, said he was 60 yards from the railroad and heard him. Dock Bryson said he was 125 feet from the railroad and heard him. If two witnesses, who were 65 yards, and another 125 feet, distant, heard him, is it unreasonable to say that there is evidence that the engineer, who was within 60 feet, could have heard if he had exercised ordinary care?

Next, was there evidence that he could have seen the dangerous position of the deceased? The deceased fell between the first and second car. One of his feet became entangled at the coupling, and he fell across the rail, out between the cars. He was a grown man, and the wheels ran across his thigh. This admits of the argument that from the thigh to the head was beyond the rail—approximately three feet. Mrs. C. H. Perry says: "Q. What was he doing, was he moving along? A. He had his hands outside ahold of the ends of the cross-ties." J. R. Warren says: "Q. What position was he in when he fell between the cars? A. He fell right down on his stomach, and his hands were catching on to the ends of the cross-ties as he was sliding down in front of the wheels. Q. Where was his feet? A. One was down next to the ties, and one was hanging somewhere, and he told me it was hung on the air hose; that his foot was hung on the air hose. Q. What is the air hose? A. It is to connect the air between the cars, it is the rubber hose. Q. When he fell, did he fall right across the track? A. Yes, his head was out about even with the end of the ties, about two feet, I guess; that is, to the end of the ties." A. L. Roberts, the engineer, testified: "Q. How far do those cars project over the rail? A. I don't know, something like 12 or 14 inches. Q. So, if a man's body projected out two feet over the rail, there would not be anything in the world to prevent you from seeing him? A. It don't look like that would be."

S. L. Cabe testified that he had worked on the railroad seven or eight years, and was acquainted with the situation at Balsam, and was asked the following questions: "Q.

I wish you would state to his honor and the jury how much of a curve there is there on this side track? A. The main line comes up straight until you get there to the switch. The Court: Q. That switch was where they were putting the cars in? A. Yes; and then the main line curves south around this way. The Court: Q. That is coming towards Asheville? A. Yes; and when the engine went up in here (indicating with motion), you could see down in there plain enough on this curve, and when you get down to the switch, there is a curve there; that is, the switch curves off from the main line like any other switch. By counsel: Q. How much does the switch curve? A. Very little. Q. State whether or not, at any point along there, he could have seen a man two feet over the track at the rear end of the car next to the engine? A. He could have seen him at any point. And the track comes on the south, on the engineer's side, and he could have seen better from his cab than he could from the side track." I submit that a fair consideration of this evidence leads to the conclusion that, if true, the engineer could have seen and heard.

3. If so, the remaining inquiry is, could he have seen and heard in time to stop the train and avoid killing the deceased, or, rather, is there evidence of this fact? This involves an investigation of the evidence as to the distance the train moved after the deceased fell, the speed of the train, and the distance within which it could be stopped.

(1) How far did the train move after the deceased fell? C. H. Perry testified: "Q. After he fell, how far did your train go? A. It seemed to me that it went but a little piece; could not say exactly how far. Q. Give your best judgment, as to how far it went? A. It went, it seemed to me, probably a car length. Q. That is your best judgment of it? A. Yes, at the time. Q. When he fell, what did you see him doing on the track? A. It looked like he was just scrambling along. I don't know whether his feet were fastened or whether he was just trying to keep out of the front of the car. Q. And it looked like he was trying to keep out of the way of the wheels? A. Yes. Q. Well, just state how he was? A. The best I could see it just looked like he was trying to keep out of the way of the wheel. Q. How far did the car go under those circumstances, you say it went a car length? A. I could not say, it might have been more than that. Q. That is your judgment that it went about a car length while he was in that situation? A. Yes, something like that." It is conceded that a car length is about 30 feet.

(2) What was the speed of the train? Dock Bryson and C. H. Perry say it was going about "as fast as a man could walk;" J. R. Warren, "three or four miles an hour;" D. C. Ensley, "three miles an hour." A. L.

Roberts says when he started in the siding, he was running from "four to six miles an hour," and he was then asked: "Q. You mean to tell the jury that when you started to back in there, it was going four to six miles an hour? A. Yes, but when he fell off it might not have been going two miles an hour."

(3) Within what distance could the train have been stopped? S. L. Cabe testified "within four feet." A. L. Roberts testified on cross-examination: "Q. You say if the train had been going from four to six miles an hour, you could have stopped in 8 or 10 feet, so that you could stop the train going at two miles an hour in what distance? A. In the slack of the car. Q. How much slack is there in a car? A. There was two feet slack in the cars that were coupled together. Q. How much slack was there in this car? A. Six or eight, maybe ten inches. Q. And you could stop that one car in six inches? A. In ten or twelve inches. Q. And the others might have rolled on a little further? A. (No answer.)" And on re-direct examination: "Q. You say you could stop a train going two miles an hour in ten inches, do you mean with or without slack? A. Without the slack of the cars. With the slack of the cars, it would have taken longer. Q. If that train was going back in there at two miles an hour with the slack in, in how far could you stop it? A. In about eight feet."

There is therefore evidence that the train ran 30 feet after the deceased fell; that he fell within 60 feet of the engine and in the direction the engineer was required to look; that he began crying out as he fell; that he was heard 65 yards distant; that his head was two feet beyond the rail, and he was grabbing at the end of the cross-ties; that the car between him and the engine projected over the rail 14 inches; that the train was running at from two to four miles an hour, and therefore making little noise; that the train could have been stopped in four feet at least, and one witness who was not present, but was familiar with the location and trains, swore the engineer could have seen the deceased. If the car ran 30 feet and he had seen or heard the deceased as he fell, and had stopped his car in 28 feet, when, according to the evidence it could have been stopped in 4, a life would have been saved. I agree with the principle laid down by the court that it is the duty of the superior court judge to decide whether there is evidence, and of this court upon appeal to review this decision, but we cannot go further. We cannot weigh the evidence and pass on its sufficiency, and if we undertake to do so, we usurp the powers of the jury. The duty imposed is well stated by Justice Hoke in Fitzgerald v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 534, 54 S. E. 893 (6 L. R. A. [N. S.] 837). He says: "It is very generally held that direct evidence of negligence is not required, but the same may be inferred from facts and attendant circumstances, and it is well established that if the facts proved establish the more reasonable probability that the defendant has been guilty of actionable negligence, the case cannot be withdrawn from the jury, though the possibility of accident may arise on the evidence. Thus, in Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 58, it is said: "The plaintiff is not bound to prove more than enough to raise a fair presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant and of resulting injury to himself. Having done this he is entitled to recover unless the defendant produces evidence to rebut the presumption. It has sometimes been held not sufficient for the plaintiff to establish a probability of the defendant's default, but this is going too far. If the facts proved render it probable that the defendant violated its duty, it is for the jury to decide whether it did so or not. To hold otherwise would be to deny the value of circumstantial evidence."

I was interested in the eloquent plea of counsel for the plaintiff in behalf of trial by jury, in the course of which he said it was reported that King Alfred, in the olden days, had caused 44 of the judges to be executed, because of their denial of this right to the subject. I would suggest to him that the incident is violative of the principle he advocates as there is no suggestion that the king gave the judges a trial by jury.

I repeat that I do not know how the fact is, nor do I know what I would do as a juror, but in my opinion there is evidence fit to be submitted to a jury.

CLARK, C. J. (concurring in dissenting opinion of ALLEN, J.). When the train was moving rear foremost into the siding—that is, backing into it—it was the duty of the engineer to look out of the cab window in the direction in which the train was moving. If he did not do so, and thereby failed to hear the outcries or see the struggles of the deceased brakeman in trying to save himself, it was clearly negligence. The engineer was in charge of the train, and it was his duty to keep supervision over it. It is true that the engineer testifies, in his own behalf, that he did keep a lookout by leaning out of the window and looking in the direction in which the train was moving. But he may have been mistaken as to this. The nonsuit takes for granted that his statement was true, but if the statement had been submitted to the jury there was evidence from which they might have found the contrary. The fact that people standing some distance off heard the agonized scream of the victim while the engineer little more than a car length away says that he did not would indicate that he was not leaning out the cab window. Besides how far the head and hands of a man in the position of the deceased should have been seen by one leaning out of the cab window, which would put the engineer considerably beyond the edge of the ties, was a matter for the jury. These and other potent circumstances mentioned in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice ALLEN, which need not be repeated here, would seem to make it clear that this case should have been submitted to the jury.

The old landmark was that if there is "any evidence beyond a scintilla" a party was entitled to have the case submitted to jury, as guaranteed by the Constitution. The departure was made in Wittkowsky v. Watson, 71 N. C. 451, in which Judge Bynum filed his admirable dissenting opinion which is a classic. From that day to this the power of the judges to take cases from the jury has been steadily extended till now it can almost be said that trial judges are tempted to think that it is not incumbent upon them to give the plaintiff, especially in negligence cases, the right to a trial by jury unless the judge is of an opinion that the evidence will "reasonably" justify a verdict for the plaintiff. That is, the judge puts himself in the place of the jury. The distinguished counsel of the plaintiff in this case recalled to our attention that Alfred the Great is said by some writers to have hung 44 judges for denying this right to trial by jury. The incident is doubtless mythical, for trial by jury was not known till many centuries later, if we take the best authorities. But if the tendency to cut short trials by depriving parties of the right to have controversies settled by jury is not very much restricted it will inevitably result in legislation that will deprive judges of that power, and probably go much further than it should. We have instances before us of such result.

At common law, the judges were not forbidden to express an opinion upon the facts. In fact, this right was very useful in practice as an aid to the jury, and the judges still possess such power in the federal courts and in many of our sister states as well as in England. But by reason of some abuse, as it was thought, in this state the judges were absolutely deprived of that power by the act of 1796, now Revisal, § 535, with the result that the slightest expression of an opinion on the facts by a judge in the course of a trial, however impartial or helpful it might be to the jury, is now ground for a new trial. Again, it was the right of the judges to prescribe the number and length of the speeches of counsel as it still is in the federal courts, and in most of the state courts and in England. But by reason of what was thought to be an abuse of this power by the judges it was absolutely taken away by statute with a great increase of the length of trials and expense to the public. Revisal, § 216, has somewhat restored the former power of the judges in this respect but not to the full extent.

By reason of the holding of this court in Owens v. R. R., 88 N. C. 502, that the burden was upon the plaintiff to negative contributory negligence, Ruffin, J., dissenting, the General Assembly promptly passed the act of 1887, now Revisal, § 483, which requires that the defense of contributory negligence "shall be set up in the answer and proved on the trial." In Neal v. R. R., 128 N. C. 634, 36 S. E. 117, 49 L. R. A. 684, this court by a bare majority decided that the judge could hold as a matter of law, upon the demurrer to the evidence of the plaintiff, that contributory negligence was proven. Without repeating what was said in the dissenting opinions in that, and subsequent, cases, it is sufficient to say that the doctrine of Neal v. R. R., has been extended until in the opinion of many good lawyers the beneficial intent of the Legislature in enacting Revisal, § 483, has been largely denied to the plaintiff in many cases.

The extent to which the courts are assuming on motions for nonsuit to judge of the "sufficiency of the evidence," and as to the defense of contributory negligence, the tendency to hold as a matter of law that the plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence notwithstanding the statute put that burden upon the defendant, and clearly meant that whether it was "proven" or not was a fact to be determined by the jury, are to be deplored.

Without questioning in the slightest degree the right of the majority of the court to express their own views, I deem it my duty as well as my right to dissent earnestly against this claim of power on the part of the court. Men conscious of their own rectitude are especially prone to believe their own judgment correct, and judges are no exception. But under our Constitution parties to litigation have a right to have jurors and not judges pass upon the evidence, however slight, when beyond a mere scintilla. They can challenge jurors who are to pass upon the facts, but cannot except to a judge who feels competent to pass upon the facts in holding that the evidence is "not sufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff."

In the late decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Standard Oil Case, that court assumed to write into an act of Congress the word "reasonable" as Mr. Justice Harlan so clearly pointed out in his dissenting opinion. The majority of that court were doubtless sincere, but they attributed to their own intelligence powers which under the Constitution were vested in Congress. They doubtless believed that the court had "the last say." But the Constitution, from which they derive their powers (article 111, § 2, cl. 2), gives that court jurisdiction, "with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make." The courts have not even "the last say" in respect to the Executive, for when Chief Justice Marshall rendered a decision which the President deemed unsound he declined to obey it, and the decision has never been executed to this day.

Not concurring in the views of the majority of the court, it is not improper to call attention to some of the instances in which, in this state, the Legislature has dissented from this tendency in the courts to substitute their own judgment as to the extent of their powers by terming it a matter of law. In some instances the Legislature has probably gone too far in the opposite direction as was perhaps a natural consequence.

HERRING et al. v. WARWICK et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 372*)—SALE BY MORTGAGEE UNDER POWER—REVESTING TITLE—ESSENTIALS.

Title purchased under a registered deed from a mortgagee did not revert in him because he accepted repayment of the price on the mortgagor refusing to give possession, especially since the purchaser afterwards attempted to secure possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 372.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 372*)—SALE BY MORTGAGEE UNDER POWER—VESTING TITLE—ESSENTIALS.

To vest title in the grantee under a registered deed from a mortgagee it was not essential that the grantee be given possession.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 169*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS NOT CONSIDERED BELOW.

The Supreme Court cannot consider a question not considered by the trial court, and not affecting the verdict appealed from.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by S. A. Herring and others against M. A. Warwick and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed for new trial.

This action was brought originally to recover the possession of land, with rents and profits and damages for waste, with a prayer for the redemption of the land from a mortgage. The case was finally tried only upon the issue as to waste. On December 27, 1894, S. A. Herring and his wife, Nellie A. Herring, executed a mortgage with power of sale upon the lands of the wife to John T. Gregory, to secure the payment of a note for $125 with interest. The debt was not paid and the mortgagee regularly sold the land under the power, and M. A. Warwick, one of the defendants, became the purchaser, paid the price, and Gregory conveyed the land to him by deed which was duly registered. Nellie A. Herring having died, M. A. Warwick, the purchaser at the sale, brought an action against S. A. Herring, her husband and tenant by the curtesy, for the possession of the land. S. A. Herring answered the complaint in that action, and averred that Warwick had bought the land at the sale, under the power contained in the mortgage, for John T. Gregory, the mortgagee, and that by reason thereof, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee between S. A. Herring, the defendant in that suit, and John T. Gregory still subsisted. The heirs of Mrs. Gregory were not parties to the suit. The court submitted issues to the jury, which, with the answers thereto, are as follows: (1) Did the plaintiff bid off the land described in the complaint for J. T. Gregory, the mortgagee? Ans. No. (2) Did the purchase, under which the plaintiff claims, terminate the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee subsisting between the defendant, S. A. Herring, and the mortgagee, J. T. Gregory? Ans. No. (3) What are the plaintiff's damages? (No answer.) The court thereupon adjudged that the land be sold by a commissioner to pay the mortgage debt, which was done, and John T. Gregory became the purchaser, and the commissioner conveyed the land to him, upon payment of the purchase money, under the order of the court. He afterwards conveyed the land to M. A. Warwick, the defendant in the action. The testimony relative to the transaction between John T. Gregory, mortgagee, and M. A. Warwick, with respect to the sale under the mortgage, was that of M. A. Warwick, who testified: "I bought the land at the sale. Nobody bid but me. Auctioneer cried it off. I never agreed to buy the land for Gregory. I paid Gregory for the land and bought it for myself. When I got the deed, I came and had it recorded. I tried to dispossess Herring. After Gregory got possession under the commissioner's deed, I bought it again. I don't know how Gregory got in possession. I have been in possession for 10 or 12 years. First time I took a deed from Gregory, Herring would not give up the possession, and I went to Gregory and told him I would have nothing more to do with the land until he got possession. He paid me back the purchase money; at least, he gave me his note for the amount paid by me, and when I bought the land from him the second time, he gave me credit for the note. I knew the title was in Nellie Herring's name and her bodily heirs. I knew the land had come to her from her father. Nellie Herring was my aunt. She had been dead two years when I first bought the land from Gregory. I brought suit against Herring because he would not give up possession. Mr. Gregory was a witness in the suit. I testified on the trial myself. Mr. Gregory paid me back the money that I paid him for the land. He bought the land himself (under the judgment of the court). I then got a deed from him and went into possession. It was in the spring of 1899. I don't know when, I took possession some time after Herring moved." The issues submitted in this case, with the answers thereto, are as follows: "(1) Is the defendant Warwick the owner of the land described in the complaint, for and during the life of S. A. Herring? Ans. Yes. (2) Are the plaintiffs, other than Lonnie Herring, the owners in remainder of said lands, subject to the life estate of said S. A. Herring? Ans. Yes. (3) If so, did defendant Warwick commit waste upon said lands? Ans. Yes. (4) If so, what are plaintiffs' (other than Lonnie Herring) damages? Ans. $300.00. (5) What is the amount now due on original mortgage debt? Ans. $126.50 with 8 per cent. interest from February 15, 1898."

The court charged the jury as follows: "The act and conduct of the defendant Warwick in accepting a repayment of the money paid by him to Gregory at the first sale, and the surrender of the lands conveyed to him by deed of Gregory and wife back to Gregory, was, in effect, a renunciation on his part of all right to the lands; and therefore the deed from Gregory and wife to Warwick (the second deed) had no more effect than to convey to him, Warwick, the life estate of S. A. Herring; and if you believe the defendant Warwick's own testimony, you will answer the first issue 'Yes.'" To this instruction, the defendant, M. A. Warwick, excepted and appealed from the judgment which was entered upon the verdict.

Faison & Wright and J. D. Kerr, for appellants. H. A. Grady and F. R. Cooper, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We think there was error in the instruction of the court. In the first place, there was no sufficient evidence for the jury that Warwick surrendered possession of the land to Gregory. On the contrary, he demanded the possession of S. A. Herring, and upon his refusal to give it up, he brought suit against him to recover it, thereby continually asserting his right to the possession acquired by his purchase from J. T. Gregory, the mortgagee, and the deed the latter made to him, which was duly and promptly registered. Even had Warwick torn up or otherwise destroyed his deed, it would not have had the legal effect of revesting the title in Gregory. In Linker v. Long, 64 N. C. 296, it appeared that a deed for land had been executed by W. F. Taylor to Isaac Linker November 6, 1852, and on May 11, 1853, it was redelivered by Linker to Taylor, with the following indorsement upon it: "I transfer the within deed to W. F. Taylor again." Taylor kept the possession of the land during his life and his heirs retained possession to the time of bringing the suit. The lower court refused permission to read the deed in evidence. This court held that ruling to be erroneous, and with reference thereto, said: "This ruling is based upon the idea that, as it appears from the indorsement upon the deed that it had been redelivered by the bargainee to the bargainor, the legal effect of this writing on the back was to nullify the deed, and make it as if it had never been executed. By force of the deed, and the operation of the statute 27 Hen. VIII, an estate of freehold of inheritance was vested in Linker on the 6th day of November, 1852. The question is, Has that estate been divested by any conveyance, or means, known to the law? Suppose that deed, upon the 11th day of May, 1853, had been canceled, torn up, or burnt, by consent of both parties, the estate would not have been thereby revested in Taylor, for, by the common law, a freehold estate in land can only pass by livery of seisin—under the statute of enrollments, by 'deed of bargain and sale indented and enrolled'—and under the act of 1715, by 'deed duly registered'; so, the freehold, having passed to Linker, could only be passed from him, either to a third person or to Taylor, by some kind of conveyance known to the law. A will, being ambulatory, may be revoked by cancellation; a covenant or agreement, being in fieri, a thing to be done—by cancellation or by deed of defeasance, which may be executed after the covenant. But a conveyance of a freehold estate of inheritance, being a thing done, cannot be undone by cancellation, or in any other mode, and the estate can only be revested by another conveyance; unless a condition or deed of defeasance executed at the same time and as a part of the conveyance, be annexed to the estate, giving to it a qualification by which it may be defeated. For illustration, a mortgage is a conveyance on condition. If the money be paid at the time fixed the estate is revested in the mortgagor, but if the condition be not performed by payment at the day, the estate becomes absolute, and although the money be paid and accepted afterwards, the estate can only be revested by another conveyance." The Chief Justice is referring, in the last clause, to a strict foreclosure, and not to the right or equity of redemption. He is illustrating the point by giving an example of a deed upon condition and applying the strict rule of the common law to the relation of the parties without regard to the equitable right of the mortgagor, and the illustration is an apt one. This decision has been approved in several cases, and among others we may cite: Wharton v. Moore, 84 N. C. 479, 37 Am. Rep. 627; Hare v. Jernigan, 76 N. C. 471; Browne v. Davis (opinion by Justice Shepherd) 109 N. C. 23, 13 S. E. 703; Tunstall v. Cobb (opinion by present Chief Justice) 109 N. C. 316, 14 S. E. 28; Hodges v. Wilkinson, 111 N. C. 56, 15 S. E. 941, 17 L. R. A. 545. The law, as declared in Linker v. Long, has been recognized and acted upon to the present time. If the facts, as they appeared in that case, did not have the effect of revesting the title in the grantor, who remained in the possession of the land after the indorsement was made on the deed and the latter was redelivered to him, how can it be said, as a matter of law, that the acts and conduct of Warwick divested the title which he had acquired by his purchase and the deed from the mortgagee, which was registered? J. T. Gregory paid the purchase money back to him for the reason that Herring had possession of the land and refused to surrender it. This was not an abandonment of his title or of the right he had acquired under the sale and deed. On the contrary, he almost immediately asserted his right to the possession and by suit attempted to enforce his claim as against one of the mortgagors.

[2] It was not necessary to the vesting of the title in Warwick that Gregory should have given him the possession of the land. The title vested by the deed and its registration, the latter taking the place of livery of seisin. The verdict upon the first and second issues resulted from an erroneous instruction of the judge to the jury.

[3] The question as to the legal effect of the proceedings and judgment in the case of Warwick v. Herring, upon the rights of the parties to this litigation, was not considered by the court, and therefore did not enter into the verdict or in any way affect it. We cannot, therefore, consider that question. The parties have had no opportunity to be heard in regard to it, and, apart from the fact that it was offered as evidence, it has played no part in the decision of the case. The defendant has had no chance to except to any ruling upon it, and it would not be right or in accordance with correct procedure, to pass upon it at this time. We will do so if it ever comes before us directly for our decision, but it is not now presented in any tangible form. It involves the application of an important principle of law, and is not at all free from difficulty. The plaintiff offered in evidence the proceedings, verdict and judgment in that case, and relied upon them to show that Warwick was seised only of a life estate, and was, therefore, liable to plaintiff, as reverser, for waste committed upon the premises, as it is alleged that his act produced lasting damage to the inheritance. The judgment professes to sell the entire estate in the land and not only the life interest, or to be more accurate, its operation is not, in terms, restricted to the life estate, though there is one expression in the decree of confirmation which indicates that such may have been the intention of the court. Did it operate upon the estate in reversion, and, if so, are plaintiffs bound by it, not having been made parties to the suit? Does it bind them by reason of the fact that they introduced it and rely upon it? Are they still required, notwithstanding the judgment and independently of it, to prove that the sale of the land by Gregory, under the power contained in the mortgage from the Herrings to him, is not valid as to them, or, in law, does the judgment establish this fact although they were not parties to it? These are questions, and perhaps there are others, which may attract the attention of counsel in the further progress and development of the case, and upon which they will enlighten us if the matter again comes before us. All we can now say is that the verdict, in an essential particular, was rendered under the influence solely of an erroneous instruction, and it should, therefore, be set aside.

New trial.

FAIN & STAMPS v. MANOS.

1. GUARANTY (§ 30*)—PARTIES.

Where, as a part of the consideration of a contract of sale of a stock of merchandise, a third person assumed as guarantor the indebtedness of the seller, a creditor of the seller though not a party to the contract of guaranty made for his benefit could sue thereon, the guaranty being supported by a sufficient consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

2. GUARANTY (§ 90*)—CONTRACTS—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff sold a stock of goods which the purchaser sold to a third person. The buyer from the purchaser testified that on his purchase defendant guaranteed that nothing was owing on the stock, and that the creditors of his seller would not come against the stock. Held, that such evidence was relevant on the question of guaranty in an action thereon by the plaintiff, the original owner.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Fain & Stamps against J. K. Manos and another. From a judgment of the circuit court dismissing the appeal of defendant named from a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Geiger & Wolfe, for appellant. Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This action was commenced in a magistrate's court, on an open account, against G. A. Manos as principal and J. K. Manos as guarantor, running from the 26th of June to the 17th of August, 1909. The magistrate rendered judgment against G. A. Manos by default, and against J. K. Manos after a trial. J. K. Manos appealed to the circuit court, but his appeal was dismissed, whereupon he appealed to this court. The first question that will be considered is whether there was any testimony tending to show that the alleged guaranty on the part of J. K. Manos was based upon a valuable consideration.

W. O. Stamps, one of the plaintiffs, testi-fed as follows: "During the latter part of August, 1900, W. A. Holder, formerly of Toccoa, Georgia, exhibited to me a bill of sale, signed by G. A. and J. K. Manos, which bill of sale is not now in our possession; we do not know where it is. Along about the 1st of September, 1900, or a little later, we received a letter from J. K. Manos, offering to pay the bill, if we would send the statement to him. The letter attached and marked 'Exhibit A,' is the original letter. That relying upon the statements contained in this letter, Exhibit A, the said partnership and neither of the partners made any efforts to hold the stock of goods, liable for the debt of G. A. Manos, nor did said firm avail itself of all legal remedies against said G. A. Manos on account thereof."

Exhibit A is as follows: "Anderson, S. C. Aug. 31, 1900. Fain and Stamps, Atlanta, Ga., Gentlemen: Please send statement what G. A. Manos, Toccoa, Ga., owe you and will pay you myself when bills come due. Yours very truly, J. K. Manos."

W. A. Holder, a witness for the plaintiffs, said: "I was in business in Toccoa, Ga., latter part of August, 1900. I succeeded G. A. Manos. I bought out G. A. Manos. (Objected to on ground of irrelevancy. Objection overruled.) I asked J. K. Manos, where I could buy a fruit stand. He referred me to Mr. Sullivan at Seneca and G. A. Manos at Toccoa. I negotiated the sale with G. A. Manos. At the time I took charge G. A. and J. K. Manos executed something in the nature of a bill of sale, or a guaranty, that G. A. Manos owed nothing on the stock which I was taking, although I have made diligent search for the bill of sale, and have not been able to find it. Among other things that the guaranty contained was that both would stand between me and the creditors of G. A. Manos, and should see to it that I was not sued for any of the obligations of G. A. Manos. And that the creditors of G. A. Manos, if any, should not come against the stock of goods. I exhibited the guaranty to Fain & Stamps' representative, a week or ten days after I took possession of the stock of goods, about the 21st or 22d of August, 1900. (The above testimony objected to on the ground of irrelevancy. Objection overruled.) * * * Recross: This was a week or ten days after the transaction. [Signed] W. A. Holder."

Thomas Allen, another witness, thus testified in behalf of the plaintiffs: Thomas Allen, sworn, said: "On October 17th, 1910, I had a telephone conversation with J. K. Manos, relative to the payment of this account, in the course of which I said something to him about the instrument which was executed, at the time that W. A. Holder took charge, and he made this statement to me: 'We just sold the place to Holder and signed the thing to him, so that he would not be bothered.' (Objected to on the ground of irrelevancy. Objection overruled.)"

[1] The foregoing testimony tends to show that, as a part of the consideration of the agreement, when the goods were sold to W. A. Holder, J. K. Manos assumed the indebtedness of G. A. Manos then existing, as a guarantor. Exhibit A tends to show that J. K. Manos so construed the agreement. It is true the plaintiffs were not parties to said agreement, but, if it was made for the benefit of G. A. Manos' creditors, and constituted a part of the consideration of the sale, to W. A. Holder, the plaintiffs have the right to recover against the appellant the amount then due them by G. A. Manos.

[2] The next question raised by the exceptions is whether there was error on the part of his honor the circuit judge, in overruling the appellant's objection to the testimony of W. A. Holder and Thomas Allen, on the ground that it was irrelevant. The said testimony tended to show that J. K. Manos was a party to the agreement when the goods were sold to W. A. Holder, and that he assumed the debts of G. A. Manos as a guarantor. The objection to said testimony was therefore properly overruled.

Affirmed.

STATE v. MURRAY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 6, 1911.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 128*)—DISPENSARY COMMISSION—ORDERS—CONTEMPT.

Under Act Feb. 24, 1908, § 8 (25 St. at Large, p. 1292), empowering the State Dispensary Commission to investigate the past conduct of the officers of the dispensary, and conferring on the commission the authority of the committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the dispensary, as prescribed by Act Jan. 24, 1906, § 3 (25 St. at Large, p. 335), empowering the committee to require the production of papers relevant to any investigation, and providing that any person refusing to act on notice of the committee to produce the books shall be guilty of contempt, the commission may compel the production of papers relevant to any investigation, and punish for contempt in case of disobedience; but the order to produce must be by subpoena duces tecum, without depriving the custodian of the papers of his possession and control, except for examination in the particular investigation, and an order directing the chairman of the former State Dispensary Commission to turn over to the commission vouchers for disbursement of money taken by the former State Dispensary Commission is unauthorized, and an order adjudging the chairman in contempt for disobeying the order is void, as in excess of jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

Application for writ of habeas corpus by W. J. Murray for his discharge from imprisonment under a judgment of the State Disdispensary Commission adjudging him guilty of contempt. Petitioner discharged.

W. G. Belser and W. F. Stevenson, for applicant. Attorney General Lyon, for the State. Holman & Holman, amici curiæ.

PER CURIAM. The State Dispensary Commission adjudged W. J. Murray guilty of contempt in refusing to deliver to it certain vouchers for disbursement of money taken by the former State Dispensary Commission, of which he was chairman, and in default of purging himself of such contempt he was committed to jail. He now brings this proceeding in habeas corpus, claiming that his imprisonment is illegal and that the judgment of the commission is in excess of its powers and void.

Section 8 of the act of February 24, 1906 (25 St. at Large, p. 1292), provides that "the commission shall have full power and authority to investigate the past conduct of the officers of the dispensary and all the power and authority conferred upon the committee appointed to investigate the affairs as prescribed by the act to provide for the investigation of the dispensary, approved January 24, 1906, be and hereby is conferred upon the commission provided for under this act," etc. Section 3 of the act of January 24, 1906 (25 St. at Large, p. 335), provides: "The said committee be and the same is hereby authorized to send for and to require the production of any and all books, papers, or other documents or writings which may be deemed relevant to any investigation and to require said person or persons in custody or possession of such papers to produce the same before the said committee. Any person or persons who shall refuse to act on the order or notice of said committee to produce said books, papers, or other documents or writings, shall be deemed guilty of contempt of said committee, and be punished as provided in section 2." Under this statute it is clear that the commission has power to compel the production before it of papers relevant to any investigation it is authorized to make, and to punish for contempt in case of disobedience of the order to produce. The commission's order to produce must be in the nature of a subpoena duces tecum, and cannot operate so as to deprive the owner or custodian of his possession and control, except for the temporary examination and use in a particular investigation by the commission, wherein the owner's or custodian's possession and control are properly guarded.

The order of the commission in this case was not to produce for examination and use in a particular investigation, but to deliver and turn over to the commission the vouchers in question, thereby permanently depriving the petitioner of his custody and control. This was in excess of the power of the commission. If the commission was seeking possession of the vouchers, claiming the right to them as the successors in office of the former commission, the remedy was not a proceeding in contempt. The vouchers in question relate to the disbursement of dispensary funds by the old Dispensary Commission, the members of which are under bond and claim the right to control these vouchers for the protection of themselves and their bondsmen until their accounts are settled after investigation by proper authority. In the opinion of the court these vouchers are so far private property that the members of the old commission cannot be deprived of their possession and control in the manner attempted.

The judgment in contempt, being in excess of jurisdiction, is void, and the petitioner is entitled to be discharged from custody; and it is so ordered.

STATE v. SUBER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 30, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 918*)—NEW TRIAL—OBJECTION WAIVED.

Any right of objection, because of the judge not accompanying the jury when it viewed the place of the crime, was waived, if defendant's counsel, being aware thereof before rendition of the verdict, did not complain to the court till he moved for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2163-2196; Dec. Dig. § 918.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 651*)—TRIAL—VIEW BY JURY—DISCRETION.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 2950, providing that the jury in any case may, at the request of either party, be taken to view the place in question or pertaining to the controversy, when it appears to the court that such view is necessary to a just decision, the presiding judge has discretionary power to order the jury to view the place of the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1516-1519; Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 651*)—TRIAL—VIEW BY JURY—"TAKING OF TESTIMONY."

In a constitutional sense, the viewing by the jury of the place of the crime is not the "taking of testimony."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1516-1519; Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 662*)—TRIAL—VIEW BY JURY—RIGHT TO BE CONFRONTED WITH AND TO CROSS-EXAMINE WITNESSES.

Defendant is not, by the viewing by the jury of the place of the crime, deprived of the right to be confronted with or to cross-examine any witness in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1538-1548; Dec. Dig. § 662.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 634*)—TRIAL—VIEW BY JURY—ABSENCE OF JUDGE.

It cannot reasonably be supposed that defendant's rights would in any respect be prejudiced by the absence of the judge when the jury merely viewed the place of the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1461-1464; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Richland County; W. T. Aycock, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Nannie Lee Suber was convicted of murder, and she appeals. Dismissed.

Frank G. Tompkins, for appellant. W. Hampton Cobb, Sol., for the State.

GARY, A. J. The defendant was indicted for murder, and found guilty, with a recommendation to mercy. From the sentence imposed upon her, she appealed to this court.

[1] The exceptions raise the question, whether there was error, on the part of his honor the presiding judge, in refusing the motion for a new trial, made on the ground that the presiding judge did not accompany the jury when it was sent by him to view the place where the homicide was committed. There is, however, a preliminary question, to wit, whether the appellant waived the right to raise this question by failing to interpose such objection before the verdict was rendered. It is true the record states that the defendant's counsel was not notified that the presiding judge would not accompany the jury when the premises were viewed, but it does not appear that the appellant's attorney was not aware of such fact until the rendition of the verdict. If the appellant's attorney had knowledge of this fact before the verdict was rendered, then the case comes within the principle announced in State v. Ballew, 83 S. C. 82, 63 S. E. 688, 64 S. E. 1019. In that case the jury, while inspecting the locality, made certain experiments in the presence of the defendant's attorney, who failed to inform the court of such fact, until he made a motion for a new trial. In refusing the motion for a new trial the court said: "The defendants, with full knowledge of the misconduct of the jury, having chosen not to complain to the court, but rather to take the risk of a verdict in their favor, could not afterwards, because the verdict was against them, have a new trial on this ground. The general principle that a party cannot take his chances of a successful issue, reserving vices in the trial, of which he has notice, for use in case of disappointment, is universally recognized and obviously just."

[2] But waiving this objection, the exceptions cannot be sustained. Section 2950 of the Code of Laws of 1902, provides that "the jury in any case may, at the request of either party, be taken to view the place or premises in question, or any property, matter, or thing pertaining to the controversy between the parties, when it appears to the court, that such view is necessary to a just decision," etc. Section 18, art. 1, of the Constitution, is as follows: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury, and to be fully informed, of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to be fully heard in his defense, by himself or by his counsel or by both." The presiding judge had the discretionary power, not only under the statute, but at common law, to order the jury to view the premises. "The court in its discretion may authorize the jury, properly attended, to go and examine—that is, view—the place of the offense, as a help to understanding the evidence. It was formerly supposed that, in a criminal case, this could be only by mutual consent. But the modern practice leaves it wholly within the discretion of the court. It may be at any appropriate stage of the trial; in one case, the jury asked it after the judge had summed up the evidence, and it was granted. It is the defendant's right to be present if evidence is given, perhaps at all events; but he may waive this right, either expressly or by the implication of declining, or even not asking to go. The court, in granting or refusing the view, will be governed mainly by the special circumstances; and, in granting it, will take the proper steps for the care of the jury." 1 Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, 965. State v. Ballew, 83 S. C. 82, 63 S. E. 688, 64 S. E. 1019 (reported in 18 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 569); Rodgers v. Hodge, 83 S. C. 569, 65 S. E. 819 (reported in 18 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 729). "The cases are divided upon the question, whether the purpose of the view is to furnish new evidence, or to enable the jurors to comprehend more clearly, by the aid of visible objects, the evidence already received. The latter proposition is well sustained, and seems more consistent with the conservative theories, on which the rules of procedure and jury trials are based; but the contrary theory, holding that the purpose of a view is to supply evidence, is supported by good authorities." 12 Cyc. 537; 11 Enc. of Law, 540. "Concerning a view of the premises made by the jury, in the absence of the judge and the defendant, there is great diversity of opinion found in the decided cases, based upon different grounds. It is held by high authority that the judge and officers of the court, as well as the defendant, must be present; that a view is taking testimony in the case, and, when made in the absence of the defendant, is in violation of his constitutional right of being confronted by the witnesses against him; and that such right cannot be waived. Other authorities, of equal high standing, and with greater force of reasoning, hold that the right of the defendant to be present, with or without the presence of the judge and court officers, if such right exists, is statutory, and not constitutional, and may be waived; that the defendant in a criminal case, who asks the benefit of the provisions of a statute, must take the benefit, just as the statute gives it; that the view is not taking evidence in the case, and is not intended to be so, but simply to enable the jury the better to understand the testimony given in court; that whatever the nature of the rights of the defendant may be, in such case, and from whatever source such rights may be derived, he may and does waive the same, when the action of the court is taken, and the view made on his request, and without suggestion that he desires to be present at the view; and that in such case, it is too late to complain after verdict." State v. Hartley, 22 Nev. 342, 40 Pac. 372, 28 L. R. A. 33. This language is quoted with approval in Ellas v. Territory, 9 Ariz. 1, 76 Pac. 605, 11 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1153. The principle is thus stated by Mr. Justice Brewer, in construing a similar statutory provision, in the case of State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 311: "This means that the place of trial is unchanged, and that the jury, and the jury only, are temporarily removed therefrom. Just as when the case is finally submitted to the jury, and they 'retire for deliberation,' there is simply a temporary removal of the jury. The place of trial is unchanged. And whether the jury retire to the next room, or are taken to a building many blocks away, the effect is the same. In contemplation of law, the place of trial is not changed. The judge, the clerk, the officers, the records, the parties, and all that go to make up the organization of the court, remain in the courtroom. The jury retire to discharge one duty, connected with the trial, and yet, though absent while discharging that duty, inasmuch as it is done under the direction of the court, and while in charge of an officer appointed by the court, they are in legal contemplation in the presence of the court. Though the defendant may not go with them into their place of retirement, he is nevertheless personally present during that portion as well as the rest of the trial."

In construing a statute of Utah, providing that the presiding judge should have the power to order the jury to view locality, the court used this language, in the case of State v. Mortensen, 26 Utah, 312, 73 Pac. 562: "Nor does this provision of the statute conflict with section 4811, Rev. St., which provides that the accused must be personally present at the trial. This does not mean that the defendant must all the time be in the actual presence of the jury but rather that he must be at the trial in court and in its presence. The court is the real thing fixed and permanent. The jury is but a temporary adjunct for a partial purpose of the trial. For the defendant, then, to be personally present at the trial, he must be in the presence of the court, and thus the two sections are not repugnant to each other. Nor is such a view as is authorized by the statute, and, as the one had in this case, where the prisoner had an opportunity to be present, inhibited by the Constitution. The provisions in that instrument, which guarantee the accused, in a criminal action, the right to 'appear and defend in person and by counsel,' and 'to be confronted by the witnesses against him,' were designed to protect every person accused of crime, against judgment of condemnation without a hearing in open court, or by secret trial. The latter provision has reference to the persons or individuals, who may testify against the accused, and not to inanimate objects, although they be objects, which, when viewed in the light of the testimony of living witnesses, may give rise to inferences, and make human understanding more clear and perfect. The statute which authorizes the view was doubtless designed to aid such understanding through the power of perception and of comparison—that is, by giving the jury an opportunity to compare the objects, which the testimony had pictured in their minds, with the real things, as they might perceive them upon the premises—and thus to enable the jurors to draw just and proper inferences from the testimony of the witnesses."

Mr Greenleaf in his admirable work on the Law of Evidence in volume 1, p. 1620, subd. 4, observed: "Does the hearsay rule—i. e., as involving the right of cross-examination, and incidentally of confrontation, of witnesses—require that in criminal cases (where the Constitution secures the right, and therefore overrides any statutes regulating views), the defendant should be present at a view? The requirement of confrontation implies merely, that the party shall have the opportunity of cross-examining witnesses, and a view by the jury is not the consultation of witnesses, but merely the inspection of the thing itself, which is the subject of the controversy; so that the constitutional principle cannot properly apply to render improper a view at which the accused is not present. This is the result reached by the better judicial opinion; but there are courts which take the contrary view."

[3-5] The principles we deduce from the authorities are (1) that in a constitutional sense, the viewing of the premises by the jury is not the taking of testimony; (2) that the prisoner is not thereby deprived of the right to confront or cross-examine any witness in the case; and (3) that it cannot reasonably be supposed that the prisoner's rights would in any respect be prejudiced by the absence of the judge, if the jury merely inspected the locality. Of course, if the orders of the presiding judge are disobeyed to the prejudice of the defendant, the court would take such steps as would be deemed necessary to protect his rights.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by B. S. Josey & Co. against Davis Burris. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Spears & Dennis, for appellant. W. F. Dargan, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action in claim and delivery of certain personal property. The plaintiffs, upon compliance with the requirements of the Code, required the sheriff to deliver the property to them. Thereafter, under proper proceedings, the property was returned to the defendant. On the trial of the case, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the possession of the property, or $300, the value thereof. The defendant appealed.

The only question which the defendant argued is whether the court had jurisdiction to try the case in Darlington county. The action was commenced in 1901, and at that time all the above-named parties resided in Darlington county, and the property in dispute was situated in that county. In February, 1902, the Legislature created Lee county. Act Feb. 25, 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 1194). On the 20th of March, 1902, the attorneys representing the respective parties entered into an agreement that they would not have the case transferred to Lee county and that it should be tried in Darlington county. On the 4th of September, 1908, they also made an agreement to redocket the case in Darlington county and that it should be tried in that county. The provisions of the act creating the county of Lee are similar to those which were construed in the case of State v. Bethea, 70 S. E. 11, and the principles therein stated show that the jurisdiction related to the person and was waived.

The other questions presented by the exceptions were not argued by the appellant's attorneys; but, waiving this objection, they are without merit. It may be well at this time to state that the verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, for the possession of the property, does not determine their absolute right thereto, as they hold its possession merely as mortgagees, subject to the right of the defendant to invoke the provisions of section 3006 of the Code of Laws, which is as follows: "The mortgagor of any chattel, shall have the right to redeem the property mortgaged by him, at any time before sale by the mortgagee, by paying the mortgage debt and any costs incurred in attempting to enforce its payment, and a tender made by the mortgagor of an amount, sufficient to pay said debt and costs, if not accepted, shall render the mortgage null and void."

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CARRIERS (§§ 280, 316)—PRESUMPTIONS—NEGLIGENCE—INJURY TO PASSENGER.

Upon proof of injury to a passenger of a railroad company by the running of its locomotives, cars, or other machinery, or by any person in its employment and service, the law raises a presumption that the injury was caused by the negligence of the company.

(a) Where an injury to a passenger is proved to have been thus caused, this presumption will not be rebutted by the company showing that it exercised only ordinary care and diligence, as railroad companies are bound to use extraordinary care and diligence for the safety of passengers. East Tennessee, Va. & Ga. Ry. Co. v. Miller, 95 Ga. 738, 22 S. E. 660.

cient to authorize the jury to find that the plaintiff was thus injured. Held:

(a) It was not error to charge Civil Code 1910, § 2780, providing: "A railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to persons, stock or other property by the running of the locomotives, or cars, or other machinery of such company, or for damage by any person in the employment and service of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company."

(b) After giving in charge this section, the court in immediate connection therewith charged as follows: "The definition of ordinary care is just that care which every prudent man would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances, and the use of it as to whether the defendant was negligent or not will be whether, in so far as the particulars specified in the plaintiff's petition are concerned, the agents and servants of the defendant company exercised that degree of care; that is, the care which every prudent man would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances. If they did, there would be no negligence. A failure to do so would be negligence, and negligence is a question of fact for your determination." This charge was error, and requires a new trial. East Tennessee, Va. & Ga. Ry. Co. v. Miller, 95 Ga. 738, 22 S. E. 660; Sanders v. Southern Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 132, 32 S. E. 840; Ga. Ry. & Electric Co. v. Gilleland, 133 Ga. 628, 66 S. E. 944.

(c) Civil Code 1910, § 2780, above quoted, must be construed in connection with Civil Code 1910, § 2714, which provides that "a carrier of passengers is bound also to extraordinary diligence on behalf of himself and his agents to protect the lives and persons of his passengers. But he is not liable for injuries to the person after having used such diligence." And the words "reasonable care and diligence," used in the former section with reference to injuries, mean "extraordinary care and diligence."

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEEDS (§ 129*)—ESTATES CREATED—LIFE ESTATES.

Margaret Nort by a deed of gift conveyed to her sons, Peter Nort and John Nort, and to Charles Beerman, as trustee, their heirs and assigns, certain described realty, "together with the understanding herein expressed that the interest hereby granted, bargained, given, and conveyed, as aforesaid, shall be one-third of said bargained premises as the interest of said Peter Nort, and one-third to John Nort, and the remaining one-third interest to Charles Beerman, to be held by him in trust for said minor children, Margaret, Henry, and Mary Beerman. The aforesaid one-third interest of said lot conveyed to John Nort shall be during his natural life, and after his death to his children; and, if he should die without children, one-half of his one-third interest shall go to his brother, Peter Nort, and the remaining one-half of his interest to Margaret, Henry, and Mary Beerman. This shall not prevent the said John Nort from selling his portion of said city lot, and using the interest of the proceeds thereof; but the corpus shall descend as heretofore stated." Charles Beerman, as trustee, was authorized by the deed "to sell the above-described portion of his three children," and pay over the proceeds to them as they respectively arrive at the age of 21 years. The said deed contained the usual warranty clause. Held, that under said deed John Nort took a life estate in the property conveyed, with power to sell and convey in fee simple the entire estate in the one-third interest of which he was life tenant.

2. DEEDS (§ 124*)—CONSTRUCTION.

In a deed executed subsequently John Nort sold and conveyed to Charles Nort, his heirs and assigns, "all and entire my one-third undivided interest in and to the land deeded to me on the 15th day of September, 1874, by Margaret Nort [this being the deed referred to in the preceding headnote], and described as follows: [Here follows the description set forth in the foregoing deed.] To have and to hold the said bargained premises, with all and singular rights, members, and appurtenances thereto, the same being, belonging, or in any wise appertaining, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of him, the said Charles Nort, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in fee simple. And the said John Nort, his heirs, executors, and administrators, the said bargained premises unto the said Charles Nort, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, against the said John Nort, his heirs, executors, and administrators, and all and every other person or persons, shall and will warrant and forever defend by virtue of these presents." Held, that this deed was an exercise of the power of sale contained in the deed of Margaret Nort, conveying a one-third interest in the land to John Nort, and conveyed a fee-simple interest to the grantee named in his last deed, thereby divesting the children of John Nort of their remainder interest in the property.

3. FORMER DECISION SUSTAINED.

The court, upon review of the case of Ma-honey v. Manning, 133 Ga. 784, 66 S. E. 1082, declines to overrule the decision in that case.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Charles Nort and others against the Healy Real Estate & Improvement Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The surviving children of John Nort, deceased, and his grandson, who is the only child of his daughter, Margaret, deceased, brought their petition against the Healy Real Estate & Improvement Company, alleging that the defendant is in possession and control of certain described real estate in the city of Atlanta in which petitioners claim an undivided one-third interest, and praying for an accounting between petitioners and the defendant, for a judgment in favor of petitioners for such sums as may be due them as tenants in common with defendant, and that petitioners be decreed to be the owners of an undivided one-third interest in the property referred to. Attached to the petition is a copy of the deed of gift from Margaret Nort, the mother of John Nort, deceased, dated September 15, 1874, covering the property in controversy, and which contains the following language:

"That the aforesaid Margaret Nort, for and in consideration of the love and affection which she bears to her sons, Peter and John Nort, and to Margaret Beerman, Henry Beerman, and Mary Beerman, the children of her deceased daughter, Julia Beerman, has granted, given, and conveyed, and by these presents doth grant, give, and convey, to the said Peter Nort, John Nort, and Charles Beerman, as trustee for his children, the said Margaret, Henry, and Mary Beerman, their heirs and assigns, all that tract or parcel of land lying and being in the city of Atlanta, county and state aforesaid, and known and distinguished in the plan of said city as part of city lot No. 42, containing 75 feet front and running back to the right of way of the Western & Atlantic Railroad 200 feet, being the house and lot whereon said Margaret Nort and Charles Nort now reside, together with the understanding herein expressed that the interest hereby granted, bargained, given, and conveyed, as aforesaid, shall be one-third of said bargained premises as the interest of said Peter Nort, and one-third to John Nort, and the remaining one-third interest to Charles Beerman, to be held by him in trust for said minor children, Margaret, Henry, and Mary Beerman. The aforesaid one-third interest of said lot conveyed to John Nort shall be during his natural life, and after his death to his children; and, if he should die without children, one-half of his one-third interest shall go to his brother, Peter Nort, and the remaining one-half of his interest to Margaret, Henry, and Mary Beerman. This shall not prevent the said John Nort from selling his portion of said city lot, and using the interest of the proceeds thereof; but the corpus shall descend as heretofore stated. Charles Beerman, as trustee, is also authorized to sell the above-described portion of his three children, Margaret, Henry, and Mary, and pay over the proceeds thereof to them when they respectively arrive at the age of 21 years. If not sold before the children arrive at the age of 21, said trustee shall control their interest for them; but when they arrive of full age each, they can control it themselves—that is to say, that each child can control his own part when it arrives at age. To have and to hold said tract or parcel of land unto them, the said Peter Nort, John Nort, and Charles Beerman, as such trustee, under the conditions aforesaid, together with all of the rights and appurtenances thereof to the same in any manner belonging, to them and their own proper use, benefit, and behoof, under the conditions aforesaid. And the said Margaret Nort, for herself, heirs, executors, and administrators, the said bargained premises unto the said Peter Nort, John Nort, and Charles Beerman as trustee as aforesaid, their heirs and successors, will warrant and forever defend the right and title thereof against herself and all other persons whatever."

It is alleged in the petition that John Nort, one of the grantees named in the foregoing conveyance, executed a deed of conveyance to Charles Nort, a copy of which is attached to the petition, and which contains the following language:

"That the said John Nort, for and in consideration of the sum of six hundred ($600) dollars in hand paid, at and before the sealing and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed, and by these presents doth grant, sell, bargain, and convey unto the said Charles Nort, his heirs and assigns, all and entire my one-third undivided interest in and to the land deeded to me on the 15th day of September, 1874, by Margaret Nort, and described as follows: [Here follows the description set forth in the foregoing deed.] To have and to hold the said bargained premises, with all and singular rights, members, and appurtenances thereto, the same being, belonging, or in any wise appertaining, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of him, the said Charles Nort, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns in fee simple. And the said John Nort, his heirs, executors, and administrators, the said bargained premises unto the said Charles Nort, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, against the said John Nort, his heirs, executors, and administrators, and all and every other person or persons, shall and will warrant and forever defend by virtue of these presents."

It is shown in the petition that Charles Nort conveyed the one-third interest last described, and that by successive transfers this and the other two-thirds interest were conveyed finally to the Healy Real Estate & Improvement Company. In an amendment to the petition it is alleged that the consideration flowing from Charles Nort to John Nort, to wit, $600, was totally inadequate to represent the then value of an undivided one-third interest in and to the title in fee of said property, which was well worth $1,800, and that the life estate alone in a one-third undivided interest in the property was, at the time of the conveyance by John Nort to Charles Nort, worth $600.

The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was sustained, and the plaintiffs excepted.

F. M. Hughes and R. B. Blackburn, for plaintiffs in error. Jno. L. Hopkins & Sons, for defendant in error.

BEOK, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Giving effect to the plain import of the language used by the grantor, Margaret Nort, in her deed of gift to Peter Nort, John Nort, and Charles Beerman, trustee for his minor children, so far as relates to the portion of the property conveyed to the grantor's son, John, the latter was given a one-third interest or portion, with remainder over, with a power to sell the fee. In the first part of the granting clause, after the use of apt words of gift and conveyance of the entire property embraced in the deed, and in the same sentence, the grantor employs language defining and limiting the interest of the grantees, as follows: "With the understanding herein expressed that the interest hereby granted, bargained, given, and conveyed, as aforesaid, shall be one-third of said bargained premises as the interest of said Peter Nort, and one-third to John Nort [the ancestor of plaintiffs], and the remaining one-third interest to Charles Beerman, to be held by him in trust for said minor children, Margaret, Henry, and Mary Beerman. The aforesaid one-third interest of said lot conveyed to John Nort shall be during his natural life, and after his death to his children; and, if he should die without children, one-half of his one-third interest shall go to his brother, Peter Nort, and the remaining one-half of his interest to Margaret, Henry, and Mary Beerman. This shall not prevent the said John Nort from selling his portion of said city lot, and using the interest of the proceeds thereof; but the corpus shall descend as heretofore stated." Clearly, however inartificially it may be expressed, an intention of the donor to give a power to sell the one-third portion of the property conveyed to John Nort for life, with remainder over, is revealed in the language quoted. Unless the provision: "This shall not prevent John Nort from selling his portion, * * * and using the interest of the proceeds thereof; but the corpus shall descend as heretofore stated"—is construed as giving to John Nort a power to sell the fee, this part of the deed is entirely idle and nugatory; for without authority from the grantor he would have had the right to sell and convey his life estate, which is created by a preceding clause of the deed. By the use of the provision last quoted it is the manifest intention of the donor to create in the life tenant a power not inherent in him as a tenant for life merely. And while the donor did not undertake to safeguard the corpus by the creation of a trust for its management and control, she did expressly stipulate that the corpus should descend "as heretofore stated"; that is, to the children of John Nort, giving to John Nort himself the right to use the interest of the proceeds of the sale of his portion of the lot of land conveyed by the grantor, Margaret Nort. The expression, "use the interest of the proceeds thereof," is not only consonant with the construction we have placed upon the deed, rendering harmonious all of the provisions thereof, but it utterly contradicts the contention of the plaintiffs to the effect that John Nort took only a life estate without a power of sale of the fee. The similarity in the language conferring authority upon John Nort to sell, and upon Charles Beerman as trustee to sell the "portion of his three children," for the purpose of dividing the proceeds among them, may also be considered in aid of the construction which we have given to that part of the deed under consideration, if any further argument is necessary to make it conclusive.

[2] 2. Having decided that the deed from Margaret Nort conferred upon John Nort authority to sell the fee of his interest or portion of the land, we still have left open the other question; that is, as to whether John Nort exercised that power in the execution of his deed of conveyance to Charles Nort. If, from the language of the latter deed, without the aid of extraneous circumstances, it can be gathered that it was the intention of the grantor to execute a power of sale, and that his deed was made in execution of that power, then the court below properly sustained the demurrer of the defendant and dismissed the plaintiffs' action. In the case of Mahoney v. Manning, 133 Ga. 784, 66 S. E. 1032, it was said: "The principle enunciated in Sir Edward Clere's Case is said to be the technical rule, which is thus stated in 4 Kent's Com. § 234: 'The general rule of construction both as to deeds and wills is that if there be an interest and power existing together in the same person over the same subject, and an act be done without particular reference to the power, it will be applied to the interest, and not to the power. If an act will work two ways, the one by an interest and the other by a power, and the act be indifferent, the law will attribute it to the interest, and not to the authority.'" Mr. Justice Evans, who delivered the opinion in the Mahoney Case, referring to the contention of one of the parties to that case, that the strict technical rule obtains in this state, examined and discussed the prior cases decided in this court bearing upon that question; i. e., Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 278, 5 S. E. 38, 11 Am. St. Rep. 420, Lee v. Giles, 124 Ga. 494, 52 S. E. 806, Middlebrooks v. Ferguson, 126 Ga. 232, 55 S. E. 34, Clarke v. Land Co., 113 Ga. 22, 38 S. E. 823, Holder v. American Investment Co., 94 Ga. 640, 21 S. E. 897, and Mortgage Co. v. Buice, 98 Ga. 795, 26 S. E. 84, and as a part of the discussion said: "These are the only cases which directly bear upon the subject we have in hand. In none of them was the rule we are following in this case rejected; but, on the contrary, though recognizing its principle, its application was denied, because neither of the instruments made any reference to the will, which was the source of title and conferred the power. This negative pregnant is especially significant when we consider the throes through which other courts have gone in an effort at rationalization of the austere technical rule promulgated in Sir Edward Clere's Case. We take these cases to mean, if there had been a reference to the conveyance conferring the power, that such reference would evince an intention to execute the power, and would be so construed. So that we conceive the rule of law, as expressed in these cases, to be that in order for an instrument to be effective as an execution of a power, where the maker is the owner of an interest in the land conveyed and also of a power to convey the fee, the recitals in the instrument must either expressly refer to the power, or by necessary implication clearly indicate that an execution of the power is intended." See, also, the case of Mayo v. Harrison, 134 Ga. 737, 68 S. E. 497.

In the present case, upon examination of the deed from John Nort to Charles Nort, there is a reference to the deed of Margaret Nort, which contains the power of sale; and in addition to this reference to the instrument conferring the power we find in the deed of John Nort clear indications that he exercised and intended to exercise the power of sale by executing the deed to Charles Nort. In the first place, the deed of John Nort warrants the fee-simple title to Charles Nort, his heirs, executors, and administrators; and while, of itself, would not be a sufficient indication of his intent to exercise the power of sale conferred upon him, it is to be considered in connection with other indicia to be found in his deed of his exercise of the power. For in his deed it is recited that the grantor conveys "all and entire my one-third undivided interest in and to the land deeded to me * * * by Margaret Nort, and described as follows: * * * The other two-thirds interest in said land having been on the same day in the same deed conveyed by the said Margaret Nort to Peter Nort and Charles Beerman as trustee for his minor children." Now, when it is remembered that the one-third interest in the land given to Peter Nort and the one-third interest given to Beerman as trustee were fee-simple interests, the reference in John Nort's deed to his one-third interest as of the same quality as the interest of Peter Nort and Charles Beerman, trustee, and the further plain indication that the entire interest in the land is made up of the three interests mentioned in the deed of John Nort—that is, the one-third interest of the grantor and the other two-third interest conveyed to Peter Nort and Charles Beerman as trustee—there is the clear indication that John Nort's deed was an exercise of the power of sale conferred upon him by the deed of gift from his mother. So finding in the deed of John Nort plain indications of the grantor's intention to execute the power of sale conferred upon him by the deed of Margaret Nort, as well as reference to the instrument conferring the power, we are of the opinion that the court below properly held that John Nort exercised and intended to exercise the power of sale conferred upon him, and that his intention is manifest from the instrument which was held to be an exercise of the power, and this intention could be arrived at without resorting to extraneous circumstances, such as a comparison of the purchase price of the property with its alleged value.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WINGFIELD, Ordinary, et al. v. KUTRES.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 101*)—LICENSES.

Under the proper construction of section 3 of the act approved September 5, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 1112), a person, upon payment of one license fee of $200, is entitled to a license provided for in that section of the act, and may carry on the business at any number of places in the county in which he obtained his license.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by Nicholas Kutres against S. B. Wingfield, Ordinary, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Nicholas Kutres instituted suit against S. B. Wingfield, as ordinary, and W. E. Jackson, as sheriff, of Clarke county, to restrain the collection of four executions which had been issued against the plaintiff by the ordinary and levied by the sheriff. The executions were issued on account of a failure to pay certain fees alleged to be due for licenses to sell near beer in the county of Clarke, under the provisions of section 3 of the act approved September 5, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 1112); two of them issuing on account of the nonpayment of licenses for the year 1908, and others for the year 1909. Kutres had paid to the ordinary $200, the amount of the prescribed license fee for one license for the year 1908, and also a similar amount for one license for the year

1909. The ordinary accepted payment, and in each instance issued a license which designated a particular place at which the licensee should carry on his business, but the license was not accepted; it being insisted upon the part of Kutres that under a proper construction of the act above referred to the payment of one license fee authorized him to sell near beer at any number of places in the county, and that the ordinary by the license could not restrict him to the transaction of business at one place. At the interlocutory hearing it was conceded that injunction should issue unless, under a proper construction, the act authorized the holder of a license to sell at any number of places in the county in which the license was issued, rather than that a separate license was required by the act to be obtained for each place of business. The trial judge construed the act as requiring only one license in the county, and granted the injunction. The defendants excepted, and in the brief of their counsel in the Supreme Court it was said expressly that the plaintiffs in error did not contend that Kutres was estopped by reason of his attorney having received the license and kept it in his possession, and that "there is only one question involved in this case, and that is whether the license prescribed by the act of September 5, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 1112), when paid, authorizes the person paying the same to engage in the business of selling beverages of the character therein referred to in any number of places within the county that he may desire, or whether a payment of $200 is required under said act for each separate and distinct place of business."

The caption of the act was: "An act to provide a revenue to be used for the development and conduct of the penitentiary system of the state and to buy farm lands and equipment as may be needed in connection with the management, control, and employment of the convicts of this state, by requiring a license to be obtained by all persons, firms or corporations manufacturing or selling in this state or maintaining therein supply depots or places for distributing any imitation of or substitute for beer, ale, wine, whisky, or other spirituous or malt liquors; to prescribe the terms and conditions on which such license may issue and the amounts to be paid therefor; to prohibit the carrying on of any business for which such license is required without obtaining such license; to provide penalties for violations of this act; to provide for the forfeiture of the licenses provided for in this act when the same are used as a cloak for the violation of the law; and to appropriate the money raised hereunder, and for other purposes." Section 1 prescribed a license fee of $500 for each calendar year or part thereof, to be paid by every person, firm, or corporation manufacturing, within the limits of this state, any beverage or drink or liquor in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, ale, wine, whisky, or other alcoholic, spirituous, or malt liquors, and required that the manufacturer obtain a license from the ordinary of the county wherein the business was carried on. Section 2 prescribed a license fee of $500 for each calendar year or part thereof to be paid by every person, firm, or corporation who shall maintain a supply depot, warehouse or distributing offices or other place of business within the limits of this state where such beverages, drinks, or liquors as are referred to in the first section are kept for sale or distribution in quantities of more than five gallons, and required the person, firm, or corporation selling or distributing same to obtain a license so to do from the ordinary of the county wherein such "depot or place is kept." Section 3 was as follows: "Be it further enacted, that every firm, person, or corporation who shall sell or offer for sale in quantities of less than five gallons any such beverages, drinks or liquors as are referred to in the first section of this act shall obtain a license so to do from the ordinary of the county wherein such business is carried on, and shall pay therefor the sum of two hundred ($200.00) dollars for each calendar year or part thereof." Section 4 prescribed that there should be no exception or license for any drink prohibited by law; and section 5 provided that the names of manufacturers should be plainly stamped on the vessel containing the liquid. Section 6 declared that all moneys collected under the provisions of the act should be paid over to the Treasurer of the state, to be held as a special fund to be used in the development and conduct of the penitentiary system of the state, and to buy such farms, lands, road equipment, or other properties as may be needed in connection therewith, or in connection with the management, control, and employment of the convicts, etc. Sections 7 and 8 prescribed penalties for violations of the law, while section 9 repeals all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of the act.

E. K. Lumpkin and Cobb & Erwin, for plaintiffs in error. W. M. Smith and Henry C. Tuck, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. In support of the contention that section 3 requires a separate license for each place of business in the county of a dealer in the beverages therein referred to, counsel for the plaintiffs in error urged that the act is a police measure and also a revenue measure, and that whether it be considered as a revenue measure pure and simple, or police measure pure and simple, or as of the dual character, having for its purpose both regulation and revenue, it is inconceivable that the General Assembly intended that the payment of one license fee should authorize a license designating no place of business, but authorize the holder to engage in business at any number of places in the county that he might see proper. It was pointed out that, if the licensee could carry on the business at any number of places, it would be possible for one person to have a monopoly of the sale of the imitations in each county in the state in which their sale was authorized, because the law does not compel the holder of the license to conduct the sales in person, and the sales might be conducted at numerous places by duly authorized agents acting in good faith; also, that it would open the door to fraud, so as to defeat the revenue purpose of the act by a collusive arrangement between different persons, all claiming to sell under the license of one person. It was further pointed out that the purpose of the license is to locate the business of the holder, in order that he may be under the supervision of the authorities, to see that no violation of law takes place, and that the business is conducted in such manner as not to interfere with the public peace and welfare, and that this purpose would be defeated to a large extent if the licensee should be permitted to engage in sales at numerous places. To locate the place of business of the holder of the license is not necessarily the sole purpose of a license. A business may be licensed, or a person may be licensed to transact business, and in neither instance is restriction to a particular place essential. The Legislature may not deem that the character of the business is such that for the purpose of police regulation it should be restricted to a particular place.

All of the reasons pointed out by the plaintiffs in error, as above enumerated, to show why the act should be construed as contended for by them, were appropriate matters for consideration by the Legislature in enacting the law; but they are all consistent with the construction placed upon the act by the trial court, and do not require a different construction. The act might produce less revenue if one fee and license authorize a person to deal at a single place, rather than in a number of places, or it might not; and whether it would or not, and whether the Legislature, in dealing with the matter as a revenue matter, was satisfied to exact but one license and fee from a dealer in each county in which he should carry on the business, was a matter for legislative consideration. It was also for the Legislature to determine what police supervision, if any, should be required for this particular character of business; and the argument that it might to a greater or less extent require such supervision would not necessitate the construction contended for by the plaintiffs in error. As a revenue measure the exaction of a license of $200 for each dealer in each county in which he carries on the business of selling the imitations specified in the act comports with the object of the act. As a police measure the penalty imposed by other sections of the act comports with that object. Section 3 omits any reference to location at which the licensed sales may be made, save only that, in declaring how licenses shall be obtained, it is provided that they shall be granted by the ordinary of the county wherein such business is carried on. The nature of the business is such as that it could be located at a given place or places, or be conducted in a transitory manner, and there is no attempt to confine its operation to one or more localities.

In construing statutes, subsequent acts of the Legislature on the same subject may be considered. Barron v. Terrell, 124 Ga. 1077-1079, 53 S. E. 181. Paragraph 3 of section 7 of the general tax act approved August 16, 1909 (Acts 1909, pp. 36-64), deals with the subject covered by section 3 of the act of 1908 involved in this case, and, in addition to raising the license fee to $300, declares that it shall be paid "for each place of business," and also restricts the right to engage in such business to the limits of incorporated cities, towns, or villages of not less than a specified number of inhabitants. This seems to be a recognition by the Legislature that the former act did not exact a license fee for each separate place of business, and the manifestation of an intention to change the law, so that a separate license fee might be required for each place of business. In former general tax acts, such as the act approved August 15, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 26), in dealing with licenses to engage in businesses of similar character, where it was intended that a license fee should be paid "for each place of business," it was expressly so declared. The right to sell near beer without the payment of a license is inherent, unless expressly restricted by statute, and statutes exacting licenses for such purposes are to be strictly construed. But it does not require a strict construction of this statute to hold that section 3 was not intended to exact a separate license for each place of business. While it might have done so, the General Assembly, dealing with the subject as it then appeared to it, was content to exact one fee, and require a license from every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business in the county. Subsequent events seem to have caused the Legislature to view the matter differently, and change the law as already pointed out, not only as to the amount of each license fee charged, but by requiring a separate license for each place of business in each county, and restricting the right to carry on such business to the limits of incorporated cities, towns, and villages containing more than a specified number of inhabitants.

Counsel for plaintiff in error have cited the following authorities: Malkan v. Chicago, 217 Ill. 471, 75 N. E. 548, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 488; Wason v. Severance, 2 N. H. 501; Murrell v. Bokenfohr, 108 La. 19, 32 South. 178; Matter of Lyman, 59 App. Div. 217, 69

N. Y. Supp. 309; 21 A. & E. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 814, note 7; 23 Cyc. 119 (C), note 69; 17 A. & E. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 237; State v. Walker, 16 Me. 244. But an examination of all of them, except the last, shows that there were restrictions in the statutes or ordinances, and in some cases licenses (upon which the right to transact the business depended under the law of the state), which expressly confined the licensee to conduct the business mentioned at specified places. In the last case cited, to wit, State v. Walker, 16 Me. 241, the ruling, which restricted the operation of the license to one place, was based largely on the fact that the statute which exacted the license required that the person to be licensed should have certain moral qualifications, to be ascertained by the judgment of certain officers, and that any person so approved, before being licensed, should give bond, conditioned as prescribed in the statute. The decision was rendered in a case against the mere agent, who had not executed the bond. The act there under consideration also contained a provision that "no innholder, victualler, or retailer shall suffer any disorderly conduct in his house, shop, or dependencies thereof, nor suffer any person to drink to drunkenness or excess in his or her house or shop, or suffer any minor or servant to sit drinking there," which the court declared indicated but one house, and one shop, to be conducted by one person. The reasoning of the court in that case will not apply to a statute similar to that which we have under consideration, where no qualifications are prescribed, and no bond required, for one who desires to engage in such business, and where the act contains nothing to indicate that one particular place of business was in contemplation of the Legislature.

WEST v. HACKETT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

TRIAL (§ 29*)—CONTRACTS (§ 353*)—DAMAGES (§ 78*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—ACTION FOR BREACH—INSTRUCTIONS—MISCONDUCT OF JUDGE—IMPROPER STATEMENTS.

A writing, signed by A. T. Hackett and S. P. West, recited that the former "is held and firmly bound unto" the latter, and the condition of this obligation is he has agreed to sell to West a described tract of land, and that "the condition of the foregoing is such that, whereas, the said S. P. West has this day made and delivered to the said A. T. Hackett six" described promissory notes, "and also the further condition that the said S. P. West and his family agree to furnish said Hackett with a comfortable room, no other person to occupy said room, board him for six years, at $100 per year, including washing, and, further, said West and family are to treat him with that respect and consideration and kindness which his age and infirmity may require, and in the event said Hackett shall die, or from any other legitimate and legal reason shall cease board with said West, then and in that event the unused portion of $800 for board shall be and become a money debt at 80 per cent. on the dollar, which the said West agrees to pay said Hackett or representative in lieu of unused money for board. Now should the said S. P. West fully carry out the foregoing agreement and pay said notes as stipulated, the said Hackett agrees to make or cause to be made to the said S. P. West good and sufficient titles in fee simple to the foregoing described property, which if the said Hackett should do then this bond to be null and void; else to remain in full force." Hackett brought suit against West to recover $480, besides interest from the "date of the breach of the contract," alleging that West had refused to carry out his agreement to furnish Hackett with a comfortable room and treat him as provided in the above-quoted portion of the contract between them, and plaintiff had ceased to board with the said West "and the said debt becoming a money demand as per said contract and agreement." Upon a trial of the case a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $400 principal, besides interest, and to the order of the court refusing a new trial, the defendant excepted. Held:

(1) At the conclusion of the evidence, it was error for the court to state, in the presence of the jury: "I want to say, without prejudice to either side, that, if I represented the plaintiff, I would dismiss this case; if I represented the defendant, I would let him take a judgment for all he sues for. If there is an honest difference between the parties, you could find for the plaintiff."

(2) It was error for the court to charge: "If you find from the evidence that both parties have acted in good faith, Col. Hackett in good faith about his contention, and the defendant in just as good faith about his contention, and they cannot agree, then you would be authorized to divorce them; and if you divorce them, you would find in favor of the plaintiff for $400, with interest at 7 per cent. from the 1st day of January, last year." The mere fact that either or both of the parties acted in good faith in regard to their respective contentions would not authorize a recovery by plaintiff under the contract.

(3) It was not error to refuse written request of West to charge the following: "That the clause of the contract providing that the defendant shall pay plaintiff 80 per cent. of amount due for board only liquidates or settles the amount of the damages for the breach, and does not make it fall due or become payable any sooner than would be the case without that clause, and that the contract is an entire contract for board for six years, and that no damages, whether liquidated or not, are recoverable under the contract sued on until the expiration of the six years referred to in the contract."

(4) There was no error requiring a new trial in the following charge of the court: "Now, gentlemen [referring to the clause of the contract alluded to in the statement of the preceding ground], this contemplates that Mr. West and his family are to furnish Col. Hackett with a comfortable room as here described, and that he is to live with the family, and they are to treat him in the manner set out here, and if for any legitimate reason he should fail to board the time out, or should die, the money becomes due, not the full amount, but 80 per cent. of the remaining unused portion of it."

GARNER v. DOUGLASVILLE BANKING CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 255*)—LIENS FOR RENT—PERSONS ENTITLED TO ENFORCE.

An assignment before maturity of a written contract for rent does not operate to raise in favor of the assignee the general lien given to landlords, when it appears that before the levy of a distress warrant in favor of the transferee the consideration of such contract had entirely failed.

(a) One to whom a landlord transfers a note of his tenant for rent has the right to foreclose the general or special lien of the landlord for rent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 1047; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; Julian McCamy, Judge pro hac.

Action by the Douglasville Banking Company against W. T. Garner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. H. McLarty and H. W. Nalley, for plaintiff in error. J. S. James and Roberts & Hutcheson, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. W. T. Garner, the plaintiff in error (hereinafter referred to as the defendant), in 1902 gave to Mrs. Mary Leathers a note for the rent of certain land for the year 1903. Some time in 1903 Mrs. Leathers transferred the note to the Douglasville Banking Company, defendant in error (hereinafter called the plaintiff). The latter caused a levy of a distress warrant to be made in October, 1904, on crops grown by the defendant that year on the same premises for the rent of which for 1903 the note was given. The defendant filed a counter affidavit, alleging that the rent distrained for was not due, which he afterwards amended by alleging that in March, 1903, there was filed to the May term, 1903, a suit in ejectment against his landlord, Mrs. Leathers, to recover the rented premises and mesne profits, to which he was made a party defendant in November, 1903, and enjoined from paying her any rents, and that in September, 1904, a receiver was appointed in this litigation to take charge of the rents, to whom the defendant immediately thereafter paid the rent for which the note was given; that Mrs. Leathers was not the owner of the premises, they having been recovered from her in the ejectment action in November, 1904, and the defendant had received no consideration for the note. The jury found for the plaintiff, the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted. In the bill of exceptions error is also assigned on certain pendente lite rulings made by the court below.

The proceeding was purely a summary one, based upon the alleged right of the transferee of the rent note to foreclose a landlord's lien for rent. Conceding that the purchaser of the note obtained a valid transfer of all the rights which Mrs. Leathers, as landlord, had against the defendant; could it subject the property levied upon in the distress warrant proceeding? This proceeding was an attempt to assert the general lien for rent provided by law in favor of a landlord. Under Civil Code 1910, § 3340, "such general lien shall date from the time of the levy of a distress warrant to enforce the same." The assignment of the rent note could pass to the assignee no greater rights with respect to the collection of rent by foreclosure of a landlord's lien than the landlord, Mrs. Leathers, possessed; and if at the time the distress warrant was levied on October 28, 1904, Mrs. Leathers, if she had retained the rent note, could not have established a lien by levying a distress warrant, because the right to collect the rents for 1903 never belonged to her, but to another, her transferee could not do so. It appears from the evidence that in March, 1903, an action in ejectment was filed against Mrs. Leathers to recover the premises for which the rent note was given, and that in September of that year the defendant Garner was made a party defendant in the ejectment proceedings and restrained from paying over to Mrs. Leathers any rents for these premises, and that in September, 1904, a receiver was appointed to take charge of the rents for 1903 and 1904, to whom, during that month, the defendant in the present action paid the rent for which the note was given. This payment to the receiver by direction of the court took away from the landlord any further right to proceed, by foreclosure of lien or otherwise, against the tenant for the recovery of the rent, and also deprived her assignee of any right to levy a distress warrant to assert a landlord's lien.

The charge of the court complained of, wherein reference was made to the judgment in the ejectment suit being the result of a fraud, was unauthorized by the evidence. Though the judgment in the ejectment suit in favor of the plaintiff in that suit for the recovery from Mrs. Leathers of the premises rented by her to the defendant in the present suit and for the rent of these premises for the year 1903 was not rendered until after the levy of the distress warrant, this judgment was an adjudication that the payee of the rent note, if she had not disposed of it, would not have been, at the time the distress warrant was levied, or at any other time, entitled to the rent of the land for 1903. While the transferee of the rent note was no party to the case in which the judgment above referred to was rendered, the judgment is presumed to be valid. It having been adjudicated, in a case to which Mrs. Leathers and the one to whom she rented the land for 1903 were parties, that Mrs. Leathers never at any time had any right to the rent of the land for 1903, and the tenant having paid to the receiver appointed in the ejectment suit the rent for 1903 in accordance with a judgment rendered in that suit, neither Mrs. Leathers, nor her transferee of the rent note for 1903 given her by the tenant, had any lien for such rent. Camp v. West, 113 Ga. 304, 38 S. E. 822. No question arises in the present case as to the right of the transferee of the note, as an innocent holder of a negotiable instrument, to proceed with the collection of the note itself by suit thereon.

The charge of the court complained of in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, not being in accord with the ruling we make, was error. Counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that the court erred in refusing to dismiss the levy, and in refusing to grant a nonsuit, on the ground that the transferee of a note for rent has no right to foreclose the general lien in favor of a landlord for rent, but only has a right to foreclose the special lien. We cannot agree with this view. One to whom a landlord transfers a note of his tenant for rent has the right to foreclose the general or special lien of the landlord for rent. Civil Code 1910, §§ 3346, 3347. Under the evidence, a verdict in favor of the defendant was demanded, and the court erred in refusing a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

HAMMOND v. CLARK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 68*)—AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION.

In the absence of some other exclusive method of determination provided by the Constitution, whether an amendment has been properly proposed and adopted according to the requirements of the existing Constitution, and has become a part of the fundamental law of the state, is generally a judicial question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 126; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 68*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION—LEGALITY.

Where an act of the Legislature proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the state directed the Governor to publish such proposition and submit it for ratification at the next general election, the fact that after the election he published a proclamation declaring that the amendment had been ratified was not conclusive on the courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 126; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 6*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION—PUBLICATION IN NEWSPAPERS—SUFFICIENCY.

The requirement of article 13, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution, that the proposed amendment shall be published in one or more newspapers in each congressional district for two months previous to the time of holding the next general election, was complied with, as to the publication in a particular newspaper, where the amendment was published once a week for nine weeks; the first publication being on August 5th, and the last being on September 30th, preceding the general election which was held on October 5th.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 6*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION—VALIDITY.

Where an amendment to the Constitution has been proposed by the Legislature in the manner provided by that instrument, and it has been submitted to the voters for ratification at the prescribed time and in substantially the prescribed manner, and has been ratified by them, such amendment will not be declared void, even if it should appear that an executive or ministerial officer did not comply strictly with the law as to the extent of publication in a particular newspaper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 6*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION—PROCLAMATION OF GOVERNOR—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the Legislature by an act proposed an amendment to the Constitution, and directed the Governor to make the required publication and to submit the question of ratification to the voters at the next general election, and set forth the form of ballot to be used in voting for the amendment or against it, the publication by the Governor of a proclamation, setting forth the entire act and declaring that the proposed amendment was submitted for ratification or rejection to the qualified voters of the state at the next general election, to be held on a named date, was a sufficient compliance with the Constitution and the act as to the form of publication and submission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 9*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION.

The Constitution does not require that the journals of the two houses of the Legislature must be published and distributed before a proposed amendment can be submitted to the voters for ratification.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 5*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION—VALIDITY.

Where an act of the Legislature and certain amending acts were declared unconstitutional by this court, and thereupon the Legislature proposed an amendment to the Constitution, curing the defect which had existed in the legislative acts, and also ratifying them as of the dates of their passage, and such amendment was rat-fied by the qualified voters of the state, it will not be declared void on the ground that it did not set out in substance or in terms the legislative acts sought to be validated, but only described them by copying their captions and referring to the year in which they were passed, or because such acts were not copied in extenso on the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives as part of such proposed constitutional amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

8. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 9*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION.

Where a constitutional amendment was submitted to the qualified voters of the state for ratification or rejection, the fact that in one county the printed ballots contained only a form of vote for ratification, and no form for voting against it, will not alone cause the amendment, after ratification, to be declared void.

(a) This is especially true where it was not made to appear that any official was concerned in the preparation of such printed form of ballot, or that this had any substantial effect upon the general result of the election.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

9. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 9*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION—VALIDITY.

The Legislature sought to increase the salaries of judges of the superior courts in certain circuits containing the largest cities in the state, and to have the difference between what was paid to judges from the state treasury and the amount so fixed paid from the treasuries of the respective counties in which such cities were located. The acts making such provision were declared by this court to be in violation of the Constitution. An amendment to the Constitution was proposed by the Legislature, and ratified by the people, which changed the Constitution as to the salaries of such judges for the future, and also ratified the acts of the Legislature as of their respective dates. Held, that such amendment will not be declared void on the ground that, in effect, it constituted two amendments, and its submission as one was violative of article 13, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution, which provides that, "when more than one amendment is submitted at the same time, they shall be so submitted as to enable the electors to vote on each amendment separately."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

10. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 24*)—AMENDMENTS—CONSTRUCTION.

If an amendment to the Constitution has been proposed by the Legislature, duly submitted to the voters of the state for ratification or rejection, and by them has been ratified, so that the amendment has become an integral part of the Constitution, it cannot be declared void on the ground that in some particular it does not accord with some other provision of the same instrument.

(a) The different provisions of the Constitution should be harmonized, if practicable. If an amendment duly adopted necessarily conflicts with some previous provision, the amendment, being the last expression of the sovereign will of the people, will prevail as an implied modification pro tanto of the former provision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-29; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

11. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 243, 278*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW.

An amendment to the Constitution of the character indicated in the ninth headnote will not, at the instance of a county affected by it, or of the treasurer of such county, be declared void as being in conflict with the provision of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

12. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 52, 278*)—AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION.

Where the Legislature undertook to make an increase in the salaries of judges in certain circuits, and to have the increase paid by the counties therein containing cities of not less than a certain population, and such acts were declared by this court to be invalid, because violative of a provision of the Constitution of the state, an amendment to the Constitution thereafter duly made, which changed the constitutional provision on that subject so as to fix the rule in regard to such salaries for the future, and which ratified the legislative acts as of their respective dates, cannot be declared void at the instance of one of the counties concerned, or its treasurer, on the ground that it sought to overrule the former decision, invaded the province of the judiciary, and deprived the county of its property without due process of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. §§ 52, 278.*]

13. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 145*)—OBLIGATIONS OF CONTRACT.

Where, under the acts of the Legislature authorizing payment of a part of the salary of the judge of the superior court in certain counties, a judge was paid by warrants drawn by the county commissioner of one of such counties directing the county treasurer to pay to the order of the judge the amount thereof, "subject to any claim of the county," and such warrants were indorsed in collecting them, this did not amount to a contract on the part of the judge to pay back to the county such salary as was paid to him, in case the act of the Legislature under which it was paid should at some future time be declared unconstitutional by the courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

14. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 145*)—OBLIGATIONS OF CONTRACT.

An amendment to the Constitution of the state, which ratified the acts of the Legislature under which such payments were made, was not violative of the provision of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the passage of laws impairing the obligation of a contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

15. STATES (§ 4*)—REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

Such an amendment to the state Constitution as that indicated in the preceding headnote was not violative of the clause of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees to every state a republican form of government.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

16. PREVIOUS DECISION CONSTRUED.

In Clark v. Hammond, 134 Ga. 792, 68 S. E. 600, this court held that the effort by legislative enactments to supplement the salaries of judges of the superior courts in certain circuits, by requiring the payment of the increase over that payable from the state treasury to be paid by certain counties in the circuit containing cities having not less than a certain population, was in violation of the Constitution as it then stood. This provision for payment was an essential part of the legislative scheme expressed in the acts under consideration. It could not be stricken from them, and leave the acts as fixing an increased salary for the judges described, payable from the state treasury, and no such construction was given to those acts by this court.

17. COUNTIES (§ 1*)—DEFINITION.

A "county" is one of the civil divisions of a state for judicial and political purposes, created by the sovereign power of the state of its own will, without the particular solicitation, assent, or concurrent action of the people who inhabit it; a local organization, which, for the purpose of civil administration, is invested with certain functions of corporate existence.

18. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 2*)—"PUBLIC CORPORATION."

A "public corporation" is one having for its object the administration of a portion of the powers of government, delegated to it for that purpose. Such are municipal corporations.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Mandamus by H. C. Hammond against W. A. Clark. From a judgment refusing the writ, applicant brings error. Reversed.

By article 6, § 18, par. 1, of the Constitution, it was provided that the judges of the superior courts should have salaries not to exceed $2,000 per annum; and by paragraph 2 it was provided that the General Assembly might at any time, by a two-thirds vote of each branch, prescribe another and a different salary for them. By the act of August 15, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 72), the salary of the judges of the superior courts was fixed at $3,000 per annum. By the act of August 6, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 73), as amended by the act of August 15, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 90), and by the act of July 31, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 56), the Legislature provided that the judges of the superior courts of all judicial circuits which were or might thereafter be established, having therein a city with a population of not less than 34,000 inhabitants according to the United States census of 1900, should receive a salary of $5,000 per annum, "the difference in amount between the sum paid said judges out of the treasury of the state and said $5,000 to be paid out of the treasury of the counties in which said cities are located." In Clark v. Hammond, 134 Ga. 792, 68 S. E. 600, it was held that the effort in these acts to supplement the salaries of the judges of the superior courts from county treasuries was unconstitutional and void. Thereupon, by an act passed by the requisite two-thirds majority, and approved by the Governor on August 8, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 43), an amendment to the Constitution was proposed, which was submitted to popular vote at the general election held on October 5th thereafter, and, upon receiving the requisite vote, was proclaimed by the Governor to have been adopted.

After this Judge Hammond, of the Augusta circuit, which contains a city having more than 34,000 inhabitants according to the census of 1900, demanded of the county treasurer payment of the difference between $3,000 per annum paid to the superior court judges from the state treasury and $5,000 per annum. Some of the amount thus demanded accrued prior to the proclamation of the adoption of the constitutional amendment, and some thereafter. The demand was refused. He then applied for a writ of mandamus against the treasurer. An order nisi was issued. The respondent set up, in substance, the following reasons why the writ should not be granted:

(1) That before this amendment had been adopted Judge Hammond had sought a mandamus to compel the payment of his salary under the act whereby the Legislature sought to provide it, and that the judgment holding that provision of the act invalid and that he was not entitled thereunder was a judgment which concluded him and was an estoppel.

(2) That the amendment had not been duly adopted by the people, because in substance it was not a single amendment, but more than one, and was submitted as one.

(3) Because it could not be advertised until first published in the journals of the General Assembly after its adjournment, and that the Legislature adjourned less than 60 days before the October election, and the journals were not published until after the election.

(4) That the publication was not for two months before the election, as required by the Constitution.

(5) That the act was not separately submitted to the electorate for ratification or rejection after publication, or otherwise than by such publication, which itself contained the submission.

(6) It was claimed that the ballots in Richmond county were only printed with the form for ratification. (It was not claimed this was the act of any official.)

(7) It was claimed that the part of the amendment prescribing the salaries and that validating the previous legislative acts on the same subject contradict and cancel each other, and therefore render the amendment of no effect.

(8) Because the plaintiff's salary, payable from the state treasury, is already $5,000, and therefore no demand exists on the county treasury.

(9) Because the amendment to the Constitution is a proviso inconsistent with the Constitution, and therefore void.

(10) Because the constitutional amendment of 1910 is destructive of the previous Constitution, in a most vital part, by destroying equality of burden of superior court judges' salaries, and putting a greater burden on some counties than on others. This is alleged to be in conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and to deprive the respondent of moneys intrusted to him without due process of law.

(11) That Richmond county is only one of the four counties composing the Augusta circuit, while Chatham and Fulton each compose a circuit, and this amendment specially conflicts with the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States as to Richmond county.

(12) Because statutes cannot be validated by a constitutional amendment for such purpose.

(13) Because the amendment does not set out the text or substance of said acts, nor are they entered on the journals in connection with such amendment.

(14) Because the validation of these acts by the people by a constitutional amendment, after they were declared void as being in conflict with an existing constitutional provision, is obnoxious to the section of the state Constitution providing that the several departments of government shall remain separate, and to the constitutional provision against making donations, and that against retroactive laws; that to now allow the people by constitutional amendment to confirm this legislative act would enable them to reverse a decision of this court; and to allow a recovery from this defendant would violate the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and section 4 of article 4 thereof, which guarantees to every state a republican form of government.

(15) Because the amendment, so far as it ratifies payments heretofore made under the acts of 1904, 1905, and 1906, to the plaintiff, impairs the obligation of the contract between said Hammond and said county. He was paid by defendant, on warrants drawn by W. F. Eve, as county commissioner, which ordered the treasurer to pay to the order of Henry C. Hammond the amount thereof on the bill that day audited "subject to any claim of the county." These warrants were indorsed, "Henry C. Hammond," and he received the bill. This constituted a contract between said Hammond and said county to repay said sums, which it can enforce unless prevented by this constitutional amendment; and therefore this amendment impairs the obligation of a contract, and is void, under the Constitution of the United States.

On the hearing the judge to whom the application was made refused the mandamus, and the applicant excepted.

Wm. H. Barrett, E. H. Callaway, Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, C. H. & R. S. Cohen, Boykin Wright, Archibald Blackshear, Jno. M. Slaton, L. Z. Rosser, and Alex C. King, for plaintiff in error. Salem Dutcher and W. K. Miller, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The judge of the superior court of the Augusta circuit sought by mandamus to compel the treasurer of Richmond county to pay him a part of his salary as fixed by the amendment to the Constitution of 1910 to be paid from the county treasury. This was resisted on a number of grounds. Broadly stated, the questions raised may be grouped under two general heads: (1) Did the proposed amendment (Acts 1910, p. 42) become a part of the Constitution? (2) If so, shall such part of the Constitution be itself declared unconstitutional and void, or to have no effect?

[2] 1-4. In dealing with the first question, counsel for plaintiff in error contended that the proclamation of the Governor declaring that the amendment was adopted was conclusive, and that the courts could not inquire into the question. To this contention we can not assent. The Constitution is the supreme state law. It provides how it may be amended. It makes no provision for exclusive determination by the Governor as to whether an amendment has been made in the constitutional method, and for the issuance by him of a binding proclamation to that effect. Such a proclamation may be both useful and proper, in order to inform the people whether or not a change has been made in the fundamental law; but the Constitution did not make it conclusive on that subject. When the Constitution was submitted for ratification as a whole, a provision was made for a proclamation of the result by the Governor. Const. art. 13, § 2, par. 2 (Civil Code 1910, § 6613). But in reference to amendments there is no such provision. Const. art. 13, § 1, par. 1 (Civil Code 1910, § 6610).

[1] In the absence of some other exclusive method of determination provided by the Constitution, the weight of authority is to the effect that whether an amendment has been properly adopted according to the requirements of the existing Constitution is a judicial question. The subject has been discussed at length and with citations of many authorities, in State v. Powell, 77 Miss. 543, 27 South. 927; Bott v. Wurta, 63 N. J. Law, 289, 43 Atl. 744, 881, 45 L. R. A. 251, and McConoughy v. Secretary of State, 106 Minn. 392, 119 N. W. 408. In considering the question whether a constitutional amendment has been properly proposed and adopted, the decisions of different courts have not been uniform as to the strictness or liberality with which constitutional provisions in regard to the manner of making amendments will be applied, and how small a deviation or failure of compliance with the letter of such provisions will require the state judiciary to declare such proposed amendment not to have been lawfully adopted, so as to become a part of the Constitution. In the Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment Cases, 24 Kan. 700, 710, Justice Brewer, who later became a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, thus strongly set forth the position that mere immaterial omissions or errors, which work no wrong to substantial rights, should be disregarded: "The two important, vital, elements in any constitutional amendment are the assent of two-thirds of the Legislature and a majority of the popular vote. Beyond these, other provisions are mere machinery and forms. They may not be disregarded, because by them certainty as to the essentials is secured. But they are not themselves the essentials. Take a strong illustration: The Constitution requires that the 'Secretary of State shall cause the same to be published in at least one newspaper in each county of the state where a newspaper is published, for three months preceding,' etc. Suppose a unanimous vote of both houses of the Legislature, and a unanimous vote of the people in favor of a constitutional amendment, but that the Secretary had omitted to publish in one county in which a newspaper was published; would it not be simply an insult to common sense to hold that thereby the will of the Legislature and people had been defeated? Is it within the power of the Secretary, either through ignorance or design, to thwart the public decision?" In People v. Sours, 31 Colo. 369 et seq., 74 Pac. 167, 102 Am. St. Rep. 34, the same view was taken. Steele, J., said: "At the outset it should be stated that every reasonable presumption, both of law and fact, is to be indulged in favor of the validity of an amendment to the Constitution, when it is attacked after its ratification by the people." See, also, State ex rel. Thompson v. Winnett, 78 Neb. 379, 110 N. W. 1113, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 149; State v. Laylin, 69 Ohio St. 1, 68 N. E. 574; Weston v. Ryan, 70 Neb. 211, 97 N. W. 347. This liberal interpretation applies rather to the manner of compliance with constitutional requirements in regard to amendments than to a total omission or disregard of such a requirement. It has not generally been held that an essential requirement could be entirely omitted, nor does the present case require us to take that position.

[4] But we concur in the view that substance is more important than form, and that the will of the Legislature lawfully expressed in proposing an amendment, and the will of the people expressed at the proper time and in the proper manner at the ballot box in ratifying such amendment, ought not to be lightly disregarded and set at naught, even if an executive or ministerial officer should not strictly comply with his duty in connection with matters of detail, regarding the publication or the like, and which do not appear to have substantially affected the result. The decision in Combs v. State, 81 Ga. 780, 8 S. E. 318, and that in Woodard v. State, 103 Ga. 496, 30 S. E. 522, are not controlling on the contention that the Governor's proclamation was conclusive.

In each of those cases the Legislature had passed a local option law and provided a particular method for the declaration of the result. It is not necessary for us to consider how far the courts would go into the mere question of contesting the election or the number of votes cast, or whether they would go behind the consolidation by the Secretary of State. No such effort is made, and it is not disputed that a majority of the votes were cast in favor of the amendment. It is also unnecessary to discuss the effect of lapse of time or acquiescence, or of the making of an amendment to the Constitution affecting a radical change in the government, and continued action in reliance thereon, or how far federal courts would investigate the manner of the adoption of amendments to state Constitutions, or would deal with the situation as they found it, until the question had been passed on by the courts of the state. None of these things are here involved. Dodd on Revision and Amendment of State Constitution, 209 et seq.

[3] Article 13, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution (Civil Code 1910, § 6610), reads as follows: "Any amendment or amendments to the Constitution may be proposed in the Senate or House of Representatives; and if the same shall be agreed to by two-thirds of the members elected to each of the two houses, each proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon. And the General Assembly shall cause such amendment or amendments to be published in one or more newspapers in each congressional district, for two months previous to the time of holding the next general election, and shall also provide for a submission of such proposed amendment or amendments to the people at said next general election; and if the people shall ratify such amendment or amendments by a majority of the electors qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly, voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become a part of this Constitution. When more than one amendment is submitted at the same time, they shall be so submitted as to enable the electors to vote on each amendment separately." It was contended that the proposed amendment was not published for two months prior to the election as required by this paragraph. The first publication in the Augusta Chronicle was on August 5th. It was published weekly nine times, the last time being on September 30th. The election took place on October 5th. Under the decisions of this court as to computing months, the first publication was two months prior to election. English v. Ozburn, 59 Ga. 392; Barrett & Carswell v. Devine, 60 Ga. 632; Western & Atlantic Railroad v. Carson, 70 Ga. 388; Peterson v. Georgia R., etc., Co., 97 Ga. 798, 25 S. E. 370. The Code declares that the word "month," employed in statutes, means a calendar month. Civil Code 1910, § 5. It also provides that, when a number of days is prescribed for the exercise of a privilege or the discharge of a duty, only the first or last day shall be counted. Id. § 4, par. 8. Under these two provisions, two modes of calculations have grown up, under the decisions. Rusk v. Hill, 117 Ga. 722, 728, 45 S. E. 42. But even if the rule as to days were applied, as August has 31 days, between the first advertisement and the election full 60 days intervened.

It could hardly have been the intention of the Constitution that an amendment should be published daily for two months. When that instrument was adopted, in some congressional districts containing no large towns there was most probably no paper published every day, and it cannot be supposed that the purpose was to impose an impossible condition on the making of an amendment. Besides, a requirement of publication in a newspaper for a month or for two months has never been treated in this state as requiring a publication daily for that length of time. In some instances, where notice was required to be given a certain time in advance of action, a single notice has been considered sufficient, if given the required time in advance. But doubtless there is a closer analogy to be drawn from advertisements of sheriffs' sales, citations, etc. At the time when the Constitution was formulated and adopted, the act of 1876 (Acts 1876, p. 99) was in force. This provided that where the law required "citations, notices, etc., by ordinaries, clerks, sheriffs, administrators, guardians, or others," to be published in a newspaper for 30 days it should be sufficient to publish the same once a week for 4 weeks; and where they were required to be published for 60 days, it would be sufficient to publish them once a week for 8 weeks previous to the term or time when an order was to be granted or the sale to take place. In Boyd v. McFarlin, 58 Ga. 208, it was held that, where a sheriff's advertisement was required to be published once a week for 4 weeks before the sale, 28 days must elapse between the first advertisement and the sale (not the last advertisement). This has since been changed by the act of 1891 (Civil Code 1910, § 6063). These authorities are not controlling in the present case; but they serve to show that the requirement of publication of a notice for 60 days was not understood to mean every day for 60 days, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1877. Much less would this be understood as necessary where the requirement was that a publication be made for 2 months. We are of the opinion that the weekly publication, which began two months prior to the election and ran for nine insertions, the last being on September 30th, before the election on October 5th, was a compliance with the law.

[5] 5. The Constitution provides that an amendment shall be published in one or more newspapers in each congressional district for two months previous to the time of holding the next general election, and that the General Assembly "shall also provide for the submission of such proposed amendment or amendments to the people at said next general election." In this case the General Assembly directed the Governor to make the publication and submission. He published a proclamation in which was copied the entire act proposing such amendment, including the requirement of the submission to the people at the next general election, and the form of ballot to be cast in favor of the adoption of such amendment or against it, and declared that the proposed amendment was submitted for ratification or rejection to the qualified voters of the state at the election held on October 5, 1910. This was a sufficient compliance with the Constitution and the act as to the form of publication and submission. No separate proceeding to submit the proposed amendment, aside from the publication, was necessary.

[6, 7] 6. 7. There is no merit in the contention that the Constitution requires that the journals of the two houses of the Legislature must be published before such an amendment can be submitted for ratification. Nor is there any force in the contention that the amendment to the Constitution was invalid because it did not set out in substance or in terms the legislative acts sought to be validated by the latter part of it, or that such acts were not entered on the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives as part of such proposed constitutional amendment. It was not claimed that due entry of the proposed amendment itself was not made.

[8] 8. It was alleged that the ballots in Richmond county were printed only with a form of vote for ratification. This may not have been a very impartial or altogether proper mode of preparing a ballot. But it was not alleged that any official was concerned in the preparation of such printed form of ballots. If there were any irregularities in connection with the election in Richmond county, it does not appear that they were such as to have affected the general result of the election throughout the state. Civil Code, 1910, § 126.

[9] 9. It was contended that the proposed amendment which was submitted to the people for ratification contained several distinct propositions, and that each of these constituted in effect a separate amendment, and should have been separately submitted. The Constitution provides that, "when more than one amendment is submitted at the same time, they shall be so submitted as to enable the electors to vote on each amendment separately." This amendment was to a single paragraph of the Constitution. While the amendment included more propositions than one, they were not wholly distinct and separate, or in regard to different subject-matters, but all tended to carry out one general purpose, and dealt with a single subject-matter—the salaries of judges in certain judicial circuits. It is true that it dealt with those salaries both in the past and in the future, but that is not a sufficient basis for a court to hold that it was necessary for the Legislature to have proposed two distinct amendments on that subject, instead of one. It was argued that some of the voters might have been willing to increase the salary for the future, but not to ratify its payment in the past (this court having held that the legislative provision for payment of the increase of salaries from the county treasuries was unconstitutional), and that the two things should have been separated. Had the Legislature seen fit to divide the two propositions in regard to the salaries of such judges, and to have submitted them separately, we do not say that they might not have done so. But we cannot hold that they were obliged to do so. Almost every amendment to the Constitution or to a legislative act involves more than a single proposition. Article 6, § 13, par. 1, of the Constitution deals with the subject of salaries of justices of the Supreme Court, judges of the superior courts, the Attorney General, and solicitors general—four different classes of officials. Suppose that the Legislature should determine to propose an amendment repealing this paragraph, or substituting another for it, or making a change in which it would affect all of the officers mentioned; could they not do so in a single amendment, or would they be compelled to propose four different amendments, because some voters might like to make the change in regard to one of the officials, but not in regard to another? Moreover, the same paragraph contains a provision that the Attorney General shall not have any fee or perquisite in cases arising after the adoption of the Constitution. Here is another distinct proposition, though still bearing on the question of the compensation of one of the officers named. Could not the Legislature propose an amendment repealing the entire paragraph, because some of the voters might like to vote separately on this proposition, disassociated from the rest of the section?

If the contention of counsel for defendant in error were sustained, it would be almost impossible to change many constitutional provisions by a single amendment, and such an amendment could not be submitted as a whole, but would have to be broken up into fragments, and submitted in disjointed propositions. In State ex rel. Hudd v. Timme, 54 Wis. 313, 336, 11 N. W. 785, 791, in dealing with a similar question, the court said: "In order to constitute more than one amendment, the proposition submitted must relate to more than one subject, and have at least two distinct and separate purposes, not dependent upon or connected with each other." The purpose there, as stated, was to change from annual to biennial sessions of the Legislature, and incidentally and connected with this main purpose was a proposition to change the tenure of office of members of the General Assembly from one to two years, and to change the compensation of the members. In State ex rel. Adams v. Herried, 10 S. D. 120, 72 N. W. 93, the proposed amendment to the Constitution, by one section, changed the number of regents of the state educational institutions, and by two other sections abolished the trustees of such institutions. These sections were submitted together as constituting one amendment. It was held that this did not violate the constitutional requirement that amendments should be submitted in such a way that they might be voted on separately, as the single object of the amendment was to place such institutions under the control of a single board, and provisions incidental thereto would not constitute additional amendments. In People ex rel. Elder v. Sours, 31 Colo. 369, 74 Pac. 167, 102 Am. St. Rep. 34, supra, it was held that a constitutional requirement that each amendment should be separately submitted was not violated by a proposed amendment on the ground that it embraced several subjects where the amendment related to a single object, and that the subjects embraced therein, if several, did not have to be separately submitted, where they were germane to the general subject of the amendment. The amendment there involved provided for the consolidation of the city government of Denver and the county government of Arapahoe county, and contained various provisions touching the rights and duties of the new consolidated government. In State ex rel. Morris v. Mason, 43 La. Ann. 590, 9 South. 776, it was held that propositions auxiliary to the main purpose did not constitute such separate amendments as to require separate submission.

A leading case in which a proposed amendment was held to include within itself several distinct amendments, so that its submission as one was not in accord with the constitutional requirement that if more than one amendment were submitted at one time they should be submitted separately, was that of State ex rel. McClurg v. Powell, 77 Miss. 543, 27 South. 927, 48 L. R. A. 652, supra. There a single amendment to the Constitution was proposed, which made elective the judges of the Supreme, circuit, and chancery courts, and provided for the nomination of judges by districts, who should be voted for by the entire state, and which repealed five existing sections of the Constitution; three of them relating to the appointment of Supreme Court judges for specified terms and to the filling of vacancies, and two of them requiring the districting of the state into circuits and chancery districts, and the appointment by the Governor of such judges. It was held that the various sections of the Constitution sought to be repealed by one amendment dealt with distinct and different subjects, and that the proposed amendment was in effect several amendments consolidated into one. The decision in Rea v. City of La Fayette, 130 Ga. 771, 61 S. E. 707, does not conflict with what is now held. That case arose under a proceeding to validate bonds of a municipality before their issuance. The Constitution limits the power of municipal corporations to incur any new debt, and requires a submission of the question to the voters. A statute provides for such election. It was sought to authorize the issuing of an aggregate amount of bonds, for several distinct purposes, by one submission—in effect the incurring of separate debts. The distinction is clear between such an election and submitting to the voters of the state an amendment to the Constitution.

The Constitution provides that no law shall be passed which refers to more than one subject-matter. Const. art. 3, § 7, par. 8 (Civil Code 1910, § 6437). But it has been held that this did not prevent the Legislature, in connection with the general subject-matter of creating a criminal court, from fixing its jurisdiction and powers, and prescribing the authority of its judge as a judicial officer, and in connection therewith amending previous acts establishing a city court, by withdrawing criminal jurisdiction therefrom. Welborne v. State, 114 Ga. 793 (6), 820, 40 S. E. 857. None of the grounds advanced as reasons why the constitutional amendment under consideration was not lawfully submitted and ratified, so as to become a part of the Constitution, can be sustained.

[10] 10. Treating the amendment as having been constitutionally submitted and ratified, and as having become an integral part of that instrument, we now come to consider whether it is void for any reason asserted by the defendant in error. Three errors pervade the arguments of learned counsel for defendant in error, and doubtless affected the decision of the presiding judge: First, a failure to keep in mind the difference between the power of the Legislature to pass laws, subject to the Constitution of the state and the limitations imposed thereby, and the power of the Legislature to propose and of the people to ratify, in the prescribed method, an amendment to the Constitution; second, a failure to recognize the difference between an effort on the part of the Legislature, or even of a constitutional convention, to overrule or reverse a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, by granting a new trial or destroying rights of persons which have accrued thereunder, and the making of an amendment to the Constitution, whereby the authority to pass an act in reference to a county is conferred on the Legislature, or its previous action is confirmed, thus supplying the constitutional sanction because of the absence of which the previous legislative action has been declared void; and, third, not discriminating between the status of an individual, or a private corporation with its rights of property as an artificial person, and a public corporation, a governmental agency to which has been intrusted the discharge of certain local governmental functions, and which is subject to legislative control, except where restrained by constitutional limitations, and a fortiori is subject to control by the Constitution of the state, unless it be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. If these three points of distinction are carefully borne in mind, they will solve most of the questions which have been raised by the defendant in error.

The Constitution of the state places certain limitations and restrictions upon the action of the Legislature. Acts passed which conflict with the Constitution are invalid. But the Constitution itself may be amended in the manner provided by it; and when an amendment has been duly made, it becomes as much a part of the Constitution as any other part thereof. It can hardly be asserted that one part of the Constitution is unconstitutional, because it is not in perfect accord with another part of the same instrument. The general rule is that constitutional provisions will be harmonized where practicable. If there is to some extent an inconsistency between a provision in the Constitution as originally adopted, and another provision which has been added by amendment, so that one or the other must yield, the subsequent provision, being the last expression of the sovereign will of the people, will prevail as an implied modification pro tanto, rather than be declared void or of no effect because of such partial inconsistency. City of Chicago v. Reeves, 220 Ill. 274, 77 N. E. 237. We do not mean to decide, however, that there is such an inconsistency presented by the amendment under consideration. It would be unprofitable to treat this constitutional amendment as if it were simply an act of the Legislature, and to compare it with prior existing constitutional provisions in detail.

[11] 11. The amendment was further attacked as being violative of the Constitution of the United States. It was contended that it was obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment, which declares that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

[17] A county has been defined to be: "One of the civil divisions of a country for judicial and political purposes, created by the sovereign power of the state of its own will, without the particular solicitation, consent, or concurrent action of the people who inhabit it; a local organization, which, for the purpose of civil administration, is invested with certain functions of corporate existence." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.)

900. In this state it is declared by the Constitution that "each county shall be a body corporate, with such powers and limitations as may be prescribed by law." Const. art. 11, § 1, par. 1 (Civil Code 1910, § 6594). There are also several provisions in regard to the method of changing county lines and county sites, and of dissolving a county and merging it with contiguous counties. Except as limited by the Constitution, counties are public corporations, which do not stand in the position of individuals or private corporations; nor, as against the state, do they own the taxes collected by them and the public property held by them as if it were private property.

[18] The distinction between private and public corporations is well recognized in this state; and, from its earliest Code to that last adopted, each has contained this definition of a public corporation: "A public corporation is one having for its object the administration of a portion of the powers of government, delegated to it for that purpose. Such are municipal corporations." Civil Code 1910, § 2190. If counties were purely legislative creations, they would be entirely subject to legislative enactment. While the power of the Legislature in regard to them is to some extent limited by the state Constitution, they are certainly subject to that Constitution. If they can have any private property at all, as distinct from public property, none is here involved. This is not the case of an individual who is being deprived of his liberty or his property by the public; nor is it the case of a private corporation whose property is being taken.

By amendment to the Constitution the people have commanded one of the counties of the state to make certain payments for public purposes; and the treasurer of the county is contesting the validity of the amendment. As he is a bonded officer, who may be liable for an unlawful payment made from public funds in his hands, we do not hold that he cannot question the legality of the command. But we are calling attention to the fact that the question is substantially between the state and one of its subordinate divisions or governmental corporations, through its official, in considering how the question should be answered.

In Commissioners of Laramie County v. Commissioners of Albany County, 92 U. S. 307, 311, 23 L. Ed. 552, a territorial Legislature organized two new counties and included within their limits a part of the territory of an existing county, but made no provision for apportioning debts or liabilities. It was declared that, "unless the Constitution of a state or the organic law of a territory otherwise prescribes, the Legislature has the power to diminish or enlarge the area of a county, whenever the public convenience or necessity requires;" and it was accordingly held that the old county, on discharging the debts and liabilities previously incurred, had no claim on the new counties for contribution. Mr. Justice Clifford said: "Public duties are required of counties, as well as of towns, as a part of the machinery of the state, and, in order that they may be able to perform those duties, they are vested with certain corporate powers; but their functions are wholly of a public nature, and they are at all times as much subject to the will of the Legislature as incorporated towns, as appears by the best text-writers upon the subject and the great weight of judicial authority. Institutions of the kind, whether called 'counties' or 'towns,' are the auxiliaries of the state in the important business of municipal rule, and cannot have the least pretension to sustain their privileges or their existence upon anything like a contract between them and the Legislature of the state, because there is not and cannot be any reciprocity of stipulation, and their objects and duties are utterly incompatible with everything in the nature of compact."

But it was urged that the requirement that the county of Richmond should pay a certain amount of the salary of the judge of the circuit which included that county, over and above the salaries paid to certain other judges of the superior court, was a deprivation of the equal protection of the law, and an unconstitutional placing of a public burden upon that county, and thus indirectly upon its taxpayers. In Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. Ed. 616, an assessment of certain real estate in New Orleans for draining swamp lands of that city was resisted. The Supreme Court held that "neither the corporate agency by which the work is done, the extensive price which the statute allows therefor, nor the relative importance of the work to the value of the lands assessed, nor the fact that the assessment is made before the work is done, nor that the assessment is unequal as regards the benefits conferred, nor that personal judgments are rendered for the amount assessed, are matters in which the state authorities are controlled by the federal Constitution." In County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 703, 26 L. Ed. 238, an act of the General Assembly of Alabama which provides for the improvement of the Mobile harbor at the expense of the county of Mobile was attacked. In the opinion Mr. Justice Field said: "Here the objection urged is that it fastens upon one county the expense of an improvement for the benefit of the whole state. Assuming this to be so, it is not an objection which destroys its validity. When any public work is authorized, it rests with the Legislature, unless restrained by constitutional provisions, to determine in what manner the means to defray its cost shall be raised. It may apportion the burden ratably among all the counties, or other particular subdivisions of the state, or lay the greater share or the whole upon that county or portion of the state specially and immediately benefited by the expenditure." In Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 657, 13 Sup. Ct. 721, 37 L. Ed. 599, referring to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and its effect upon the state's police and taxing powers, Chief Justice Fuller said: "Nor, in respect of taxation, was the amendment intended to compel the state to adopt an iron rule of equality, to prevent the classification of property for taxation at different rates, or to prohibit legislation in that regard, special either in the extent to which it operates or the objects sought to be obtained by it. It is enough that there is no discrimination in favor of one as against another of the same class." See, also, Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 10 Sup. Ct. 533, 33 L. Ed. 892. In Michigan Central R. Co. v. Powers, 201 U. S. 245, 26 Sup. Ct. 459, 50 L. Ed. 744, it was said: "There is no general supervision by the nation over state taxation, in regard to which the state has, generally speaking, the freedom of a sovereign, both as to objects and methods."

The amendment under consideration did not declare that certain persons should pay a tax, and that others in the same class should be exempted. It did not arbitrarily place the burden of supporting the state government upon certain taxpayers, or even certain counties. It classified certain judicial circuits having in them a county containing a city of not less than a certain population by the census of 1900. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution there were 16 judicial circuits in the state. It was recognized that there were certain inequalities in the business in those circuits and in the labor of the judges. An ordinance was passed which contemplated an equalization as far as practicable. Civil Code 1910, § 6616. Since then by various acts the number of circuits has been increased, and certain changes have been made in the counties included in them. But apparently no complete method of equalization has been found practicable. The Augusta circuit is composed of four counties. Of these Richmond county far exceeds in wealth and population any of the other three. Recognizing the increased business and the consequent increased need for the sitting of the superior court in that county, the Legislature provided for four terms to be held there each year, while in the other counties of the circuit two terms were held. It is to be presumed that the Legislature in proposing the amendment to the Constitution, and the people in ratifying it, found legitimate reason, growing out of the increased population, business, need for additional sessions of court, and demands upon the time and labor of the judge, to put into one class the circuits containing the three largest cities in the state, and to give larger salaries to the judges sitting in them than in other circuits. In the Atlanta and Eastern circuits, the county containing the city constitutes the entire circuit. In the Augusta circuit, there are four counties, as mentioned above. But we cannot say that the recognition of the facts above mentioned and the placing upon that county of a corresponding duty of paying a greater part of the salary than each of the other counties, or not distributing this increase over the entire state, was such an arbitrary exaction, contained in an amendment to the Constitution of the state itself, as could be declared to deprive the county or its treasurer of the equal protection of the laws. There is, of course, some difference between assessments for local improvements and the payment of a part of a salary; but even the improvement of streets, roads, or harbors benefits others besides those who live in the immediate locality where the improvement is made.

It was argued, if such a precedent were set, a two-thirds majority in the Legislature and a mere majority of the voters could impose on any county, city, or set of taxpayers the burden of sustaining the entire state government, or any part of it, at their will, and thus some could make tyrannous exactions of others, to benefit themselves. We cannot accede to the proposition. The difference between such a procedure, and a bona fide classification of judicial circuits on account of population, wealth, business, and requirements of sessions of the court and services of the judge, is apparent. In Grim v. Welsenberg School District, 57 Pa. 433, 98 Am. Dec. 237, Sharswood, J., said that "perfectly equal taxation will remain an unattainable good as long as laws and government and men are imperfect." In Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 5 Sup. Ct. 247, 28 L. Ed. 798, Mr. Justice Miller said: "Perfect uniformity and perfect equality of taxation, in all the aspects in which the human mind can view it, is a baseless dream." With the wisdom or expediency of the amendment this court does not deal. The Legislature and the people have passed upon that.

[12] 12. It was urged with great earnestness that this court had adjudicated that the legislative provision for payment of the additional salary of the judges from the county treasuries was unconstitutional, that the amendment was an effort to override that decision, that this was not keeping the three departments of government distinct, that the judgment operated as an estoppel, and that to now allow a recovery would be violative of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. This argument is based on an apparent misconception of what has transpired. The Legislature undertook to make an increase in the salaries of judges in certain circuits, and to have the increase paid by the counties therein containing cities of not more than a certain population. On account of provisions in the Constitution of the state, this court held that the Legislature could not supplement salaries of the judges of the superior court from county treasuries. Clark v. Hammond, 134 Ga. 792, 68 S. E. 600. Thereupon, not seeking to reverse such adjudication, but recognizing it, the Legislature proposed, and the people ratified, an amendment to the Constitution, by which that was rendered constitutional which previously the Legislature could not constitutionally do. We think it requires no argument beyond this statement to show that the contention is not well founded. Aside from the limitations in a state Constitution, and tested only by the federal Constitution, such curative laws have recently been held valid by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of West Side Belt R. Co. v. Pittsburgh Construction Co., 219 U. S. 92, 31 Sup. Ct. 196, 55 L. Ed. —.

It was argued that this amendment was retroactive, and sought to confirm payments of salaries made before its passage under an unconstitutional act. The Constitution of the United States prohibits the passage of an ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts. Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, par. 1. It does not in terms prohibit retroactive legislation, though such laws may often be invalid as impairing the obligation of contracts, depriving persons of their property without due process of law, or depriving them of the equal protection of the laws. Prohibition of retroactive laws, eo nomine, is a safeguard of the state Constitution against dangerous legislation. In the absence of constitutional restriction, it was held in United States v. Realty Co., 163 U. S. 427, 439, 16 Sup. Ct. 1120, 1125 (41 L. Ed. 215), that Congress has the power to determine whether claims on the public treasury are founded upon moral and honorable obligations, and upon principles of right and justice, and that, having decided such questions in the affirmative, and having appropriated public money for the payment of such claims, its decision can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the government. Mr. Justice Peckham, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We are of the opinion that the parties, situated as were the plaintiffs in these actions, acquired claims upon the government of an equitable, moral, or honorary nature. Could Congress legally recognize and pay them, although the act of 1890 as to its bounty provisions might be unconstitutional? It is true that in general an unconstitutional act of Congress is the same as if there were no act; that is, regarding it in its purely legal aspect. Being in violation of the Constitution, that instrument must govern, and no one can base any legal claim as arising out of such an act. That is a very different principle, however, from that which we think governs in this case." See, also, Guthrie National Bank v. Guthrie, 173 U. S. 528, 19 Sup. Ct. 513, 43 L. Ed. 796; Thompson v. Perrine, 103 U. S. 806, 26 L. Ed. 612. In Thompson v. Lee County, 3 Wall. 827, 18 L. Ed. 177, it was said: "If the Legislature possess the power to authorize an act to be done, it can, by a retroactive act, cure the evils which existed, because the power thus conferred has been irregularly executed." See, also, Board of Commissioners of Tippecanoe County v. Lucas, 93 U. S. 108, 23 L. Ed. 822. In this state the Legislature did not possess the power to make this classification and require this payment from the county treasuries; but the people, through the Constitution, had that power originally, and by an amendment duly made could cure the defect in the legislation.

[13, 14] 13, 14. It was also contended that this amendment impaired the obligation of a contract. Under the acts of the Legislature, a number of payments for salary were made to the judge. The county commissioner by warrants on the county treasurer directed the latter to pay to the judge or his order the amounts thereof on bills audited. Each warrant contained the words, "Subject to any claim of the county," and each was indorsed in obtaining payment. This merely meant that, if the county had a claim against the judge, it should be deducted from the amount of the warrant. It did not constitute a contract to pay back to the county such salary as was paid to him, in case the act of the Legislature under which it was paid should at some future time be declared unconstitutional by the courts. Such claim as the county may have had for restitution, after the act was held unconstitutional, did not rest on express contract. In Essex Public Road Board v. Skinkle, 140 U. S. 334, 11 Sup. Ct. 790, 35 L. Ed. 446, it was held that: "An executive agency, created by a statute of a state for the purpose of improving public highways, and empowered to assess the cost of its improvement upon adjoining lands, and to put up for sale and buy in for a term of years for its own use any such lands delinquent in the payment of the assessment, does not, by such a purchase, acquire a contract right in the land so bought which the state cannot modify without violating the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Such a transaction is matter of law, and not of contract, and as such is not open to constitutional objections."

[15] 15. It was further urged that the amendment was in conflict with the provision of the federal Constitution which guarantees to every state a republican form of government. It cannot be successfully claimed that the state of Georgia will cease to have a republican form of government because, by a constitutional amendment, certain judicial circuits were classified and a provision was made as to them in respect to the payment of the judges of the superior courts. Judge Story, in referring to the power of the states to change their Constitutions or forms, said: "The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican Constitutions." Story on Constitution, § 1817; Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) 237 et seq.

[16] 16: It was contended that the act of 1904, as amended by those of 1905 and 1906, fixed the salary of those judges of the superior courts which were dealt with by them at $5,000 each; that this court so construed such acts in Clark v. Hammond, 134 Ga. 792, 68 S. E. 600, supra; that it was held that the provision for payment from the county treasuries was void, thus leaving the amount fixed to be paid from the treasury of the state; that when the amendment ratified those acts of the Legislature, it did so with the construction which had been placed upon them by the Supreme Court; that, therefore, the salaries being already fixed at $5,000 to be paid from the state treasury, there was no balance between what was to be paid by the state and $5,000 to be paid from the county treasury, either in the past or in the future. This argument is ingenious, but fallacious. We cannot agree to the position that the amendment did nothing, because there was nothing to do. This court did not construe the acts mentioned as fixing a salary of $5,000 to be paid to the judge of the superior court of the Augusta circuit out of the state treasury. We held that the effort by the legislative act to supplement the salaries of the judges of the superior court from county treasuries was unconstitutional. That feature of the act was not such an independent or detached provision as could be eliminated and leave the act to stand as fixing salaries to be paid from the state treasury. It is evident that the Legislature never intended any such enactment, and such a construction would be to make an entirely different legislative scheme from that promulgated by the General Assembly. With the decision that this inherent part of the acts was void, the acts themselves were left without force. The amendment revitalized the acts, established the rule for the future, and ratified what had been done in the past.

This case was not one turning upon contested issues of fact, but was controlled by questions of law. In their solution we have not been able to concur with the trial judge. The mandamus absolute should have been granted. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 135*)—EXECUTION—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—DISMISSAL.

A justice of the peace is a collecting officer, and payment to him of a judgment rendered in his court is good payment. Hence, where an affidavit of illegality is filed to an execution issued upon a judgment rendered on the 9th of May, and it sets up that the affiant paid the amount of the judgment into the hands of the justice of the peace of the district on the 23d day of May of that year, it was error for the justice of the peace to sustain a motion to dismiss the affidavit of illegality on the ground that the defendant was endeavoring to go behind the judgment and was estopped from attacking the judgment on the ground that he had had his day in court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 135.*]

P. Cooley and L. L. Ray, for plaintiff in error. R. L. J. Smith and S. J. Smith, Jr., for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Meaders Bros., it appears, obtained judgment against Tanner and caused garnishment to be issued to Bryan. Bryan admitted indebtedness, and judgment was duly rendered against him on May 9, 1908. Execution was issued on July 27, 1908, upon this judgment, and upon its being levied Bryan filed an affidavit of illegality, setting up that on May 28, 1908, he paid into the hands of the justice of the peace of the district in which the judgment was rendered the full amount of the execution. The plaintiff moved to dismiss this affidavit of illegality upon the ground that the defendant was endeavoring to go back of the judgment and was estopped from attacking the judgment on the ground that he had had his day in court. The justice of the peace sustained this motion and dismissed the affidavit of illegality. The case came to the superior court on certiorari, and in his answer the justice of the peace sets up a great many matters which could not have been made a part of the record in the case, relating to the manner of payment and giving reasons resting wholly outside of the record as to why he had sustained the motion to dismiss the affidavit of illegality. Of course, these recitals as to what the justice of the peace knew about the matter, outside of what was of record in the case, are not proper for consideration, even though they are included in his answer. A justice of the peace cannot cut off the plaintiff's case in limine, and then "answer him out of court," by setting up, in his answer to the certiorari, extraneous matters which he professes to know. It is hardly necessary for us to say that, if the payment was in fact made to the justice of the peace, it was a good payment. A justice of the peace in this state is a collecting officer, and authorized to collect debts sued before him. Lewis v. Smith, 99 Ga. 603, 27 S. E. 162; Gholston v. O'Kelley, 81 Ga. 19, 24, 7 S. E. 107; Johnson v. Hall, 5 Ga. 384. The certiorari should have been sustained in the superior court.

Inasmuch as the magistrate's answer (unexcepted to so far as this point is concerned) failed to verify the allegation in the petition for certiorari that a final judgment of the nature alleged had been rendered, the judge of the superior court did not err in dismissing the certiorari, irrespective of the correctness of the grounds upon which he based his ruling. Landrum v. Moss, 1 Ga. App. 216 (6), 57 S. E. 965. However, the judge of the superior court seems to have made a proper disposition of the matter, irrespective of this technicality.

Action by Charles A. McIntire against the Hartfelder-Garbutt Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Cann, Barrow & McIntire, for plaintiff in error. Oliver & Oliver, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff was injured by the negligent operation of an automobile driven at the time by a Mr. Starr. The only proof of any connection between the defendant and the machine or between the defendant and Starr was contained in a letter which was written by the defendant to the plaintiff's attorney and which was introduced in evidence. So far as material it is as follows: "Replying to your favor of the 19th in reference to Mr. Chas. A. McIntire being struck by our machine being operated by Mr. Starr, beg to say that we provide a machine for our city salesman for business use only. Mr. Starr occupies this position with us. The day he was unfortunate enough to strike Mr. McIntire with the machine, Mr. Starr took this machine without our permission to go to dinner. He was instructed to leave the machine at Bryson's, or Conrad's, I am not exactly sure which. He was going to dinner, and consequently we had no control over him, and while using our machine was doing so without our permission." The court granted a nonsuit, and plaintiff excepts.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error construe this letter as meaning that Starr had been directed by the defendant to take the machine to Bryson's or Conrad's garage, and was on his way there, as well as on his way to dinner, when the injury occurred. We do not so construe the language. It seems to us to mean, when taken in connection with its entire context, that, notwithstanding Mr. Starr had been directed not to take the machine for the purpose of going to dinner, but had been instructed to leave it at the garage, he did the former. With the letter thus construed, it puts the case within the rule announced by this court in the case of Lewis v. Amorous, 8 Ga. App. 50, 59 S. E. 338. This case arose prior to the passage of the automobile act of 1910 (Laws 1910, p. 90), and we have not examined that act to see whether there is anything therein which changes the common-law rule previously in force in this state as to this question. NEW TRIAL (§ 154*)—MOTION TO DISMISS—LACHES.

This court cannot say that there was such an abuse of discretion as to amount to reversible error in the trial judge's dismissing the motion for a new trial for want of prosecution, or in his refusal to reinstate it after the adjournment of the term.

POWELL, J. The exception is to the dismissing of the motion for new trial for want of prosecution, and to the refusal of the judge to reinstate it after the adjournment of the term to which it was set. After carefully considering the facts recited in the bill of exceptions and the record, we are of the opinion that, while counsel for the movant is to be exonerated from all charge of neglect in the prosecution of his motion, and while his failure to press the matter to an earlier hearing was due to his generosity to opposing counsel, on account of the state of the latter's health, still, after the motion had been allowed thus to pend for nearly four years, and until the trial judge had forgotten the facts, it was not an abuse of discretion for him to dismiss the motion, and, even though it appeared that the order of dismissal was improvidently granted on the particular date on which it was granted, still there was no error in refusing to reinstate the motion after the adjournment of the term.

Judgment affirmed.

CONTRACTS (§ 273*)—PARTIAL RESCISSION.

Where a promissory note is given in pursuance of a single contract, expressed in a set of contemporaneous writings, and the person to whom the note is given sues thereon, he cannot, when the opposite party seeks to recoup by setting up damages resulting from the breach of the terms imposed upon the holder of the note under one of the contemporaneous writings, set up that this contemporaneous writing never became binding, because it was made by his agent subject to his confirmation, and he had never confirmed it. Ordinarily, where there is an option to affirm or disaffirm a contract, it relates to the whole contract, and cannot be exercised partially.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1194; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

Error from City Court of Baxley; A. B. Sellers, Judge pro hac.

Action by the Swift Fertilizer Works against J. H. Carter & Co. and another. Verdict for plaintiff, and the defendants named bring error. Reversed.

Wade H. Watson and Jas. R. Thomas, for plaintiffs in error. Parker & Highsmith and Tye, Peeples & Jordan, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The Swift Fertilizer Works sued Carter & Co. as principals and Johnson as surety on a promissory note. The defendants pleaded that this note was given under the following circumstances: The Swift Fertilizer Works had an unsecured debt against an old firm doing business under the name of Carter & Co., but composed of different persons from the partnership here sued; that the new firm agreed that they would give this note, and would give security thereon, if the Swift Fertilizer Works would appoint this new firm its agents for certain designated territory, and would sell to them during the season of 1908 fertilizer at certain specified prices; and that in violation of the contract it had revoked the agency and refused to furnish them fertilizer at the price named, whereby they lost a contemplated profit sufficient to pay off the balance that remained due upon the note, after deducting certain payments which had been made. This contract as to the appointment of the new firm of Carter & Co. as agents was in writing, and executed simultaneously with the note; but it provided on its face that it should not become binding until it had been approved by the manager of the Atlanta office, it being signed merely by the traveling salesman who took the note sued on. It appears that the Swift Fertilizer Works did notify Carter & Co. that they would not perform this written contract, which had been signed by their agent, and therefore declined to ship the fertilizer which Carter & Co. ordered out. There was some evidence as to the extent of the damage which resulted by reason of the plaintiff's failure to fill their order. The court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

It is undoubtedly true that the plaintiff did not become bound by the contract, which its agent had made, until its managing officer confirmed the contract; but it is equally true that, if the note was given merely as a part of a contract of which the agency agreement constituted another part, the plaintiff cannot hold the defendants upon the note without binding itself to the other contract. This agency agreement on its face provided that it should not become binding until it was confirmed, but that when it was confirmed it should be in force as of the date when the note was made. There are no words of confirmation in the record; but actions speak louder than words, and are often much more potent when they break the silence. If the plaintiff has never confirmed this contract, then it has no right to sue upon the notes. Under the circumstances, any attempt to collect the note operated as confirmation just as effectually as any written confirmation could have operated. The contract as submitted to the plaintiff was a proposition of give and take. Under the provisional agreement, the plaintiff had the right to accept or to repudiate the proposition by which it would take the note and give the agency contract; but it cannot act upon the contract for the purpose of taking from the defendants, and then repudiate it so far as giving to the defendants is concerned. This proposition is elementary, and needs no further elaboration.

There is a suggestion that the defendants' proof of the damages which resulted to them in consequence of the plaintiff's breach is too indefinite. It may be that it is too indefinite as to some of the damages claimed; but it is certainly definite enough as to a part of them, and the court by the direction of the verdict ignored this entirely. It is proper that we should notice another exception, which relates to the rejection of testimony of the defendants that they had sold this fertilizer at a profit of $2.50 a ton, and that it was contemplated at the time of the making of the contract that they should resell it at this amount of profit. The evidence was doubtless excluded on the ground that this would be an attempt to add to the writing, which was silent on this subject. This was a matter with which the contract did not attempt to deal at all, and the evidence was admissible. It did not vary the contract, and it tended to make out one of the elements of the defendants' case, namely, that the damage which they had suffered through the loss of this profit was in contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made.

count of the price of 36 stone window sills, of the value of $3 each. There is but little dispute as to the facts, and the case involves the construction of a course of correspondence and of certain letters which took place in connection therewith. On July 9, 1909, the plaintiff received from the defendant the following letter: "Please ship to S. A. Rogers 36 window sills of the following dimensions and finish: 3—6 long, 5x8"—4 cut top and face quoted by you to us at $3 apiece. Bill these to him at $3.25 each, and you can remit us $3 as soon as he pays you. Mr. Rogers, we are pretty sure, is all right. He is a contractor here, and does quite a large business; but if you do not care to ship them to him open, you can ship with B/L attached. We do not care to assume the responsibility for the payment of this bill for the amount we are to receive as a compensation. If you decide to ship with the B/L attached, notify Mr. Rogers. However, you can proceed with the order, as they want the sills as soon as they can get them." To which the plaintiff replied: "Your favor of 7—9—09 received this morning, ordering 36 window sills of the following dimensions and finish: 3—6 long 5"x8"—4 cut top and face, the same to be shipped to Mr. Rogers at $3.25 each, 25 cents each to go to you, we understand. We will begin work on them at once, and when finished will ship to Mr. Rogers with B/L attached. As you are on the ground and know Mr. Rogers, and don't care to assume the responsibility, we had rather not take the risk. Do you desire us to write Mr. Rogers and state to him that we are cutting the sills for him and will ship B/L attached? We thank you very much for this order, and will appreciate any work you place with us, assuring you that we are ready and willing to allow you a certain per cent. on all work placed through you with us." The plaintiff shipped the sills to itself as consignee, "order notify" S. A. Rogers, and attached the bill of lading to a sight draft, and sent it to a bank in the defendant's city for collection. It turned out that Rogers had ordered only 12 sills, and on the 29th of July the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, telling of the mistake that had been made in transmitting the order, and asking that the plaintiff would wire the agent of the railroad company to let Rogers pay for 12 of the sills, and stating that the defendant would dispose of the balance for the plaintiff. What action was taken upon this letter does not appear. On the 27th of August the defendant again wrote the plaintiff as follows: "In regards to the sills here for Rogers, will state this to you: Rogers wants to pay for one dozen of these, including freight and demurrage. We can possibly dispose of the others here for you soon. We will do this without any compensation from you, and will see that Rogers takes up the draft for one dozen and pays freight and demurrage at once, if this suits you. As we wrote you in the beginning that we would not assume any obligations in the matter, we do not feel like advancing this additional amount. If this will suit you, notify the bank here to let him pay for one dozen at the price sold, and you need not remit us anything, and we will dispose of the other for you at the same price, charging you no commission at all." To which the plaintiff replied: "Answering your favor of the 27th inst., beg to state that in the first place you have not treated us right in this matter. At this time, though, we have not got the time to spare in forcing payment in full for the stone shipped according to your order. We note that you are willing to pay at this time for 12 of the sills, and pay all freight and demurrage on the full amount, and would soon dispose of the balance and remit for them free of any charges to us. We are, under the circumstances, willing to accede to this proposition, with the full understanding that we are looking to you for the payment of all this stone, and do not know Rogers in the transaction, only as the man you directed us to ship the stone to. This will be your authority to the bank to allow payment for 12 of the sills, $39, and you pay all freight and demurrage charges on all the stone, and you to take the other sills and dispose of them soon and remit." It further appears that Rogers acted upon the direction of the defendant company, and took and used 12 of the sills, and that he got them without the consent of the carrier; that the bill of lading was never taken up from the bank and surrendered to the carrier; that the carrier's charges were unpaid, and the remaining 24 sills of stone were sold for charges and bought in by Rogers. At some time during these transactions (the exact date not being disclosed by the evidence) the plaintiff's representative called upon the defendant's manager and asked for a settlement. The defendant's manager gave to the plaintiff's representative Rogers' check for $39, which paid for 12 of the stone sills which Rogers had used, and said that he had been trying to dispose of the remainder, and had failed to do so, but would go to Savannah in a few days and dispose of the remainder and remit.

On this state of affairs the court charged the jury that under the letter first quoted above (the initial letter of the correspondence) the defendant assumed no liability; and in this we think that the court was correct, at least so far as reference to direct and primary liability was concerned. In regard to the letter written by the defendant to the plaintiff on August 27th, and the plaintiff's reply thereto, the court charged the jury the sections of the Code which provide that mutuality of assent is an essential of a contract, and that where a proposal is made by a letter and the proposal contains alternative propositions, the receiver of the letter may elect as to which he will accept.

Following the quotation of these sections, the court instructed the jury as follows: "Now, it is for you to say in this case what election was made by defendant in this case as to this letter here of August 8th from the Granite City Crush Stone Company. If they elected in this case to pay for those 12 and turn them over to Mr. Rogers and pay the freight and demurrage on them, and they elected also to pay the freight and demurrage on all of it and dispose of the others, why, they would be bound by that contract. It is for you to say whether or not they undertook to turn over these 12 and hold the other there liable, and pay the freight and demurrage on the other; and you find from the evidence whether or not they did that." We understand this instruction (as to which one of the exceptions in the record relates) as meaning that the plaintiff's letter in reply to the defendant's communication of August 27th contained an alternative proposition, and that under it the defendant had the right either to pay for 12 of the sills, together with the demurrage and freight on them, without being further bound, or to take the entire shipment, becoming bound accordingly. The court then further instructed the jury that before the defendant would be bound upon the contract, further than for the price of the 12 sills, which had already been paid for, it would have to appear that the plaintiff turned over the bill of lading to the defendant, since the title to the property had been reserved through the bill of lading with the draft attached. The jury thereupon found for the defendant, as it was not disclosed from the evidence what had become of the bill of lading.

We think that the court was in error in construing the plaintiff's letter in answer to the defendant's communication of August 27th as containing an alternative proposition. In our opinion it contained but one proposition, single and entire in its nature. Under that letter, when the defendant took 12 of the sills and delivered them to Rogers, it became bound to take all of the stone and to pay for it. It could not take a part and refuse to take a part. It is true that the bill of lading was retained by the bank as agent for the plaintiff; but the letter itself contained authority to the bank to turn over the bill of lading upon payment for 12 of the sills, and as the evidence does not show what became of the bill of lading, and as there is no plea that the plaintiff or the bank, as its agent, refused to turn over the bill of lading, it is to be presumed that the defendant merely neglected to take it up and to present it to the railroad company, and thereby allowed such of the sills as it did not move to be sold for the freight. It is apparent that many of the facts relating to the transaction are undisclosed. The defendant's manager, who handled the transaction at his end of the line, was not produced as a witness, and it is not shown exactly or in what manner he got possession of the 12 sills which he did deliver; but it is sufficiently plain that he acted under the letter to the extent of taking charge of at least 12 of the sills, and thereby rendered his company at least primarily bound upon the contract, and as no act on the plaintiff's part sufficient to discharge this prima facie liability is shown or pleaded, the verdict in the defendant's favor was unauthorized.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 202*)—CERTIORARI—APPROVAL OF BOND.

The judgment of the superior court, dismissing the certiorari because the certiorari bond did not show on its face, or by any other written evidence, that it had been approved by the judicial officer before whom the case was tried in the first instance, is fully controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Dykes v. Twiggs County, 115 Ga. 698, 42 S. E. 36, and the decisions therein cited. The approval of the bond by the clerk of the court is not such an approval as the law requires. Where the application for the writ of certiorari is not applied for in forma pauperis, the plaintiff must file with his petition with the clerk of the superior court a bond, as required by Civil Code (1910), § 5185, approved in writing by the judicial officer or officers whose judgment it is sought to review; otherwise, the clerk has no authority of law to issue the writ of certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 782*)—INSTRUCTIONS—POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE TESTIMONY—WEIGHT.

An instruction to the effect that "positive testimony outweighs negative testimony, the witnesses being equally credible," sufficiently qualifies a charge upon the subject of positive and negative testimony in which the jury are told that "the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is rather to be believed than that such fact did not exist because many witnesses who had the same opportunity of observation swore that they did not see or know of its having transpired." If the witnesses are of equal credibility and have a like opportunity of observation, positive testimony should outweigh that which is merely negative; and it is not error so to instruct the jury in a case where some of the testimony is plainly merely negative in its character.

Error from City Court of Dublin; K. J. Hawkins, Judge.

Earl Wood was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. S. Adams, for plaintiff in error. W. O. Davis and Geo. B. Davis, Sols., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The writ of error complains of the overruling of a motion for new trial in which the only ground which could be strongly insisted upon here is that the judge erred in charging the jury in the language of section 1011 of the Penal Code (1910), with the single explanation that "positive testimony outweighs negative testimony, the witnesses being equally credible." While it is true, as was held in the case of Peak v. State, 5 Ga. App. 56, 62 S. E. 665, that it is error to instruct the jury upon the subject of positive and negative testimony except in a very clear case, and that then they should never be instructed upon this subject, except when they are told in effect that the testimony of one credible witness swearing negatively may outweigh the testimony of a witness who testifies positively, and yet who is unworthy of belief, still we think the instruction of the judge in the present instance covered the only substantial principle enunciated in the Peak Case. The credibility of the witnesses is exclusively for the jury. Ordinarily the conflict arises over the credibility of the witnesses. If the witnesses are equally credible, certainly every rule of law and logic would require that the witness who knew and asserted his knowledge of the facts should be believed in preference to a witness who did not know and confessed his ignorance of the truth of an alleged occurrence.

We are aware that there are other things besides the personal credibility of the witnesses which may affect the equation, and yet, in the broad sense, all of these circumstances are included in the general expression "the credibility of the witness." This includes any kind of corroboration arising from other testimony, as well as circumstances of any nature in the case which might tend to make the testimony of one witness more credible than that of another; for if, after every circumstance, of whatever nature it may be, has been scanned and dissected, the jury come to the conclusion that the witnesses are of equal credibility, then common sense would require that they should give preference to the positive testimony of a credible witness, rather than to the negative testimony of a witness not more credible than the first.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 230*)—SALE BY MORTGAGOR—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

In order for a mortgagor's sale of mortgaged property to be an offense, under section 720 of the Penal Code of 1910, three essential facts must appear: (1) That the sale was made without the consent of the mortgagee; (2) that it was made with intent to defraud the mortgagee; and (3) that loss was thereby sustained by the holder of the mortgage. Reece v. State, 5 Ga. App. 663, 63 S. E. 670, and cases there cited. The evidence in this case is not clear as to the first essential stated; but it is shown that, even if the sale of the property was made, it was made without any intent to defraud the mortgagee, and that the mortgagee in fact sustained no loss thereby. Denny v. State, 2 Ga. App. 146, 58 S. E. 318.

CRAPPS v. SMITH. (No. 3,229.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 99)—CUSTODY OF MINOR CHILD.

While ordinarily it is the rule that in habeas corpus cases brought to determine the custody of a child the personal fitness of the respective contestants is a material element, still under the particular circumstances of this case there was no error in the court's confining the issue to the question of the child's age.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. MARRIAGE (§ 5*)—HABEAS CORPUS (§ 99*)—VALIDITY—FEMALE UNDER 14 YEARS.

A female under the age of 14 cannot contract matrimony; and where a child under that age has run away from her father and gone through the form of a marriage ceremony, and her father sues out habeas corpus to recover the child from the man she has attempted to marry, it is no sufficient answer on the latter's part that the girl's father had treated her cruelly.

Error from City Court of Baxley; W. C. Lankford, Judge.

Habeas corpus by Dennis Smith against Marvin Crapps. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

V. E. Padgett, for plaintiff in error. Parker & Highsmith, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The contest is over the custody of a girl. She had run away and gone through the form of a marriage with a young man, when her father brought habeas corpus against the young man, alleging that the girl was only 13 years of age, and that the attempted marriage was void. The respondent set up that the girl was more than 14 years old, and that the marriage was legal. He further set up that the girl's father has mistreated her, but this portion of the answer was stricken, and the issue was confined by the court to the sole question as to whether the girl was as much as 14 years old; and this ruling of the court is made the basis for the chief exception contained in the record.

[2] The evidence as to the girl's age was very conflicting, but the judge settled this conflict by finding that she was not 14 years old, and thereupon awarded her to the custody of the father. A female under the age of 14 cannot contract marriage. Civil Code 1910, § 2931. Any attempt on her part to do so is wholly void. Smith v. Smith, 84 Ga. 440, 11 S. E. 496, 8 L. R. A. 362. For the contracting parties to live together would be fornication, and would be punishable as such. The finding of the trial judge that the girl is less than 14 years old must be accepted as the truth of the case; and, this being so, it was undoubtedly proper for the court to refuse to award her to the custody of the young man. The young couple seem to be very much in love, the intentions of both seem to be entirely honorable, and the proper thing for them to do is to wait until next winter, when she will unquestionably be 14, and then go back together, and, as it is customary to phrase it, "live together happy ever afterward." This will ratify the former attempt at matrimony and render it a legal marriage. Murchison v. Green, 128 Ga. 339, 57 S. E. 709, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 702; Smith v. Smith, supra.

[1] As to the exception to the court's refusal to let the respondent show that the girl's father had mistreated her: It is true that ordinarily, when habeas corpus is brought to determine the custody of a child, the court has a broad discretion, and may award it even to a stranger; the best interest of the child being the paramount consideration. Hence it is usually material and proper for one of the parties to show that the other is unfit for the custody; but we seriously doubt that either of the contestants can except to the court's refusal to give the child to an outsider. The present case is exceptional. If the girl was under 14, the court certainly could not award her to the custody of the respondent. That would have been a gross abuse of discretion. To restore her to parental control would not prevent investigation into the father's fitness in any other proceeding brought for the determination of that question. Therefore we think that in the present case the court did not err in confining the issue to the question of the girl's age.

(Syllabus by the Court.)APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 549)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — PRESENTATION OF EXCEPTIONS — JUDGMENT.

Though the omission is apparently due to an oversight, the main bill of exceptions does not contain any distinct or express exception to the judgment rendered by the lower court, or assignment of error thereon. This court is without jurisdiction to consider the writ of error, and the main bill of exceptions must be dismissed. This disposition of the main bill of exceptions renders the determination of the cross-bill unnecessary, and it is therefore dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2441-2451; Dec. Dig. § 549.*]

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reld, Judge.

Action between W. C. Elrod and B. M. & L. F. Grant. From a judgment of nonsuit, Elrod brings error, and the Grants assign cross-bill. Main bill of exceptions and cross-bill dismissed.

C. W. Smith and M. A. Hale, for plaintiff in error. Candler, Thomson & Hirsch and Ogburn, Dorsey & Shelton, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. In the main bill of exceptions filed in this case the full history of the litigation between the plaintiff in error and the defendants in error is incorporated in the bill of exceptions, which contains a copy of the original petition and a copy of the answer of the defendant, as well as a brief of the evidence submitted. It is related in the bill of exceptions that at the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the presiding judge granted a nonsuit in the following order:

"Upon the conclusion of the evidence of the plaintiff and a motion to grant a nonsuit by the defendants, said motion is granted and case withdrawn from jury, with cost against plaintiff. This May 31, 1910.

"H. M. Reid,

"Judge City Court of Atlanta."

Immediately following this the bill of exceptions proceeds as follows:

"(1) The testimony made out a case that should have been submitted to the jury as to the liability of the landlords, they being in possession of the second floor.

"(2) The testimony showed negligence on part of the landlords, because of leaving the doors and windows open, and because of defective plumbing.

"(3) Plaintiff in error had no control of the second floor or the cut-off thereon. These issues of fact should have been submitted to the jury.

"(4) And now comes the defendant, W. O. Elrod, within 30 days from the date of the order granting a nonsuit, and presents this his bill of exceptions, and prays that the same may be signed and certified, in order that the errors complained of may be considered and corrected."

There is nowhere any exception to the judgment rendered. It is not stated that the court erred in entering a judgment of nonsuit. Three of the paragraphs which we have quoted above could perhaps be properly treated as assignments of error, and it is to be inferred, by supplying a very material ellipsis, that the plaintiff in error intends to except to the judgment as a whole as an error; but it is manifest that there is no expressed or distinct exception to the judgment finally rendered, considered as an entity and as the conclusion of the whole matter. In any case there may be some reasons which would have required a judgment different from that which was rendered, and yet this may be completely overmastered and obliterated by some controlling fact or principle of law which required the result which was reached. Whether the judgment of which it is sought to complain is one necessarily dependent upon some antecedent ruling which controlled it, or upon the grant or refusal to grant a motion for new trial, or concerns a ruling of the court which itself finally disposes of the case without submission to a jury, it must in every case be alleged that the plaintiff in error excepts to the judgment; that is, complains of it. After taking exception to the judgment generally, the plaintiff in error is then required plainly and specifically to set forth, or point out, the errors alleged to have been committed. Where it is sought to assign error upon a final judgment, it is ruled by the Supreme Court in Lyndon v. Georgia Railway & Electric Company, 129 Ga. 353-357, 58 S. E. 1047, 1049, exception must be taken to the judgment finally rendered, as well as the specific reasons why it is erroneous be stated. "If error inherent in the judgment itself is complained of, not only should it be excepted to, but the assignment should specify the error."

In the present case the statements of the plaintiff in error as to why the case should have been submitted to the jury would perhaps have been good as assignments of error, if they had been related to some exception; but (apparently due to an oversight) the judgment itself is not excepted to. Under the provisions of section 6140 of the Civil Code of 1910, as construed by the ruling of the Lyndon Case, supra, it is not only required that the plaintiff in error shall plainly and specifically set forth the errors alleged to have been committed, but he must primarily assert that the judgment rendered was error injurious to his cause. He must except to it. Certain specific assignments of error might be valid; but if there is no exception to the judgment it would have to be assumed that there were sufficient reasons authorizing the grant of the judgment rendered which prevented the plaintiff in error from being able to show the court that the errors of which he complained really injured him, or that he was in fact dissatisfied with the final judgment. To authorize a reversal of the judgment of a lower court, not only error, but injury, must be shown. Without regard to our personal views, we are of the opinion that the ruling in the Lyndon Case, supra, which requires a general exception to the judgment rendered, as well as specific assignments of error thereunder, leaves us no option except to sustain the motion to dismiss the present writ of error.

The disposition given to the main bill of exceptions renders the consideration of the cross-bill unnecessary; and it is also dismissed.

Main bill of exceptions and cross-bill dismissed.

MILLEDGEVILLE COTTON CO. v. CARY.
(No. 3,150.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)SALES (§ 418)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

The courts will not construe a contract, so as to allow one of the parties to take advantage of his own wrongful breach thereof, unless it be plain and manifest that such was the intention of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1174-1201; Dec. Dig. § 418.*]

Error from City Court of Sparta; R. W. Moore, Judge.

Action by the Milledgeville Cotton Company against C. S. Cary. From the judgment, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Burwell & Fleming and Hines & Vinson, for plaintiff in error. R. L. Merritt, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. On August 31, 1909, Cary made a binding contract with the Milledgeville Cotton Company to deliver 50 bales of cotton between October 1 and November 15, 1909, at the price of 12 cents per pound. One clause of the contract provided that, if Cary should "dispose of any part of his crop before the contract is filled, then the entire number of bales due under this contract shall become due." Cary wholly failed to deliver the cotton. The difference between the contract price and the market price on November 15th was 2½ cents per pound in the buyer's favor. Cary made no denial of the contract, but set up, in defense to the suit brought to recover this difference, that on September 16, 1909, he sold a part of his crop, and that on that date the difference between the contract price and the market price was only one-half cent per pound in the buyer's favor, and that as, under the terms of the contract, if he disposed of any of the cotton before carrying out the contract, the entire amount should become deliverable at once, the damages for the breach should be assessed on the basis of this one-half cent per pound, instead of upon the basis of 2½ cents per pound, which came about by reason of the fact that the market price continued to rise. The evidence was practically undisputed, and the court charged the jury that, if they found that Cary sold a part of his crop on the 16th of September, they should assess the damages on the basis of the market price as of that date. It was proved without contradiction that this sale had taken place, and it was not shown that the Milledgeville Cotton Company had any knowledge of it; but, on the contrary, it was shown that during the life of the contract the company continued to demand the cotton. The jury assessed the damage in favor of the plaintiff at the rate of one-half cent per pound, and the plaintiff excepts.

We think that the court erred in allowing the defendant to take advantage of his own wrongful breach of the contract. Under what we conceive to be a proper construction of the contract, the provision which related to Cary's disposing of any part of his crop before he fulfilled the contract gave to the plaintiff, and not to the defendant, the right to insist upon immediate delivery of all the cotton, as soon as that act took place. The plaintiff had the right to waive the defendant's breach in this respect, and, according to the evidence, did so by continuing to demand the fulfillment of the contract. It may be that if the defendant had renounced the contract, and had given the plaintiff notice of his renunciation, an anticipatory breach would have occurred, of such a nature as to make the day of the renunciation the day on which the damages should be measured; but in this case no notice to the plaintiff was shown. On the general question involved, the case of Finlay v. Ludden & Bates, 105 Ga. 264, 31 S. E. 180, is strongly in point. As the Supreme Court there said: "The law will not construe a contract so as to give the debtor the right to destroy it by a simple refusal to comply with it, unless the terms of the contract are so clear and unambiguous as to make irresistible the conclusion that no other result could possibly be reached, and that such was the intention of the parties. Civil Code, § 3675, par. 4 (Civil Code 1910, § 4268). Nor will a contract be so construed as to authorize one of the parties to take advantage of his own wrong, unless it be plain and manifest that such was the intention of the parties." The evidence demanded a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the full amount sued for.

Judgment reversed.

GELDERS v. KENNEDY et al. (No. 3,139.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)(Syllabus by the Court.)BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

The legal title to a promissory note was in one person, but the equitable title was in another, who in fact physically held it. The maker of the note was aware of the relationship existing between the person to whom the note was payable on its face and the person who held it. The note called for attorney's fees. The person who thus held it gave statutory notice in the usual form that suit would be brought on the note and that attorney's fees would be claimed if the debt were not paid before the return day of the court. The suit was instituted in the name of him who held the equitable title only; but, pursuant to a ruling of the court invoked by a demurrer of the defendant, the plaintiff amended the action, so that it should proceed in the name of the holder of the legal title for the use and benefit of him (the holder of the equitable title, the real prosecutor of the action). Held, that the notice as to attorney's fees was adequate to charge the defendant with liability therefor, notwithstanding the amendment.

Error from City Court of Fitzgerald; E. Wall, Judge.

Action by L. Kennedy and others, executors, for use, against Isador Gelders. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. B. Wall, for plaintiff in error. L. Kennedy and O. H. Elkins, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. Gelders had executed a note payable "to the order of E. W. Ryman, executor of C. L. Blystone's estate." Ryman died, and L. Kennedy succeeded to the executorship on the estate of Blystone, and brought suit upon the note. The case came to this court, and it is reported sub nom. Kennedy v. Gelders, 7 Ga. App. 241, 66 S. E. 620. It was held in that case that the note was apparently payable to Ryman individually, and that the executor on his estate, and not his successor in the office of executor of the estate of Blystone, was the proper plaintiff, but that, since it was alleged that the consideration of the note was money belonging to the estate of Blystone and loaned to the defendant by Ryman as executor, an amendment would be allowable substituting the name of Ryman's executor, suing for the use of Blystone's executor as plaintiff. Upon the remittitur from this court being filed in the trial court, an amendment of this nature was made, and the case proceeded to trial in this form. The note called for attorney's fees. The notice required by our statute for the fixing of the liability for attorney's fees was given to the defendant in the name of L. Kennedy, as executor of the estate of Blystone, and was signed by his attorneys. The court, in directing the verdict in the case, directed a finding for attorney's fees, as well as for principal and interest, and the point now made is that, since the suit was finally converted by the amendment from a suit on the part of L. Kennedy as executor of the estate of C. L. Blystone to a suit of L. Kennedy and Lula B. Ryman, as executors of the estate of E. W. Ryman, for the use and benefit of L. Kennedy as executor of the estate of C. L. Blystone, the notice was inadequate to charge the defendant with liability for attorney's fees.

Statutory notice for the purpose of fixing liability for attorney's fees should disclose who is the holder of the note, and who it is that intends to bring suit, and to whom the payment should be made; and if the notice is so worded as to mislead, or as to be likely to mislead, the defendant in material respects as to these features, it is inadequate. Baskins v. Bank of Valdosta, 5 Ga. App. 600, 63 S. E. 648; Edenfield v. Bank of Millen, 7 Ga. App. 645, 67 S. E. 893. In the present case the notice did disclose who was the holder of the note, so far as the physical holding and equitable title was concerned, and it was given in the name of the person who actually did institute the action. It is true that it afterwards became necessary, in order to comply with a rule of pleading, that an amendment should be made, substituting the name of the holder of the legal title of the note as nominal plaintiff; but this same person who had originally instituted the suit was retained as the usee. It further appears that the maker of the note knew and understood the manner in which the note was held and had recognized the usee as the owner of the note by making payments thereon to him. Under these circumstances, we think that the statute was sufficiently complied with.

There is a motion to assess damages for delay; but we think that this question was sufficiently doubtful, in view of the rulings made on the particular facts of the case just stated, to justify the plaintiff in error in bringing the case to this court; so the motion to assess damages for delay is denied, but the judgment is affirmed.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Action by the West Yellow Pine Company against S. L. Kendrick. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Woodward & Smith and Denmark & Griffin, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Whitaker and O. M. Smith, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Kendrick executed to one Griffith an instrument whereby Kendrick agreed to pay to W. A. Griffith, or order, a certain sum of money. In the instrument it was recited that the indebtedness was for the purchase price of certain mules, and that the title to the mules was not to pass to the purchaser until the indebtedness was paid. The instrument was duly witnessed and recorded. On the back of the instrument were found the following entries: "Without recourse. W. A. Griffith. I. L. Griffith." "Georgia, Lowndes County. For value received we hereby transfer the within paper to West Yellow Pine Company, without recourse. This July 3, 1908. Citizens' Bank of Valdosta, by J. F. Lewis, Pres." The West Yellow Pine Company brought suit in trover for the recovery of the property from the purchaser, who had failed to pay the indebtedness. At the trial this note and the entries thereon were introduced in evidence, and Mr. Lewis, president of the Citizens' Bank of Valdosta, testified that the bank bought the notes from W. A. Griffith, and that he and I. L. Griffith merely indorsed their names upon the back of the notes, and that the words "without recourse" were not then written upon them, but that afterward, when he, as president of the bank, again sold the paper, he wrote these words, "without recourse," upon the back of the paper and above the signatures of the Messrs. Griffith. The plaintiff attempted to prove by this witness that his object and intention in writing these words above the signatures of the Messrs. Griffith was to effectuate the object of the transferring of the indebtedness and the title to the property to the West Yellow Pine Company, but on condition that neither the Messrs. Griffith nor the bank should be held liable upon the indebtedness as indorsers. The court excluded this testimony, and there is an exception as to this ruling. There being no further evidence, the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepts.

[1] We recognize, as the Supreme Court itself recognizes (see the comments of Mr. Justice Evans in Townsend v. Southern Product Co., 127 Ga. 342, 344, 56 S. E. 436, 119 Am. St. Rep. 340), that as to the general question here involved there is a conflict in the decisions of the Supreme Court. The case of Cade v. Jenkins, 88 Ga. 791, 15 S. E. 292, and cases following it, are in conflict with Burch v. Pedigo, 113 Ga. 1157, 39 S. E. 493, 54 L. R. A. 808, and cases following it. Cade v. Jenkins is the oldest case, and is controlling so far as it goes, and the late case of Townsend v. Southern Product Co., supra, seems to recognize that that case expresses the correct rule. This court, in the case of Dawson v. English, 8 Ga. App. 585, 69 S. E. 1133, undertook to distinguish Burch v. Pedigo on the ground that the note involved in that case was made prior to Acts 1899, p. 90, as well as upon the fact that the assignment in that case related to the indebtedness alone, and not to the paper as a whole. In the decisions of the Supreme Court which are in conflict with the case of Cade v. Jenkins, the act of 1899, embodied in Civil Code 1910, § 3345 et seq., is not referred to. It is not necessary for us to decide in this case as to what effect follows where purchase-money notes reserve title in the payee of the notes, and the notes alone are transferred "without recourse"; for, in this case, we construe the transfer as relating, not merely to the indebtedness, but also to the title reserved in the original payee of the instrument. The indorsements of the Messrs. Griffith are silent as to this; but the indorsement of the bank states that "the within paper is transferred," and as the paper to which the transfer related was not merely a note, but was also an instrument reserving title, we think that the only fair construction to give to the act of the parties is to say that it was their intention to transfer, not merely the indebtedness, but also the title to the property. In this view of the case, our decision in Dawson v. English, supra, is controlling.

[2] 2. Of course, we are not unmindful of the fact that, if the prior indorsements had operated to divest the title of the holder of the paper as to the property and to vest it in Kendrick, the indorsement of the bank would not be effectual to transfer any title, so that it is necessary for us to decide as to the effect of these prior indorsements. Civil Code 1910, § 5796, provides: "Blank indorsements of negotiable paper may always be explained between the parties themselves, or those taking with notice of dishonor or of the actual facts of such indorsements." An indorsement in blank usually consists of the indorser's writing his name on the back of the paper; but it does not become an "indorsement in full" until the name of a payee is inserted. In the present case the indorsement in blank had been partially completed by the subsequent indorser writing the words "without recourse." The indorsement, therefore, had not become an indorsement in full, but still suffered from the same character of ambiguity as inheres in an indorsement in blank. The words "without recourse," followed by the signature of the payee, did not make a complete indorsement; hence parol testimony was admissible to explain that the intention was that the title to the property, as well as to the indebtedness, should pass, but that the transferror should not become liable as an indorser upon the evidence of indebtedness.

Wm. H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error. E. L. Brinson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Gibson held a note, secured by a deed to realty, against Ward. He sent the note to an attorney at Waynesboro, Ga., with instructions to collect the debt. The attorney represented another lender of money, and Ward, through the attorney, made application to this third person for the loan of an amount slightly more than sufficient to take up Gibson's debt. (The old note amounted to about $700, and he applied for a loan of $800.) Ward drew a draft in favor of the attorney on the person with whom this loan was negotiated, for $800, and turned it over to a clerk in the attorney's office for the purpose of paying Gibson's debt from the proceeds. In response to this draft, the lender sent to the attorney a check, payable to the attorney, for $800. The attorney placed the lender's check to his own account at the bank. Soon afterward the attorney died, without ever paying over the amount to Gibson. Gibson sued Ward upon the note. Ward pleaded payment, and, with the foregoing facts appearing, the court directed a verdict for the defendant. We think the correct legal result was reached. Payment to Gibson's attorney, who had special authority to collect, was payment to Gibson. That this is the ordinary rule is conceded; but it is insisted that no payment was made, and that when Ward turned the draft over to the attorney, and when the new lender sent his check for $800 to the attorney, the attorney held the sum as agent for Ward, and not for Gibson, and that no payment was effectuated, because there was no segregation or setting apart of that portion of the draft and of the check which was to go to Gibson.

Able counsel for the plaintiff in error asserts that the solution of the question depends upon whether Ward could have demanded the $800 of the attorney when the check for that sum came into his hands, and we think that this assertion is correct; but we do not assent to his minor premise that Ward could have demanded it. The draft which Ward turned over to the attorney was turned over as an act of payment, and while a draft is not payment until it itself is paid, still in this case the draft was paid, and hence became payment. Civ. Code 1910, § 4314. As the draft was paid, it seems to us that the case stands just as if Ward had turned over to the attorney eight $100 bills, with the request that his debt to Gibson be paid out of it, and with direction to hold the remainder to his credit; and we do not think that Ward could have demanded any portion of the money back, except whatever surplus might have remained after paying the Gibson debt. While the attorney may, in a certain sense, have been a dual agent, or even a triple agent, so to speak (as he seems to have represented Gibson, Ward, and the person from whom Ward borrowed the money to pay Gibson), still the special circumstances did not make his so acting improper or unlawful, as none of his duties, under the circumstances, were in conflict.

ROCKMORE v. GARNER. (No. 3,086.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION (§ 207*)—CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY—FORTHCOMING BOND—LIABILITY.

Where an execution is levied upon property, and a third person files claim thereto and executes a forthcoming bond, and upon trial of the claim case the property is found subject, and thereafter the property is duly advertised for sale and is not produced, a breach of the bond ensues; and the constable to whom the forthcoming bond has been given, suing for use of the plaintiff in execution, may recover upon the forthcoming bond, notwithstanding that the property has been taken in the meantime from the possession of the claimant under the levy of a fi. fa. against a stranger to the litigation, unless it appears that the process under which the property was seized in the second instance was superior to the execution first levied upon the property, or that the property was in fact subject to seizure under the second execution.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by N. A. Garner, for use of one Brown, against M. L. Rockmore. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Thos. B. Brown, for plaintiff in error. Scott & Davis, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. A fi. fa. in favor of Brown was levied on property of W. L. Rockmore, and M. L. Rockmore filed claim and gave forthcoming bond. After the property was found subject upon trial of the claim case, the constable advertised it for sale, and it was not produced. The constable, for the use of Brown as plaintiff in fi. fa., sued on the forthcoming bond. In defense to this action it was set up that, while the claimant was in possession of the property, it was seized under a distress warrant in favor of a Mrs. Goodrum against the Kola Company. To a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action on the bond the present exception is taken.

A prima facie breach of the bond is conceded; but it is said that the defense is good, because the failure to produce property under a forthcoming bond is sufficiently excused by showing that performance was rendered impossible, either by the act of the obligee in the bond, by interference of the law, or by an act of God. We recognize the general correctness of the proposition of law asserted. Floyd v. Cook, 118 Ga. 526, 45 S. E. 441, 63 L. R. A. 450; Allen v. Allen, 119 Ga. 278, 45 S. E. 959. A familiar application of the principle is where a defendant in fi. fa. has given a forthcoming bond, and the property is afterwards levied on by another process superior to the execution originally levied; but wherever the defendant in an action on such a bond attempts to set up the act of the law as an excuse for noncompliance with the condition of the bond, he has the burden of showing that the process by which the property was taken from his possession was legally adequate for that purpose. In the case before us there is no evidence whatever that the constable who levied the distress warrant on the property as the property of the Kola Company had any right to do so. The Kola Company was, so far as the record shows, an entire stranger to the transaction. If the levy was rightful, under the circumstances, the defendant has utterly failed to show it. Hence he failed to make good his proffered excuse for noncompliance. The attitude in which the evidence in the case leaves him is that, under a claim which was found to be not meritorious, he got possession of this property, which was subject to the execution of the plaintiff, upon a covenant and bond to return it, when called for, for purposes of sale, in the event his claim was not sustained; and while he was thus in possession of the property, certain outsiders, the nature of whose rights is not disclosed, caused it to be levied on under process which is not shown to be in any way paramount to that under which it had already been seized, and now he attempts to hold the plaintiff in fi. fa. responsible for the interference of the outsider. The act of the law justifies nonproduction; but there is a vast difference between the act of the law and the act of a constable, for the act of the constable may or may not be the act of the law.

The plaintiff in error urges that it was not incumbent on him to resist with force the act of the constable in levying on the property and thereby to lay himself liable to prosecution for resisting an officer in the execution of legal process. We may well agree with him as to this, but at the same time we are aware that the law has afforded ample remedies by which illegal seizures under color of process may be defended against, and by which property may be released from illegal levies. The plaintiff in error brought the trouble on himself when he gave the bond and took the property under a claim which he could not sustain.

JOHNSON v. STATE (No. 3,307.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 189*)—DEGREES OF OFFENSE—LARCENY FROM THE HOUSE—SIMPLE LARCENY.

Under an accusation which in the language of the statute charges larceny from the house, there may be, if the facts warrant it, a conviction of simple larceny; the latter offense being included within the former.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 594; Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

2. LARCENY (§ 17*)—ASPORTATION—EVIDENCE.

To complete the offense of larceny, the slightest change of location, whereby complete dominion of the property is transferred from the true owner to the trespasser, is sufficient evidence of asportation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence as to the existence of criminal intent is exceedingly weak and unsatisfactory; but, the intent with which an act is done being peculiarly a question of fact for determination by the jury, this court does not feel authorized to set aside the verdict on that ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3078; Dec. Dig. § 1159.*]

Error from City Court of Lexington; Joel Cloud, Judge.

Anthony Johnson was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

Anthony Johnson was indicted for larceny from the house, and was convicted of simple larceny. His motion for a new trial being overruled, he excepted. Besides the general grounds, the motion for a new trial contains several special assignments of error. It is contended that the conviction of the offense of simple larceny was not authorized by the evidence; the facts showing that, if the accused was guilty of any offense, it was larceny from the house. It is further contended that the evidence failed to show that the cotton seed, which the accused was charged with stealing, were removed from the house, and therefore the proof does not correspond with the allegations in the accusation, and does not complete the crime as charged, or the crime of simple larceny as found by the verdict.

The evidence for the prosecution, briefly stated, is as follows: The prosecutor testified that the accused lived on his farm and was employed by him as a tenant; that on the day of the alleged larceny he went down to his seedhouse and saw the accused therein, and there was a sack of cotton seed close by him. "I asked him who put those seed in the sack, and he said he did. I asked him what he was going to do with them, and he said he was going to feed them to his calf." The prosecutor then took him into custody and carried him to his storehouse, where he had him repeat in the presence of his brother and his clerk the same statement he had made to him in reference to the cotton seed. The cotton seed house was open, and consisted of two rooms, in one of which was a pile of cotton seed owned by the prosecutor. In the other room there were some cotton seed scattered on the floor, and these were owned by the brother of the prosecutor. The accused, with the sack, when discovered by the prosecutor, was in the room where the cotton seed were scattered on the floor. The sack held about 2 or 2½ bushels of seed, and was full, and the seed were worth about 50 cents a bushel. The prosecutor and his clerk kept the accused under arrest during the night in the storehouse. The next morning the brother of the accused came to the store, and he and the accused entered into a written agreement with the prosecutor. The evidence does not clearly disclose the subject of this agreement; but it is reasonably inferable therefrom that the prosecutor, in consideration of not prosecuting the accused for the larceny, coerced him into making a contract to work for the prosecutor for 12 months as a laborer without wages. After the contract was made, the accused was released from custody, and he worked for the prosecutor for a month. The prosecutor, after he had thus secured the services of the accused as a laborer, induced the wife of the accused to assume the contract of rent which he had with her husband. The accused did not take any of the cotton seed out of the house, but they were left therein when he was detected and arrested by the prosecutor. The alleged larceny took place in March, and the prosecutor did not press the prosecution against the accused until the following August, after the accused had made and harvested his crop and paid the landlord his part.

The accused introduced no evidence, but stated to the jury that he was living on the prosecutor's place and owned a "little calf"; that he had nothing with which to feed the calf, and went up to the house where the cotton seed were stored, and gathered up some that were scattered on the floor; that he did not think the prosecutor intended to use those seed, as in the other room there were two bales of cotton seed; that he thought that the seed left scattered on the floor were worthless, and had been abandoned by the prosecutor, and for this reason he gathered them up and put them in a sack, but did not intend to steal them, and did not think he was stealing the seed, as he lived on the prosecutor's place, and the prosecutor knew he had nothing to feed his calf on; that he thought he was raking up off the floor waste seed, which the prosecutor did not intend to use; that when the prosecutor came down and saw him in the seedhouse, and asked him what he was doing, he told him, and the prosecutor said, "I have got you now; come and go with me to my store;" that he kept him there all night, and next morning told him that, if he would make a contract to work with him for 12 months without wages, he would settle the case, otherwise he would send him to the chain gang for two years; that the judge would not impose any fine on him, but would do whatever he (the prosecutor) said about it, and that under these circumstances he thought it was best to make the contract with the prosecutor, and did so, and began work the next day under the contract, the prosecutor having induced his wife to assume the rent contract he had with him; that after working with the prosecutor for one month he was informed that the prosecutor had no right to settle a case of larceny, and that he could work the year out with him for nothing and then be prosecuted, so he thought it best to quit work as a laborer, and went back and worked the land which he had rented from the prosecutor, and in the fall paid him the full rental of 1,000 pounds of lint cotton. The prosecutor made no denial of the statement, and it is substantially corroborated by the evidence.

The trial judge sentenced the accused to work on the chain gang of the public works of the county for six months, without any alternative.

Paul Brown and E. P. Shull, for plaintiff in error. Hamilton McWhorter, Jr., Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Under an accusation which charges in the terms of the statute larceny from the house, a conviction may be had for simple larceny; the latter offense being included in the former. Brown v. State, 90 Ga. 454, 16 S. E. 204.

[2] 2. To complete the offense of larceny there must be a taking and carrying away, with intent to steal, the personal property described in the indictment; but the slightest change of location, whereby complete dominion of the article or property is transferred from the owner to the trespasser, is sufficient evidence of the asportation. Lundy

v. State, 60 Ga. 143; 2 Russell on Crimes, 152. The evidence in this case showed that the cotton seed were at least taken up by the accused from the floor where the owner had left them and placed in the sack. The asportation, though slight, was sufficient to show this element of the offense. Indeed, we are inclined to think that a verdict for larceny from the house would not have been unauthorized, as there are some circumstances that tend to show that the accused took the cotton seed from the room of the prosecutor into the room of the seed-house owned by the prosecutor's brother. However, as there was some evidence supporting the theory of simple larceny, we do not think the matter is of sufficient legal consequence to justify the grant of a new trial.

[3] 3. The question of intent is one of fact, to be determined by the jury under the evidence, yet the writer doubts if the accused really had any criminal intent in attempting to take the cotton seed from the house. We are sure that, if his statement was the truth of the transaction, he did not have such intent. He was working for the prosecutor, and the cotton seed were scattered on the floor, apparently going to waste. It is the universal habit of negro employes to take possession of the overplus of the substance of their employers and appropriate it to their own use. The habit is one of the results growing out of the relation of master and servant, especially in our section, and, with the liberality characterizing the master in dealing with his servants, such conduct has been rarely treated as criminal. If the employers of negro servants in the South were to prosecute for larceny their servants who take possession of what they regard as waste material not desired by their masters, "crumbs which fall from their masters' tables," domestic servants would be much harder to secure than at present, and the chain gangs of our country would be very largely increased. The employer in this case, however, seems to have entertained a different view on the subject.

It is usually not the duty of reviewing courts to criticise the conduct of those who assume the rôle of prosecutors, and where the prosecution is in good faith and for the purpose of vindicating the law, such criticism would be inexcusable; but here the undisputed conduct of the prosecutor is so reprehensible that we cannot refrain from placing upon it our unmeasured condemnation. He caught this negro man in what, at the worst, was only a petty larceny. He took advantage of this situation to drive a hard bargain, and to condemn him practically to a condition of peonage for 12 months, and actually held him in this bondage for one month. With a threat of prosecution and the infliction of severe punishment, he forced the accused to make a written contract with him to labor without wages for 12 months. The prosecutor's offense against the rights of this man and the principles of justice furnishes no excuse whatever to the accused; but by contrast with the offense of the latter it is a much greater and more inexcusable infraction of the law. The writer of this opinion is tempted to say that under the facts of this case, illustrating the conduct of both the prosecutor and the accused, the latter seems to be "more sinned against than sinning," and, although he may have been guilty, I am sure a verdict of not guilty would have done no violence to the cause of justice, and would have satisfied the judgment and conscience of the community, without in the slightest degree imperiling the stability of the criminal statute.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMSON v. STATE. (No. 3,390.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 317*)—FAILURE TO PRODUCE EVIDENCE.

Section 1015 of the Penal Code of 1910, relating to the presumption against a party which arises on his failure to produce evidence within his reach to repel a charge against him, is not applicable on the trial of a criminal case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 732; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

2. SUNDAY (§ 29*)—VIOLATION OF SUNDAY LAW.

The verdict is without any evidence to support it, and is therefore contrary to law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sunday, Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

J. R. Williamson was convicted of violating the Sunday law, and brings error. Reversed.

D. W. Blair and Neel & Neel, for plaintiff in error. T. C. Milner, Sol. Gen., and G. W. Stevens, for the State.

HILL, C. J. J. R. Williamson was convicted of violating section 416 of the Penal Code of 1910, which declares that "any person who shall pursue his business, or the work of his ordinary calling, on the Lord's day, works of necessity or charity only excepted, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." His motion for a new trial being overruled, he brings error.

The evidence in support of the accusation, briefly stated, is as follows: Williamson was foreman of a crew connected with the yard of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company at Junta, Ga. Between the hours of midnight and 3 o'clock a. m. Sunday he was directing the switching and movements of certain railroad cars in the yard of the company at that place. The actual movement of the cars was carried on by three or four other employes of the company, who were acting under the directions of Williamson as foreman or conductor. These facts were not controverted by the accused, but it was insisted that they did not constitute a violation of the statute, for the work in question was incidental and necessary to the operation of the regular passenger trains passing through the yard at Junta, going north and south, and also to the running of freight trains during the hours mentioned, through the said yard, all of which trains were running within the statute, and not in violation of any penal law of the state, it being insisted that it was necessary for the operation of these passenger and freight trains that the tracks in the yard should be kept clear, and that it was absolutely necessary that other cars that had reached their destination at the Junta yard should be taken from the main line and placed where they would be out of the way of the other trains that were expected to pass through the yard later; and it was contended by the defendant that this work could only be performed by the yard crew under his control, and was absolutely necessary for the proper and safe running of the regular passenger trains, as well as such other trains as were entitled, under the statute, to run over the road on Saturday night and reach their destination in Atlanta not later than 8 o'clock Sunday morning.

1. In addition to the general grounds of the motion for a new trial, two special assignments of error are made: First, it is insisted that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "It is not in the power of the state to put up any of the crew. They were, as the state contends, all engaged in the work being carried on, and could not be forced to swear one against the other; but the defendant could, but fails to, put them up and explain the nature of the work going on, and one contention of the state is that this is a circumstance you can consider in determining whether or not that was a work of necessity." The indictment was against Williamson alone. If other persons were present and saw him violating the statute, they would have been competent witnesses to prove the fact, whether they were connected with the same work or not. Even if these persons had been jointly indicted with the accused, they would still have been competent witnesses for or against each other on separate trials. Section 995 of the Penal Code of 1910 provides that, "when two or more persons shall be jointly indicted * * * and are separately tried, they shall be competent to testify for or against each other." If, however, they were engaged in the same criminal act, they would not have been compelled to state any fact of an incriminatory nature; but this exemption has repeatedly been held to be a personal privilege of the witness, which he could claim or not as he chose. In any event, we fail to see how the fact that these other persons may have been engaged in the same work could relieve them from testifying as to what the accused was doing at the time. They need not have been asked any question as to their own conduct; but, if they desired to take advantage of any exemption on the ground above indicated, their testimony could, and doubtless would, have been confined by the court to the acts of the accused. In addition to this, if the fact of their complicity in the alleged work entitled them to the privilege of silence, this privilege could have been claimed by them, whether they had been introduced by the accused or the prosecution. But how could the court know that, if these persons were introduced as witnesses, they would claim any privilege, or that they were engaged in the same violation of the law as that charged against the accused, until they had been introduced as witnesses and their testimony elicited? We fail to see how it was not in the power of either party, the state or the accused, to put any member of the crew on the stand as a witness, if either desired the testimony.

[1] 2. Error is assigned upon the following charge: "The witness for the defendant was not present and knows nothing of his own knowledge about the work being done. That is weaker testimony in its nature, he not knowing as much about it as the men who were doing the work. In this connection I shall read you this section of the Code and give it in charge: 'When a party has evidence in his power and within his reach, by which he may repel a claim or charge against him, and omits to produce it, or, having more certain or satisfactory evidence in his power, relies upon that which is of a weaker nature, a presumption arises that the charge or claim is well founded; but the presumption may be rebutted.' Now, then, it is within the power of the defendant to place upon the stand the witnesses who were with him, as he claims, and who know more about it than the superintendent, who was not there. That is one fact you may consider, along with the other evidence in the case, in determining whether or not the work that was being done, if any was done, was a work of necessity at that particular time, or whether it could have been postponed until Monday morning and then done." This excerpt of the charge was objected to on the ground that there was nothing in the evidence to authorize it—nothing to indicate that any of the witnesses were under the power or control of the accused, or were prevented from giving testimony for him by any act on his part. It is also objected to as being wholly inappropriate and inapplicable in a criminal case.

This instruction in effect told the jury that they were authorized to infer, from a failure on the part of the accused to produce the employes who were engaged with him at the time, that the prosecution was well founded. In Mills v. State, 133 Ga. 155, 65 S. E. 368, it is held that in a criminal case the court should not give in charge the section of the Penal Code to the effect that the omission to produce evidence within a party's reach to repel a charge raises a presumption that the charge is well founded. Penal Code 1910, § 1015. In all criminal cases the burden is on the state to establish the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In the case just cited the learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court says: "A diligent investigation fails to disclose any case where it has been ruled that it was proper to give in charge to the jury, in a criminal case [this section] of the Penal Code. We can hardly conceive of a criminal case where an instruction in the language of this Code section would be authorized." And in Knox v. State, 112 Ga. 373, 37 S. E. 416, Mr. Justice Little states that this section of the Code is entirely inapplicable to criminal cases. In effect it tells the jury that if the defendant had evidence by which he might repel or rebut the charge, and fails to introduce it, the presumption arises that he is guilty. This violates the fundamental principle of criminal law that the guilt of the accused must be shown by competent evidence before a legal conviction can be had. One accused of crime has a right to stand mute, and unless it affirmatively appears by the evidence that he is guilty he cannot be legally so held. The presumption of law is that he is innocent, and this presumption remains until he is proved to be guilty. This principle, being inapplicable to criminal cases, has no proper place in the Penal Code. In the case of Davis v. State, 4 Ga. App. 442-444, 61 S. E. 843, referring to the same section of the Code, this court says that, where the evidence is clearly accessible to both parties, this presumption does not arise.

Here the brief of evidence shows that the other members of the crew were known to the prosecution and were entirely accessible, and no reason whatever appears why, if their testimony had been regarded as material, it could not have been obtained by the state as well as by the accused. Under these circumstances, as was said in the Davis Case, the mere failure of the defendant to introduce the witnesses did not give rise to any presumption that this testimony would have been unfavorable to him. See, also Willson v. State, 8 Ga. App. 816 (3), 70 S. E. 193. In view of the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court on the inapplicability of this section in criminal cases, any other discussion of the question would be superfluous. We think the court erred in giving in charge to the jury the principle embodied in this section of the Code, and that the error was prejudicial.

[2] 3. On the merits of the case, however, which seem to be not materially controverted, we do not think the conviction was authorized. The work done by the crew in charge of the accused was done between midnight and 3 o'clock on Sunday morning. The evidence shows that during these hours several trains had passed through Junta, and none of them in violation of the statute. Unquestionably the railroad company had a right to run its passenger trains at all hours during Sunday, and had a right to run its through freight trains through the yard so they could reach their destination before 8 o'clock Sunday morning. An official of the road testified that this work that was done in the yard was absolutely necessary for the operation of the trains which the railroad company was authorized to operate; and he further testified that this defendant and those whom he had in charge constituted the crew of the yard engaged in this necessary work as an incident of the lawful operation of its passenger trains and those freight trains which it could lawfully operate through the yard. The evidence further shows that there were cars which had reached the yard and were on the main tracks, and that the tracks had to be cleared of these cars in order that the regular passenger trains might pass through. It therefore follows, since the Legislature has expressly, or by necessary implication, made it lawful to operate passenger and mail trains on Sunday, and, under named conditions, freight trains up to 8 o'clock a. m., and this work in the yard at Junta was necessary to a safe and proper operation of such trains through its yard, that the accused and the crew under his charge were engaged in a work of necessity, and were therefore within the exception contained in section 416 of the Penal Code. Southern Railway Co. v. Wallis, 133 Ga. 553, 66 S. E. 370, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401; Kellam v. State, 7 Ga. App. 575, 67 S. E. 683.

The evidence of the superintendent (which seems not to have been controverted) is that on this occasion there had been, through no fault whatever of the railroad company, a congestion of cars in the yard at Junta; that this congestion rarely occurred, and when it did occur, as in the present instance, it was absolutely necessary to clear the tracks of the cars and switch them from the main line, in order that the passenger trains and freight cars which were properly scheduled to arrive at their destination in the state before 8 o'clock on Sunday morning might pass through; otherwise there would have been great interruption and delay in the traffic of the railroad company. It seems clear, from the evidence, that the railroad company was not violating the law in doing this work, which was absolutely necessary for the proper and lawful operation of its trains; and it appears from the evidence that it was endeavoring in every way possible to conform to the statute, and not to violate it.

Judgment reversed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

NEW TRIAL (§ 132*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 933*)—FILING BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—EXTENSION OF TIME—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The law in this state contemplates that the brief of the evidence accompanying a motion for new trial, as well as the motion itself, shall be filed at the term at which the trial takes place; and in order to authorize a later filing of the brief of the evidence, an order of court must be taken during that term, granting the privilege. An order continuing the hearing of the motion does not of itself extend the time within which the brief of the evidence may be filed. If an order is taken which is ambiguous or equivocal in its terms, so far as it relates to the question as to whether the movant shall have time beyond the term in which to present the brief of the evidence, the reviewing court will not reverse the trial judge in construing it against the movant.

Verdict having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant filed what is commonly called a "skeleton motion for new trial," and took thereon a rule nisi, returnable on the 17th of May, in vacation. No brief of the evidence was filed, but the following order was taken: "The defendant having made a motion for a new trial in said case, on the grounds herein stated, and said grounds having been approved by the court, and it appearing that it is impossible to make out and complete a brief of the testimony in said case before adjournment of court, it is ordered by the court that said motion be heard and determined on the 17th day of May, 1910, in vacation, at Nashville, and that movant may amend said motion at any time before the final hearing, and if not heard then to go over to regular term." It will be noticed that, while this order purports to extend the time within which amendments may be made to the motion itself, it does not extend the time for the filing or presenting of the brief of the evidence. On the 17th of May, and from time to time thereafter, orders were taken extending the time of hearing, and in some of the orders, if not all of them, the right to file a brief of the evidence was preserved; that is to say, preserved so far as it was in the power of the court then to preserve it. Finally the matter came on for hearing on the 5th of September, 1910. Movant then presented a brief of the evidence. The court held that it was too late to file it, and dismissed the motion.

The case seems to be controlled by the decisions of the Supreme Court in the cases of Pinnebad v. Pinnebad, 129 Ga. 267, 58 S. E. 879, Barnes v. Macon R. Co., 105 Ga. 495, 30 S. E. 883, and Cohen v. Lester, 108 Ga. 565, 29 S. E. 823. It is true that the present order is somewhat equivocal, in that it recites as one of the reasons for continuing the hearing from the first term that "it is impossible to make out and complete a brief of the testimony in said case before adjournment of court"; but the cases just cited all go to the extent of holding that, where the order is equivocal, the construction placed thereon by the trial judge who granted the order will be adopted by the reviewing court. It takes no special order to allow the movant to amend his original motion for new trial. The right of amendment seems to exist at all times, until the motion is finally disposed of; but the right to file a brief of the evidence stands upon a very different footing. Under Civil Code 1910, § 6089, it seems that, if the motion and the brief of the evidence are filed during the term, either of them may be amended thereafter, and that the judge may enter his approval upon the brief of the evidence at any subsequent time, either in term time or in vacation, when the matter lawfully comes before him for hearing.

Judgment affirmed.

WARREN et al. v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 6, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 564*)—CASE—FILING—TIME OF—EXTENSION—SUPREME COURT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 349, providing that the Supreme Court in its discretion may permit acts necessary to an appeal and omitted through mistake or inadvertence to be done out of time, if satisfied that the appeal was taken in good faith and the notice was given in due time for serving a proposed case with exceptions, which, under section 345, must be served within 30 days after notice, can be extended by the Supreme Court after the expiration of the first 30 days.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 564*)—CASE—FILING—TIME OF—EXTENSION.

A failure to serve the proposed case and exceptions within 30 days after notice of appeal, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 345, will be excused where no judgment has been entered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 134*)—DISMISSAL—JUDGMENT—APPEAL FROM.

Upon proper motion, an appeal from a judgment not yet entered will be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 898; Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 564*)—FILING—TIME OF—EXTENSION—DISCRETION OF SUPREME COURT.

Where an appeal was in good faith taken from a judgment not entered, the notice of appeal being served within due time, the Supreme Court should under Code Civ. Proc. § 349, grant the appellant an extension of time for serving his proposed case and exceptions, where his failure to serve them within the statutory period was occasioned by the appellee's failure to enter judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

Action by G. L. Warren and others against P. J. Wilson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

Warren & Warren, for G. L. Warren.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal herein on the ground that no case with exceptions was served within 30 days after notice of intention to appeal. The action was for the recovery of real estate, and the verdict was for the defendant.

[1] Judge Watts made his order refusing a new trial on February 18, 1911, and notice of intention to appeal from this order and the judgment rendered in the case was served on February 23, 1911. Proposed case with exceptions was served by the sheriff on April 10, 1911, 44 days after notice of intention to appeal. Section 345 of the Code of Procedure requires that case, with exceptions, be served within 30 days after notice of appeal. Section 348 provides that the circuit judge who heard the cause, or any one of the justices of the Supreme Court, upon four days' notice, may extend the time for taking any proceeding in the perfection of an appeal, except the time of giving notice of appeal. Relief under this section requires that notice of motion for extension of time be given before the expiration of the time limited, which was not done in this case. However, sections 339 and 349 provide that the Supreme Court in its discretion may permit acts to perfect an appeal out of time omitted to be done through mistake or inadvertence, if satisfied that the appeal was taken in good faith, and notice of appeal was given in due time. The requirement of section 348 that notice of motion to extend time must be given before expiration of the time limited does not apply, when the application is to the Supreme Court. In determining whether to dismiss the appeal for failure to serve case and exceptions in time, this court will consider whether the excuse offered by the appellant in opposition to the motion is such as would move the court to grant an extension of time to perfect the appeal. The appellant explains his delay in serving proposed case and exceptions on the ground that, after diligence, he was unable to procure the stenographer's report of the charge and testimony in time, and upon the further ground that on March 21, 1911, he discovered for the first time that respondent had not entered judgment in the case, whereupon he concluded under the case of Publishing Co. v. Gibbes, 59 S. C. 219, 37 S. E. 753, that he had 30 days after entry of judgment to serve case and exceptions. It appears that no judgment had been entered up to the time of hearing this motion, but appellant declares his intention to have such judgment promptly entered himself if respondent does not.

[2] The fact that no judgment has been entered may excuse the failure to serve within 30 days after notice of appeal the case and exceptions on appeal from the judgment. Pub. Co. v. Gibbes, supra.

[3] Upon a proper motion the court would be warranted in dismissing an appeal from a judgment not entered, but the motion to dismiss is not based upon that ground, but solely upon the ground that case with exceptions was not served in time, which goes upon the theory that judgment has been entered.

[4] We are satisfied that the appeal from the judgment to be entered and from the order refusing new trial is taken in good faith, and the notice of appeal having been given within time, we must decline to dismiss the appeal on the ground stated in the motion.

Motion refused.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. CITY OF GOLDSBORO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1911.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 98*)—STREET CROSSINGS—CHANGE OF GRADE—RAILROAD CHARTER.

The charter of a railroad, authorizing it to construct its road to cross any public way, provided that, whenever it crosses such public road, it shall cause its road to be so constructed as not to impede the passage along the public road, is not limited to public roads existing when the railroad was constructed, but requires it to conform its grade to streets subsequently constructed across it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 291-296; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 98*)—STREET CROSSINGS—CHANGE OF GRADE—POWER TO ORDER.

Revisal 1908, § 1097(10), authorizing the Corporation Commission to require the raising or lowering by a railroad of its track at any crossing, and to designate who shall pay for the same, does not deprive a city of the right to exercise its police power, under its charter, in that regard; but is supplementary merely.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 291-296; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 98*)—STREET CROSSINGS—CHANGE OF GRADE—LIMITATIONS.

Revisal 1908, § 388, providing that no railroad shall be barred by limitations as to its right of way by occupation of it by another, has no application where a city is not contending for the soil of any part of a right of way, but is merely contending for the right to require the railroad to change the grade of its roadbed where it is crossed by streets, so that public travel and the drainage of the city may not be impeded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 291-296; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 231*)—MOVING CARS IN CITY—ORDINANCES—"SHIFTING CARS."

An ordinance prohibiting a railroad running through the city from "shifting" cars—that is, cutting out and putting in cars in the making up of a train—within certain four blocks in the heart of the city, except between 6:30 and 8:30 a. m. and between 4:30 and 6:30 p. m., or from allowing any car to stand for longer than five minutes within such space, is a valid reasonable exercise of the police power. (Per an equally divided court.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; W. J. Adams, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company against the City of Goldsboro. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Munroe, Geo. B. Elliott, and Geo. M. Rose, for appellant. D. C. Humphrey and Aycok & Winston, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, originally the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company, occupies with its track the chief street of the city of Goldsboro. Its right of way, 65 feet on each side of its roadbed, embraces the whole of what is known as East and West Center streets, which extend north and south the entire length of the city. The right of way was originally acquired about 1835, and the town has been built up on either side and became incorporated in 1847. The city of Goldsboro, under the authority of the powers granted in its charter, has instituted a system of grading its streets and of drainage extending throughout the city. In pursuance of this work, the roadbed of the railroad on Center street in some places is now six inches and from that to eighteen inches higher than the grade of that street and of the other streets of the city which cross East and West Center streets at right angles. The city authorities have passed an ordinance providing that "all railroad companies owning tracks on East and West Center streets, between Walnut and Vine streets, in said city of Goldsboro are hereby required to lower said tracks, so as to make the same conform to the grade line of said streets and said tracks to be filled in between rails; the grade line of said street being as follows: Beginning at the present grade line, corner of Walnut and East and West Center streets to be lowered 6 inches to corner of Mulberry and East and West Center streets, 10 inches to corner of Ash and East and West Center streets and 18 inches to corner of Vine and East and West Center streets." Another section of the ordinance provides that failure or refusal to comply with the ordinance should be a misdemeanor and fined $50. The plaintiff attacks this ordinance as being unconstitutional and void, and sought to enjoin all enforcement of the ordinance by a criminal proceeding. The city has heretofore graded and paved at its own expense said East and West Center street outside of that part of the street occupied and used by the defendant as its roadbed. The injunction was refused, and the plaintiff appealed.

The city has from time to time laid out numerous streets crossing said right of way, and has worked and maintained its streets and cross-streets for more than 60 years, including all of East and West Center streets outside of the actual space occupied by plaintiff's roadbed. As a general rule, a court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain a state from prosecuting for a violation of its statutes and ordinances. The ordinances in question were made by the city in pursuance of its governmental authority. We need not enter into the learned and elaborate discussion as to what cases, if any, present exceptions to this general rule, for we are of the opinion that the ordinance requiring the plaintiff to lower its track from 6 to 18 inches at the points where the cross-streets pass over the railroad track is a legal exercise of the public authority vested in the defendant. The plaintiff took its charter expecting that towns and cities would grow up along the line of its road, and knowing that with the development of the country new roads, and in the cities and towns that new streets, would be laid out across its right of way. And it took its charter knowing, too, that the state would have the right to lay out such roads and new streets, and to require the railroad to make such alterations as would prevent the passage over its track by the public being impeded. In English v. New Haven, 32 Conn. 241, it was held that the city had the right to require the railroad company to widen the crossing of a street over its track, or to make such other changes as the public convenience and necessity might require, in order that there should be no hindrance to the public in crossing the railroad track. In Railroad v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 14 Sup. Ct. 437, 38 L. Ed. 269, it was held that the imposition upon a railroad company of the entire expense of a change of grade at a railroad crossing is not a violation of any constitutional right. In Cleveland v. Augusta, 102 Ga. 233, 29 S. E. 584, 43 L. R. A. 638, the subject is fully discussed in a very able opinion which holds that a railroad corporation must make such alterations in the change of its grade as will conform to the new grading of the streets adopted by the city. In railroad v. Duluth, 208 U. S. 583, 28 Sup. Ct. 341, 52 L. Ed. 630, it was held that: "The right to exercise the police power is a continuing one that cannot be limited or contracted away by the state or its municipality, nor can it be destroyed by compromise as it is immaterial upon what consideration the attempted contract is based. Such power when exercised in the interest of public health and safety is to be maintained unhampered by contracts and private interests; hence an ordinance by a city compelling a railroad to repair a viaduct constructed after the opening of a road is valid though the city for a substantial consideration had contracted to relieve the railroad company from making such repairs for a term of years."

[1] In the present case, however, there was no contract exempting the railroad from changing its grade at such crossings when required. Indeed, section 27 of plaintiff's charter in the laws of 1833 (Priv. Acts 1833-34, c. 78) expressly requires the plaintiff to do what the city now requires. Said section provides: "It shall be lawful for the said railroad company in the construction of its said road to intersect or cross any public or private way established by law; and it shall be lawful for them to run their road along the route of any such road; provided whenever they intersect and cross such public or private road the president or directors shall cause the railroad to be so constructed as not to impede the passage of travelers on said public road or private way aforesaid." In Minneapolis v. Railroad, 98

Minn. 380, 108 N. W. 261, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 307, 120 Am. St. Rep. 581, the Supreme Court of Minnesota held that an almost identical provision in the charter of a railroad company was as applicable to new public roads laid out across the right of way as it was to old roads over which the right of way ran, and said: "The purpose of incorporating this particular provision in the charter of the railroad company was in the interest of the public and to require the railroad company to keep in good repair all crossings at the intersection of highways. * * * The evils intended to be guarded against are the same, and apply equally to both new and old streets. There was no reason why the Legislature should deem it prudent to provide for existing highways only, and we do no violence to the rules of statutory construction in holding that the provisions of defendant's charter were intended to include all streets and highways intersected by railroads whether laid out before or after building of the railroad. The expression of the statute is special perhaps; but the reason therefor is general. The expression must therefore be deemed general. A railroad company accepts and receives its franchise subject to the implied right of the state to lay out and open new streets and highways over its tracks, and must be deemed as a matter of law to have had in contemplation at the time its charter was granted, and is bound to assume all burdens incident to new, as well as existing, crossings." The same doctrine has been held in Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, New York, Tennessee, Indiana, Texas, Mississippi, Ohio, Nebraska, New Jersey, Vermont, Wisconsin, and by the United States Supreme Court. Indeed, the above case from Minnesota was affirmed 214 U. S. 497, 29 Sup. Ct. 698, 53 L. Ed. 1060. In the above-cited case of Cleveland v. Augusta, 102 Ga. 233, 29 S. E. 584, 43 L. R. A. 638, the railroad ran across the public road which was not then a street. When the territory was taken into the city, its authorities changed the road to a street and raised the grade at that point, and required the railroad to raise its grade. This the railroad refused to do unless the city would pay the expense. The court held that the railroad company was liable for the expense of raising its roadbed to conform to the city grade, and said that it must yield to the reasonable burden imposed by the growth and development of the country or the city; and, where the public welfare demands a change of grade of the highway or street, the railroad company must, at its own expense, make such alterations in the grade of its crossing as will conform to the new grade. That case is exactly in point. In the course of its opinion the court said: "Upon streets or highways crossed by it, or subsequently laid out, the railroad company must construct proper crossings" (Lancaster

v. Railroad, 29 Neb. 412, 45 N. W. 469; Railroad v. Smith, 91 Ind. 119, 13 Am. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 608), and must alter, change, or otherwise reconstruct such crossings whenever the public welfare demands (English v. New Haven Co., 32 Conn. 240). The doctrine is further clearly stated thus by the court: "When the railroad company laid its track across the highway, it did so subject to the right of the public authorities to make such alterations or changes in the highway, either by lowering or raising the grade, widening or otherwise improving the same, as the public safety and welfare might require. In doing so the presence of the railroad necessitates a certain character of crossings and safeguards which otherwise would not exist; and, with however much plausibility it might be argued that the public authorities should be required to do just such work as they would have to do did the railroad not exist, it is certain that the railroad company should bear the burden of such work as is made necessary by reason of the peculiar and dangerous character of its operation. The principle of the common law is embodied in this statute. It is the railroad which makes the construction of a railroad crossing necessary, whether the highway be laid out before or after the construction of the railroad."

In Railroad v. Minnesota, 208 U. S. 583, 28 Sup. Ct. 341, 52 L. Ed. 630, it is said: "As the Supreme Court of Minnesota points out in its opinion (98 Minn. 380, 108 N. W. 261, 28 L. R. A. [N. S.] 298, 120 Am. St. Rep. 581), the state courts are not altogether agreed as to the right to compel railroads without compensation to construct and maintain suitable crossings at streets extended over its right of way after the construction of the railroad. The great weight of state authority is in favor of such right. See cases cited, 98 Minn. 380, 108 N. W. 261, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298, 120 Am. St. Rep. 581. There can be no question as to the attitude of this court upon this question, as it has been uniformly held that the right to exercise the police power is a continuing one, that it cannot be contracted away, and that a requirement that a corporation or an individual comply with reasonable police regulations without compensation is the legitimate exercise of the power and not in violation of the constitutional inhibition against the impairment of obligations of contract." Here the city, in pursuance of its right, has graded the streets of the city and put in a system of drainage, both of which are impeded by the railroad maintaining its roadbed on Center street from 6 to 18 inches above the level of the streets crossing it; its roadbed extending through the entire length of the city on this main street.

[2] The plaintiff earnestly contends that, inasmuch as Rev. 1908, § 1087 (10) authorized the Corporation Commission to require the raising or lowering by a railroad of its track or highway at any crossing and to designate who shall pay for the same, this deprives the city of Goldsboro of the right to exercise its police power in that regard. The provision just cited giving the Corporation Commission the power stated is not in derogation of that conferred in the charters of towns and cities, but is supplementary merely.

[3] The plaintiff also contends that Revisal, § 388, that no railroad company, etc., shall be barred by the statute of limitations as to its right of way, etc., by occupation of the same by any person whatever, deprived the city of the right there claimed. This is a misconception. The defendant is not contending for the ownership of the soil of East and West Center streets. It is merely asserting its right to require the railroad company to change the grade of its roadbed where it is crossed by other streets so that public travel and the drainage of the city may not be impeded.

[4] A further ordinance of the city prohibits the railroad from doing any "shifting on East and West Center streets between Spruce and Ash at any other time than from the hours of 6:30 and 8:30 a. m. and from 4:30 to 6:30 p. m., or to allow any car to stand for a longer period than 5 minutes at any point on East and West Center streets between Spruce and Ash under a penalty of $50 for each offense." East and West Center streets constitute the main street of the town, and that portion of it between Spruce and Ash—four blocks—is the very heart of the city. In a former action, in which this plaintiff in this case was a defendant (Dewey v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 392, 55 S. E. 292), the plaintiff herein, which was defendant in that action, alleged in its answer as follows: "The operation of the trains along said Center street increases annually and the danger accordingly. Trains are constantly passing, and the crossings, notwithstanding the utmost diligence and care on the part of the railroad, are necessarily blocked. Said Center street is the main business street in the city. It is frequently crowded with pedestrians and vehicles, and the operation of so many trains daily throughout the length of said street is fraught with danger to life and property." This statement, admission, and averment of the plaintiff herein, made under oath, is set up in the answer in this case in which an injunction is sought, and it is admitted in the reply. We understand the ordinance in forbidding "shifting" within the limited space of four blocks, on the main street in the center of the town, to refer to what is commonly understood by that expression, to wit, the "cutting out and putting in" cars in the making up of a train before it is dispatched on its journey. Such a regulation certainly cannot be held void, and is a reasonable exercise of the police power necessary for the convenience and safety of the public at the four crossings designated. Whether such ordinance would be reasonable in smaller towns is a question not before us. We certainly do not understand the term "shifting" to refer to the "transfer" of a train of cars already made up and to be delivered by the plaintiff company to another railroad company to be transported. The ordinance does not apply to the transfer of a car or cars from one railroad to another through the city. Whether an ordinance forbidding the transfer of the cars from one railroad to another through said street except at specified hours would be reasonable in view of the fact that at Goldsboro such cars can be transferred by way of the physical connection of the tracks of all the railroads on the edge of town at the new Union station might admit of debate. But that question is not before us. The plaintiff railroad company has its shifting yards further out, where its trains can be made up, and where at least the chief part of the necessary shifting can be done. Certainly it is a reasonable exercise of the police power to forbid such "shifting" except at specified hours on four blocks of the plaintiff's track in the heart of the town. The plaintiff's official returns show $223,000,000 of property owned by it. The defendant's counsel having adverted to the very large proportion of this property held by the plaintiff in this state, the plaintiff's counsel replied that Goldsboro had only 6,107 population, and contended that for "a little town like that to interfere with the operation of so vast an enterprise" was, to use his expression, "like the tail wagging the dog." It is such a mistaken standpoint that doubtless induced the plaintiff on this occasion, and has so often induced such corporations, to assert what they deem their rights in defiance of the evident convenience and desires of the public by means of whose patronage such corporations thrive, and make their profits. It is true the city of Goldsboro is not large. But the powers it has exercised in making these ordinances it exercises in the name of and by the right of the sovereignty of the people of this state. From that sovereignty the plaintiff derives its rights and its very existence. It was incorporated solely for the public convenience and subject to public regulation. Its stockholders were exempted from personal liability, and it was granted the power of the state's right of eminent domain to procure its right of way and to exercise its vocation. The right of the plaintiff to derive a profit from its business is an incident of a private nature and subject to the right of the sovereign to regulate its operations and to "alter or repeal its charter, at will." Const. art. 8, § 1.

The requirement by the authorities of Goldsboro that the plaintiff railroad company shall at its own expense ($3,400) change its grade where its road is crossed by other streets to conform to the grade adopted by the city and its prohibition of "shifting" to make up trains on the main street of the town, within four blocks in the heart of the city, except in specified hours, is a lawful exercise of the police powers conferred upon the city by the sovereign power in this state. Cooper v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 229, 52 S. E. 982, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391; Wilson v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 348, 55 S. E. 257; Gerringer v. Railroad, 146 N. C. 85, 59 S. E. 152. The only unreasonable aspect of the controversy is that the plaintiff should have resisted such requirements, instead of yielding immediate assent, or indeed preventing the necessity of the passage of such ordinance, by anticipating the wishes of the public in a matter so essential to the safety, comfort, and health of the town.

Affirmed.

BROWN, J. (concurring in part). The following ordinances of the city of Goldsboro are attacked by the plaintiff upon the ground that they are an unlawful interference with the chartered property rights of the plaintiff as well as an impediment in the discharge of its duty to the public, viz:

"Sec. 2. That the shifting limits on East and West Center streets shall be on the south from Spruce street to the city limits, and north from Ash street to city limits.

"Sec. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any railroad or railway company to do any shifting on East and West Center streets, between Spruce and Ash streets, at any other time than from the hours of 6:30 to 8:30 a. m., and from 4:30 to 6:30 p. m. Any railroad or railway company violating this ordinance shall be subject to a fine of fifty dollars for each offense.

"Sec. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any railroad or railway company to place any car and allow said car to stand for a longer period of time than five minutes at any point on East and West Center streets, between Spruce and Ash streets. Any railroad or railway company violating this ordinance shall be subject to a fine of fifty dollars for each offense.

"Sec. 5. That all railroad and railway companies owning tracks on East and West Center streets between Walnut and Vine streets in said city of Goldsboro are hereby required to lower said tracks, so as to make the same conform to the grade line of said streets, and said tracks to be filled in between the rails; the grade line of said street being as follows: Beginning at the present grade line, corner of Walnut and East and West Center streets, to be lowered six inches to corner of Mulberry and East and West Center streets, ten inches to corner of Ash and East and West Center streets, and eighteen inches to corner of Vine and East and West Center streets."

I concur fully in the opinion of the Chief Justice in so far as it refers to Ordinance No. 5, requiring the railways entering the city to lower their tracks at street crossings so as to conform to the grade line of the streets. This requirement does not interfere with the traffic of the railways, or impede them in the performance of their obligations as common carriers, and evidently will add materially to the safe and convenient use of the streets. This ordinance seems to be supported by the weight of authority. But I find no authority to support the ordinance fixing shifting limits and undertaking to prohibit the use of portions of plaintiff's tracks for shifting purposes during the large part of both the day and night, and none has been cited to us. I take it to be settled now by abundant authority that when it is shown that a municipal ordinance unlawfully interferes with the chartered rights, duties, as well as business of a common carrier, and will seriously obstruct the carrier in the discharge of its duties to the public, the enforcement of such ordinance will be enjoined.

In Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 Sup. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169, the Supreme Court of the United States says: "It is well settled that where property rights would be destroyed unlawful interference by criminal proceedings under a void law or ordinance may be reached and controlled by a decree of a court of equity." Smyth v. Ames, 139 U. S. 466, 18 Sup. Ct. 418, 42 L. Ed. 819; Prentiss v. A. C. L. Co., 211 U. S. 228, 29 Sup. Ct. 67, 53 L. Ed. 150; Waterworks v. Vicksburg, 185 U. S. 82, 22 Sup. Ct. 585, 46 L. Ed. 808; Milwaukee E. R. & L. Co. v. Bradley, 108 Wis. 467, 84 N. W. 875. In Schlitz Brewing Co. v. City of Superior, 117 Wis. 300, 93 N. W. 1121, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin says: "This court has recently had the general subject under discussion, and, after full consideration, has laid down the rule that equity may enjoin such prosecutions where they are resorted to or threatened as a means of preventing the enjoyment of property rights, and there is not any way to adequately remedy the mischief." The principle upon which injunctive relief may be given in cases of this character is stated by this court in Railroad v. Olive, 142 N. C. 285, 55 S. E. 266: "Injunctive relief against interference with the use of the right of way of a railroad company is not given because of any special consideration for these corporations, but because they are public agencies chartered, organized and given the right of eminent domain in the contemplation of law to serve the public; they are a part of the system of highways of the state." The federal courts take the same ground and for a similar reason. "It is settled," said the court, in Southern Exp. Co. v. Ensley (C. C.) 116 Fed. 756, "that a court of equity should enjoin the enforcement of a municipal ordinance, though violations of it are punished criminally, when its enforcement will affect the illegal destruction of, or a grave interference with, a corporate franchise, in the operation of which the public have an interest." If this were not true, any municipal corporation by repeated arrests of the carrier's servants for violation of some ordinance might bring its trains to a standstill, paralyze its business, and seriously injure the interests of the public, who are dependent upon the carrier's service.

The defendant's counsel base the right to enact the switching ordinances upon the police power of the city, contending that it is per se a nuisance to conduct such operations in a public street, because dangerous to persons crossing the street, and disagreeable and annoying to those doing business and residing on both sides of the plaintiff's track. In the first place, the plaintiff's track is not a public street, although there is a public street partly on the right of way on both sides of the track. The plaintiff was chartered by the General Assembly before the defendant, and acquired its right of way and built its road some years before the defendant became a municipality. In the second place, operating a railroad, whether in moving its trains or in switching its cars, is a lawful business; and a business properly conducted under the sanction of law cannot be a nuisance per se, as is held by the Supreme Court in Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 640, 25 L. Ed. 336. It is said in that case: "A Legislature may and often does authorize and even direct acts to be done which are harmful to individuals, and which, without authority, would be nuisances; but in such a case, if the statute be such as the Legislature has power to pass, the acts are lawful, and are not nuisances, unless the power has been exceeded." In the case of Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Armstrong, 71 Kan. 366, 80 Pac. 978, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 113, 114 Am. St. Rep. 474, the court says that an authorized business properly conducted at an authorized place is not a nuisance, for whatever is lawful cannot be wrongful. To same effect is Cooley on Torts, p. 67. It was held in Drake v. Railroad, 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 508, that a railroad passing through streets in New York City when the cars were drawn by steam power into a crowded part of the city was not per se a nuisance. Similar decisions are Railroad v. Applegate, 8 Dana (Ky.) 289, 33 Am. Dec. 497; Moses v. Railroad, 21 Ill. 516; Murphy v. City of Chicago, 29 Ill. 279, 81 Am. Dec. 307. In Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 498, 19 L. Ed. 984, the Supreme Court of the United States holds that: "The question of nuisance or obstruction must be determined by general and fixed laws, and it is not to be tolerated that the local municipal authorities of a city declare any particular business or structure a nuisance, in such a summary mode, and enforce its decision at its own pleasure." In that case Mr. Justice Miller says: "This would place every house, every business, and all the property of a city at the uncontrolled will of temporary local authorities." In commenting on the powers of municipal corporations to declare what is a nuisance Smith in his Modern Law of Municipal Corporations (vol. 2, § 1106) says that "the city council may not, by a mere resolution or motion, declare any particular thing a nuisance which has not theretofore been pronounced to be such by law, or so adjudged by judicial determination." In a note to the above is the following: "In Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. City of Joliet, 79 Ill. 25, an action by the city to enjoin the railroad company from running its trains through the public streets and over certain public grounds of the city, which the city council by ordinance has declared to be a nuisance, the Supreme Court of Illinois reversed the court below, which had granted the injunction, and remanded the case with directions to dismiss the bill declaring that they would regard the ordinance as without effect upon the case, although the charter conferred upon the common council the power to abate and remove nuisances, and to punish the authors thereof, and to define and declare what shall be deemed nuisances upon the authority of Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. Ed. 984, and State v. Mayor, etc., 29 N. J. Law, 170. This is not only the universal doctrine in this country, but is so held in England in Railway Co. v. Brand, 4 Eng. & Ir. App. 171-196, in which case it is said that "no court can treat that as a wrong which the Legislature has authorized." In the case of New Orleans v. Lefant, 126 La. 455, 52 South. 575, it is held that "an ordinance which absolutely prohibits the doing of things, upon property which appears to be the subject of private ownership, which are harmless in themselves, and may or may not become nuisances, according to the manner in which they are done, is unconstitutional, because it seeks unduly to regulate and trammel the use of such property; and, where it imposes arbitrary and unreasonable obligations, it is illegal, for that reason." In that case the city of New Orleans by ordinance undertook to prohibit the railway company from parking its cars on its own tracks on Elysian Fields street, and the ordinance was held to be an infraction of the company's chartered rights. This principle is clearly recognized and enforced by this court in Thomason v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 318, 55 S. E. 206, wherein it is held: "When a railroad company acquires a right of way, in the absence of any restrictions either in the charter or the grant, if one was made, it becomes invested with the power to use it, not only to the extent necessary to meet the present needs, but such further demands as may arise from the increase of its business and the proper discharge of its duty to the public. A railroad company may, if necessary to meet the demands of its enlarged growth, cover its right of way with tracks, and, in the absence of negligence, operate trains upon them without incurring in that respect additional liability either to the owner of the land condemned or others." In Taylor v. Railway, 145 N. C. 400, 59 S. E. 129, 122 Am. St. Rep. 455, it is held that the lawful operation of a railway on its own right of way and premises cannot be an actionable nuisance; the court saying that "the several acts charged against the defendant are well within its chartered powers, provided they are performed with reasonable care." In Morgan v. Railroad, 98 N. C. 247, 3 S. E. 506, this court recognized the right of a railroad company to move its engines and cars at will when necessary on its tracks along the streets of an incorporated town; Mr. Justice Merrimon saying: "The defendant certainly had the right on its roadway to move its locomotive with or without cars attached to it, in the orderly course of such work, to and fro in making up its trains, detaching cars from one already formed, and shifting them from one train or place to another." There is nothing in Railroad v. Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 2 Sup. Ct. 719, 27 L. Ed. 739, which contravenes this principle as is pointed out in Taylor v. Railroad, supra, and in Railroad v. Armstrong, 71 Kan. 368, 80 Pac. 980, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 113, 114 Am. St. Rep. 474. The railroad company had built a roundhouse and shops for storing, cleaning and repairing its engines up against a church, and the Supreme Court sustained a recovery upon the ground that the right given by Congress to enter the city of Washington did not authorize it to purchase a lot and build roundhouses and shops at any place it should select; the court saying: "As well might it be contended that the act permitted it to place them immediately in front of the President's house or of the Capitol." In commenting upon that case, the Supreme Court of Kansas says: "The plaintiff was permitted to recover, but it was because the company had no authority to build its engine house at the place where it did." Railroad v. Armstrong, supra.

In our case the plaintiff has the right to use its tracks, granted by the Legislature in 1845, for all purposes incident to its business as a common carrier. The movement of detached cars and shifting engines is as necessary to enable the plaintiff to discharge its public duties as is the running of its freight and passenger trains. The plaintiff's freight depot is at the southern end of Goldsboro, and those of two other railroad companies are at the north end, and the tracks over which shifting is prohibited for 20 hours out of 24 connects the respective freight stations. There must be a frequent shifting and transfer of cars from one carrier to the other, absolutely essential in the transportation of freight. To restrict the HOKE, J. The provisions of our Constitution applicable to the question presented and authoritative decisions construing statutes of similar import are against the ruling of the lower court by which these bonds were declared invalid.

[1] Thus in Jones v. Commissioners of Madison County, 137 N. C. 579-596, 50 S. E. 291, 297, speaking to the action of counties in matters governmental and the power of the Legislature over them in this respect, the court said: "In the exercise of ordinary governmental functions they are simply agencies of the state constituted for the convenience of local administration in certain portions of the state's territory, and in the exercise of such functions they are subject to almost unlimited Legislative control except when restricted by constitutional provision"—citing Hamilton v. Miguels, 7 Ohio St. 109; 1 Dillon on Mun. Cor. § 23; Smith's Law of Municipal Corporations, § 10; People v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 401; Galveston v. Posnain-sky, 62 Tex. 118, 50 Am. Rep. 517; Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 169; Locomotive Co. v. Emigrant Co., 164 U. S. 559-576, 17 Sup. Ct. 188, 41 L. Ed. 552; and authorities from our own court, Tate v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 812, 30 S. E. 352; White v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 437, 47 Am. Rep. 534; Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 558; and many others could be cited, notably with us McCormac v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 441. On this subject in Mills v. Williams it was held: "The Legislature has the constitutional power to repeal an act establishing a county. It has the same power to consolidate, as to divide, counties; the exercise of the power in both cases being upon considerations of public expediency."

2. "The purpose of making all corporations is the public good. The only substantial difference between corporations is that in some cases they are erected by the mere will of the Legislature; there being no other party interested or concerned, and these are subject at all times to be modified, changed, or annulled." And in Locomotive Works v. Emigrant Co., supra, the position is referred to in this way: "The county of Calhoun is a mere political subdivision of the state, created for the state's convenience and to aid in carrying out within a limited territory the policy of the state. Its local government contains no will contrary to the will of the state, and it is subject to the paramount authority of the state as well in respect to its acts as of its property and revenue held for public purposes. The state made it, and could, in its discretion, unmake it, and administer such property and revenue through other instrumentalities." In McCormac's Case, supra, Merrimon, Judge, for the court, said: "That it is within the power and is the province of the Legislature to subdivide the territory of the state and invest the inhabitants of such subdivisions with corporate functions, more or less extensive and varied in their character, for the purposes of government, is too well settled to admit of any serious question. Indeed, it seems to be a fundamental feature of our system of free government that such a power is inherent in the legislative branch of the government, limited and regulated, as it may be, only by the organic law. The Constitution of the state was formed in view of this and like fundamental principles. They permeate its provisions, and all statutory enactments should be interpreted in the light of them, when they apply. It is in the exercise of such power that the Legislature alone can create, directly or indirectly, counties, townships, school districts, road districts and the like subdivisions and invest them and agencies in them, with powers corporate or otherwise in their nature to effectuate the purposes of the government, whether these be local or general, or both. Such organizations are intended to be instrumentalities and agencies employed to aid in the administration of the government, and are always under the control of the power that created them, unless the same shall be restricted by some constitutional limitation."

[2] The same principle has been applied and upheld with us in reference to townships. Jones v. Commissioners of Stokes County, 143 N. C. 59, 55 S. E. 427; Jones v. Commissioners of Person County, 107 N. C. 248, 12 S. E. 69; Brown v. Commissioners of Hertford County, 100 N. C. 92, 5 S. E. 178. In Jones v. Commissioners of Stokes County, supra, the present Chief Justice, speaking to the subject, said: "The defendants suggest, however, that it infringes upon the provisions of the Constitution establishing counties and requiring them to be maintained in their integrity. But we do not find any such provisions. The Constitution recognizes the existence of counties, townships, cities, and towns as governmental agencies (White v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 437, 47 Am. Rep. 534), but they are all legislative creations and subject to be changed (Dare v. Currituck, 95 N. C. 189; Harriss v. Wright, 121 N. C. 172, 28 S. E. 269), abolished (Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 558) or divided (McCormac v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 441) at the will of the General Assembly."

[3] Again, in Smith v. School Trustees, 141 N. C. 143, 53 S. E. 524, the Legislature incorporated a school district, confined territorially to portions of two existent townships, authorized the trustees of the district to issue bonds, levy and collect taxes, etc., and the court, after full and careful consideration held that this power of the Legislature over counties, townships, etc., when acting as governmental agencies, was not confined to the ordinary political subdivisions of the state, but that it authorized and extended to creating special public quasi corporations for governmental purposes in designated portions of the state's territory, and that, in the exercise of such power, county and township lines could both be disregarded if such action was in the judgment and expressed declaration of the Legislature best promotive of the public welfare. And within the proper exercise of this power were included levee, school, drainage, roads, and highways, and other special taxing districts, citing among other authorities: American and English Ency. of Law, p. 906, as follows: "Districts for schools, highways, levee, irrigation, drainage, and other similar purposes may be and often are invested by the state with a corporate character, and may be endowed with the taxing power. These are quasi corporations, mere subdivisions of the state for political purposes." And 1 Desty on Taxation, p. 226, to the following: "As distinct from its power of local assessment, the Legislature may create special taxing districts which may include all or mere subdivisions of the state or parts of subdivisions. It is not essential that such districts shall correspond with the territorial limits of such subdivision. So it may create levee, school, swamp land, road, and highway, and other taxing districts"—an extension of the principle affirmed and applied to school districts in McCormac's Case, supra, and to drainage districts in Sanderlin v. Luken, 152 N. C. 738, 68 S. E. 225, and to highways in townships in Commissioners v. Webb, 152 N. C. 710, 68 S. E. 211. In the case of Smith v. School Trustees, supra, it was held, also, that, when these special districts were incorporated for governmental purposes, they came within the limitations and restrictions as to the methods, purposes, and powers of taxation contained in article 7, §§ 7, 9, 13; section 7 being the prohibition against contracting debts, loaning credits, or levying taxes except for necessary expenses, unless by a vote of the majority of the qualified voters therein, section 9 requiring that all taxation shall be uniform and ad valorem, section 13 prohibiting the payment of debts contracted in support of the Confederate government. And, with the exception of these sections above noted, there was not only no further restraint on the power of the Legislature contained in the Constitution, but that, under section 14 of the same article, express provision was made for its fullest exercise. And, speaking further to the question, the court said: "The language of section 14 is very broad in its scope and terms, and the Supreme Court, in construing the section, has decided that it is not necessary to effect changes in municipal government that an act for the purpose should be general in its operation, or that it should in terms abrogate one article and substitute another in its stead, but that an act of the General Assembly making such change, and local in its operations, must be given effect under this amendment if otherwise valid. After declaring this as a principle of construction, the court, in Harriss v. Wright, 121 N. C. 179, 28 S. E. 269, further holds as follows:

In 1875 a constitutional convention amended article 7 in these words: 'The General Assembly shall have full power by statute to modify, change or abrogate any and all the provisions of this article and substitute others in their place except sections 7, 9, and 13.' Const. art. 7, § 14. Thus was placed at the will and discretion of the Assembly, the political branch of the state government, the election of court officers, the duty of county commissioners, the division of counties into districts, the corporate power of districts and townships, the election of township officers, the assessment of taxable property, the drawing of money from the county or township treasury, the entry of officers on duty, the appointment of justices of the peace, and all charters, ordinances, and provisions relating to municipal corporations. Our Constitution, therefore, so far from restricting the power of the General Assembly on the matter now before us, has conferred upon that body full and ample power to establish any form of municipal government which the public interests and special needs of a given community may require."

[4] And it is no objection to this legislation that the issuing of the bonds and the control and ordering of the road work are given to the local authorities, while the county commissioners are directed to levy and collect the taxes. This is the plan contained in our general statute in reference to school districts, adopted, no doubt, for convenience and to avoid possible friction between different sets of officers and unnecessary harassment of the citizens in the collection of taxes. As declared, however, in Perry v. School Commissioners, 148 N. C. 526, 62 S. E. 606: "Whether the collection of this tax was done by specified local agencies or by the general authorities of the county, this was only an immaterial matter, a question of method simply, which was not of the substance, and should in no way affect the result."

[5] The power of the Legislature, then, over these local agencies, when acting in matters governmental, being ample, certainly when given territorial placing, and whether designated as counties, townships, or as special districts, it is well established with us that the construction and maintenance of public roads is a governmental purpose and the cost thereof is a necessary expense to be paid for by current taxation or by issuing bonds, having regard always to the requirements and limitations of the legislation under which these local authorities are acting and for such purpose, and, unless the statute so requires, no election by the people is necessary. Within the range of governmental action, there could not be a more beneficent purpose or a more compelling need, and numerous and repeated decisions of our court are in furtherance of the enlightened policy of which this statute is an expression. Highway Commissioners v. Webb, 152 N. C. 710.

68 S. E. 211; Ellison v. Willanston, 152 N. C. 147, 87 S. E. 255; Jones v. New Bern, 152 N. C. 64, 87 S. E. 173; Hendersonville v. Jordan, 150 N. C. 85, 63 S. E. 167; Commissioners v. Webb, 148 N. C. 120, 61 S. E. 670; Crocker v. Moore, 140 N. C. 429, 53 S. E. 229; Herring v. Dixon, 122 N. C. 420, 20 S. E. 368; Tate v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 812, 30 S. E. 352. Speaking to this subject in his learned and able argument, counsel for plaintiff well said: "To-day, when the industrial activities of men have multiplied, when specialization is the order of the hour, and every man is to some extent dependent upon the products and the purse of his fellow man, when the social instinct has become a habit and demands a larger field than the neighborhood, the need for roads has become a necessity, both to the commercial and social life of our people. Without them the state cannot maintain effective order nor administer adequate justice. In equal measure, they are dependent upon the power of the state. They cannot be constructed without the right of eminent domain, nor maintained save by a community of interests made stable by legislative enactment."

[6] The statute in question expressly creates the municipal corporation to be known as the board of trustees of Youngsville township, gives them as such the entire management and control of the public roads of the township, confers upon them power to issue and sell the bonds, and apply the proceeds to the purpose designated. On authority, therefore, we are of opinion that the bonds are valid, and that no good reason is shown why performance of the contract of sale should not be enforced. For the reason stated, the judgment of the lower court must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Judgment reversed.

STEELMAN v. LAFFERTY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
June 8, 1911.)

1. FISH (§ 7*)—OYSTER BEDS—EASEMENTS—DOMINANT TENEMENTS.

Where a plaintiff brought ejectment for oyster beds, claiming them as appurtenant to his land, but failed to prove the location of his land, or that it was adjacent to the oyster beds, a judgment in his favor cannot be supported, for the dominant tenement must first be located, before the existence of the servient tenement can be determined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. EJECTMENT (§ 111*)—VERDICT—EFFECT.

As a verdict in ejectment which finds for part only of the lands sued for must designate the boundaries of such property, or refer to some certain standard from which they can be ascertained, a verdict which referred to a declaration which described certain lands, but gave no starting point from which they could be identified, is insufficient to support a judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 327-345; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

3. EJECTMENT (§ 90*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action of ejectment, where oyster beds were claimed as appurtenant to certain upland, evidence of a grant of that same land to one other than the plaintiff is admissible, tending to show an outstanding legal title in some one other than the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 254-277; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Northampton County.

Ejectment by A. B. Lafferty against N. B. Steelman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Otho F. Mears, for plaintiff in error.
Gardiner R. Nottingham and Thos. B. Robertson, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The defendant in error, Lafferty, brought this action of ejectment in the circuit court of Northampton county to recover of the defendant, Steelman, seven parcels of land, described in the declaration as "lying and being in the said county of Northampton and containing an area of seven and two-tenths acres, four and one-fourth acres, one and three-fourths acres, four-tenths acres, fifty-five one-hundredths acres, four and three-fourths acres, two and two-tenths acres, and ten and nine-tenths acres, all of said tracts being situated on the southern side of what is commonly known as Lafferty's or Godwin's Island, and bounded on the north, east, south, and west by the lands of the said A. B. Lafferty."

The jury found the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, that he recover from the defendant possession of the tracts of land described and specified in the declaration as being situate in the tributaries of Godwin's Island creek, containing two and two-tenths acres, fifty-five one-hundredths acres, four and one-fourth acres, and one and three-tenths acres, and that he is entitled to said parcels of land in fee simple." Upon this verdict the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant's title to the parcels of land held by him is founded upon an assignment, under the oyster laws of the state, from the oyster inspector for district 23A, in Northampton county. He has paid all rents, taxes, and fees, as required by law, and planted a large quantity of oysters on the ground assigned to him. The plaintiff's title is based upon a tax deed from the clerk of the court, bearing date February 11, 1890, whereby, for the consideration of $2.50, he conveyed to the plaintiff real estate, standing in the name of Jesse Hutcheson and sold for delinquent taxes. The tax deed (after reciting that there was a report of the county surveyor "specifying the metes and bounds" of the real estate, "and the names of the owners of the adjoining tracts or lots, and giving further description of the land as will identify the same") grants to Lafferty "that tract of land sold by the treasurer of Northampton county as aforesaid, described as Godwin's Island, containing forty-three and three-fourths acres, and mentioned in the said report of the said county surveyor, as surrounded by New Inlet, Wreck Island creek, Ship Shoals inlet, and Godwin's Island creek, for a more particular description of which reference is made to said report."

[1] The report of the surveyor was lost and its contents not proved. The land books of the county show that the only land assessed to the plaintiff in Northampton county is 44 acres, valued at $50, and buildings at $100, and that the total tax assessed thereon for the year 1908 was $2.42; yet the land included in this tax title deed forms the nucleus for a claim by the plaintiff to a boundary of 1,400 or 1,500 acres (or, according to the estimate of one of the oyster inspectors, to from 2,000 to 3,000 acres) of alleged tributary lands, to low-water mark, where the waters ebb bare. But the evidence fails to locate and identify the 40-odd acres of land acquired by the plaintiff at the tax sale, and consequently it does not and cannot appear that the outlying oyster-planting ground assigned to the defendant is in anywise appurtenant to the original tract. Indeed, the consensus of the testimony of witnesses both for the plaintiff and defendant (including that of the county surveyor) is that the lands claimed by the plaintiff cannot be located. Nor was it shown that the lands described in the declaration as "situated on the southern side of what is commonly known as Lafferty's or Godwin's Island" are bounded by the lands of the plaintiff. That averment has for its support the opinion of the plaintiff, whose conclusion is drawn from undisclosed facts. Obviously the dominant estate must first be clearly located, in order to determine the extent of the servient tenement.

[2] Nor is the situation aided by the verdict, which finds four out of the seven parcels of ground sued for, for a description of which the declaration is referred to.

In Slocum v. Compton, 93 Va. 374, 25 S. E. 3, the court held: "Where the verdict in an action of ejectment is for a part only of the land sued for, the boundaries of the part recovered should be designated. The verdict must be certain in itself, or must refer to some certain standard by which to ascertain the land found; otherwise, it will be too uncertain to warrant a judgment upon it."

The present case in this aspect is quite similar to the case of Merritt v. Bunting, 107 Va. 174, 57 S. E. 567, where Judge Cardwell, speaking for the court, says: "To sustain his contention that, as riparian owner, he also owned the whole of Little Assoteague Bay, it was necessary for Bunting (plaintiff in the action of ejectment) to establish his ownership of the lands adjacent to the bay on all of the shore sides thereof. * * * In other words, Bunting's claim is that he owned the whole of the bay by virtue of owning the high ground around the bay, that his title as owner of the ground around the bay extended to low-water mark, that the bay ebbed bare, and that he therefore owned the whole of the bay." The court held that "the land conveyed was described as situated on Chingoteague Island and embraced within courses and distances, but no starting point or ending point is given, and hence the location of the land could not have been ascertained, and the deed is inoperative as against a subsequent purchaser for value, even if he had notice of its existence." Mundy v. Vawter, 8 Grat. 518; Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 35, 34 S. E. 890; Reid v. Rhodes, 106 Va. 701, 56 S. E. 722.

[3] If, therefore, there were no other assignment of error, the failure of the plaintiff to establish his title to the parcels of oyster-planting ground in the possession of the defendant as appurtenant to the 44 acres acquired by him at the tax sale would necessitate a reversal of the judgment. But we are of opinion that the court also erred in excluding from the evidence the grant from the commonwealth to Hutcheson, dated March 18, 1877. That grant conveyed to Hutcheson 855.37 acres of land situated in Northampton county, including Ship Shoal and Godwin's Islands, and was admissible evidence as tending to show an outstanding legal title to at least part of the appurtenant lands claimed by the plaintiff.

As the case must be remanded for a new trial along essentially different lines, we deem it unnecessary to notice objections to the ruling of the court with respect to instructions.

For these reasons, the judgment must be reversed.

Reversed.

ALLISON v. CITY OF FREDERICKSBURG.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
June 8, 1911.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 58*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

To warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances.

show that the injury was not the proximate cause of the loss of plaintiff's leg, but that it was due to sarcoma, which could not have been reasonably anticipated by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 19*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Plaintiff stepped into a hole in the plank-ing over a gutter, but there was no apparent mark of injury. Some months later she developed sarcoma of the bone, for which her leg was amputated. The uncontradicted medical testimony was that no such result could have been anticipated from the accident, though it was agreed by the experts that the dormant sarcoma either was or might have been incited by the injury. Held, that the court properly took from the jury the question whether the sarcoma and loss of plaintiff's leg was the natural and probable consequence of stepping through the hole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-53; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

4. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—INADEQUATE DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries from falling into a hole in a bridge, where plaintiff subsequently developed sarcoma, necessitating the amputation of her leg, held that, the sarcoma, and not the accident, being the cause of the amputation, $1,200 was a liberal award for the pain shown by the evidence to have been suffered by the plaintiff as the direct and proximate result of the alleged negligence, and therefore the verdict could not be disturbed on the ground of inadequacy.

Error to Corporation Court of Fredericksburg.

Action by Maud Allison, by next friend, against the City of Fredericksburg. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Wm. W. Butzner and G. B. Wallace, for plaintiff in error. St. George R. Fitzhugh, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by Maud Allison, an infant, by her father, as her next friend, to recover damages for an injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant city. There was a verdict and judgment for $1,200 in favor of the plaintiff, which she now asks this court to reverse and set aside upon the ground that the jury was misdirected, the damages allowed inadequate, and the verdict contrary to the law and the evidence.

It is alleged that the defendant negligent-ly allowed a hole to remain in a small plank bridge that it maintained across one of its sidewalks on Main street as the covering to a gutter. The record shows that in February, 1909, the plaintiff, a girl between 10 and 11 years of age, while returning from school, stepped into this hole. There were no appar-ent ill effects from the accident, not even an abrasion of the skin. The plaintiff mention-ed to her friends the fact that she had step-ped into the hole, but made no complaint of being seriously hurt. In the following April a small lump had developed on her leg, and she was observed to limp. The family phy-sician was consulted several times—the last on the 28th of June. He regarded the mat-ter of no importance, and finally told the father that there was no occasion for him to see the plaintiff again, and that he need feel no concern on her account. No doctor was seen again until about the 9th day of the following November. In the meantime, from February to November, the plaintiff was pur-suing her usual activities, going to school until its close in June, with the exception of one week, and again at school from the time it opened in September until Novem-ber. About the 9th of November the lump on the leg appearing more serious, several specialists were consulted, who diagnosed the plaintiff's trouble as sarcoma of the bone, a malignant cancerous disease, and advised amputation of the limb as the only means of saving her life. The leg was amputated No-vember 14, 1909, and this suit was brought to the following December rules.

The court, among others, gave the jury the following instruction: "There can be no recovery of damages for an alleged injury, unless the negligence charged as causing such injury was the proximate cause of such in-jury, that in order to warrant a finding by the jury that negligence is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury complained of was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances; hence, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the diseased condition of the plaintiff's leg, and the suffering occasioned thereby, was the result of a malignant tumor known as 'sarcoma,' and that the amputation of the plaintiff's leg was rendered necessary by rea-son of such sarcoma, then the court instructs the jury that sarcoma was not the result nat-urally and reasonably to be expected from the injury received by the plaintiff at the bridge, that it was not the natural and prob-able consequence of the alleged negligence of the city, and the jury cannot find any dam-ages for the plaintiff on account of said dis-ease, and its attendant suffering, whether physical or mental, nor for the loss of her leg. The court further instructs the jury, if they shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff fell through the bridge on upper Main street, by reason of the negligence of the defendant city, and was injured thereby, then she is entitled to recover damages for any physical pain and suffering which the jury may believe from the evidence was the direct and proximate result of the defend-ant's negligence."

The crucial question in this case is raised by the first branch of this instruction, which was given over the protest of the plaintiff.

The objection urged is twofold: First, that the instruction does not correctly state the law touching the doctrine of "proximate cause"; and, second, that the court thereby decides as matter of law that stepping into the hole in the bridge was not the proximate cause of the sarcoma or the loss by the plaintiff of her leg, whereas that question should have been left to the determination of the jury upon the evidence.

[1] In the case of Scheffer v. Railroad Co., 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. Ed. 1070, the plaintiff was injured in a collision of two trains. The declaration alleged injuries to body, brain, spine, and nervous system, which it was further alleged had produced the insanity which ended in the plaintiff's suicide, eight months after the injury was sustained in the railroad collision. There was a demurrer to the declaration, which was sustained; Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for a unanimous court, saying: "To warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances."

This language of the Supreme Court has been twice adopted by this court as a correct statement of the law, and the principle involved has been stated in other cases. Connell v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 93 Va. 57, 24 S. E. 467, 32 L. R. A. 792, 57 Am. St. Rep. 786; Fowlkes v. Southern R. Co., 96 Va. 742, 32 S. E. 464.

In the last-named case, Judge Keith, speaking for this court, quotes the language of Justice Miller with approval, and further says: "It is not only requisite that damage, actual or inferential, should be suffered, but this damage must be the legitimate sequence of the thing amiss. The maxim of the law here applicable is that in law the immediate, and not the remote, cause of any event is regarded; in other words, the law always refers the injury to the proximate, not to the remote, cause. If an injury has resulted in consequence of a certain wrongful act or omission, but only through or by means of some intervening cause, from which last cause the injury followed as a direct and immediate consequence, the law will refer the damage to the last or proximate cause, and refuse to trace it to that which was more remote. To the proximate cause we may usually trace consequences with some degree of assurance, but beyond that we enter a field of conjecture, where the uncertainty renders the attempt at exact conclusions futile. If the wrong and the resulting damages are not known by common experience to be naturally and usually in sequence, and the damage does not, according to the ordinary course of events, follow from the wrong, then the wrong and the damage are not sufficiently conjoined or concatenated as cause and effect to support an action."

In Va. Iron & Coal Co. v. Kiser, 105 Va. 704, 54 S. E. 892, Judge Cardwell expresses the principle of the cases cited as follows: "A defendant, in an action to recover damages for a personal injury, cannot be held liable therefor, unless the neglect of some duty he owed the injured party was the proximate cause of the injury. The first requisite of proximate cause is the doing or omitting to do an act which a person of ordinary prudence could foresee might naturally or probably produce the injury, and the second requisite is that it did produce it."

A casual examination of the instruction under consideration shows that the law is there stated in substantially the language of the controlling decisions we have cited.

[2] The conclusion, from this branch of the instruction, that the sarcoma and the loss of the leg were not naturally and reasonably to be expected from the injury received by the plaintiff at the bridge, and that they were not the natural and probable consequences of the alleged negligence of the city, was inevitable in the light of the evidence. The record shows that three doctors were examined, who concur in the opinion that sarcoma is a malignant cancerous tumor in the system, that is sometimes developed by an injury. One of them says that, in this case, the dormant sarcoma may have been incited to development by the slight injury at the bridge; the other two are of the opinion that the development was incited by that injury. All three, however, concur in the opinion that it would have been impossible for any one to have foreseen or anticipated such a result from such an accident—one of them saying on this point that "no human power could have foreseen the occurrence of a malignant growth as the result of that injury, at that time; therefore, it was not usual. * * * I don't think this was the usual or common result of an injury of that kind, because, as I have testified before, I think 100 children might have fallen through there and had similar injuries, and a cancer not occur in any one of the 100."

Bringing this case to the test of the principles announced, it is clear that the injury sustained by her in stepping into the hole in the bridge was not the proximate cause of the loss of the plaintiff's leg. The sarcoma was not the natural and probable consequence of the plaintiff's foot going through the hole in the bridge, and could not have been foreseen in the light of the circumstances attending the alleged negligence of the city.

[3] The second objection to this branch of the instruction is that the question of proximate cause was not one of law to be determined by the court, but was a question of fact to be submitted to the jury.

This objection cannot be sustained. The law is well settled to the contrary. When the question is involved in doubt, and the evidence is conflicting, it is a question for the jury; but when there is no doubt, and no conflict in the evidence, as in the case at bar, it is a question to be determined by the court.

In the case of Scheffer v. Railroad Co., supra, the Supreme Court sustained a demurrer to the declaration, holding that there was no proximate cause between the alleged negligence of the railroad and the subsequent death of the plaintiff.

In Fowlkes v. Southern Ry. Co., supra, the law is stated as follows: "It is the province of the court to determine in the first instance whether or not the facts offered in evidence tended to prove an injury to the plaintiff too remote from the defendant's act of negligence to constitute an element of the plaintiff's recovery."

In Winchester v. Carroll, 99 Va. 744, 40 S. E. 40, the court says: "The general doctrine is that whether one has been guilty of negligence or not is a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined by the court where the facts are undisputed or conclusively proved, but not to be withdrawn from the jury when the facts are disputed or the evidence conflicting."

[4] Under the latter branch of the instruction, the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,200. This was a liberal award of damages for the pain shown by the record to have been suffered by the plaintiff as the direct and proximate result of the alleged negligence of the city, and therefore the verdict cannot be disturbed upon the ground of inadequacy.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and it must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

BACKUS v. NORFOLK & A. TERMINAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
June 8, 1911.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 421*)—INJURY TO ANIMALS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where plaintiff's servant drove along parallel to defendant's track for 180 yards, and onto the crossing, without looking in the direction from which he had come, the track being visible for between a quarter and half a mile from the crossing, it was contributory negligence, barring recovery for injury to the team by collision at the crossing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1501-1510; Dec. Dig. § 421.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 419*)—INJURY TO ANIMALS—CARE REQUIRED OF MOTORMAN.

The motorman of an electric car, who saw a team walking toward a crossing, and with nothing to indicate that the driver was not in full control of the team or was not in full possession of his faculties, was entitled to presume that he would not drive onto the crossing in front of the car, when in plain sight.

Error to Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Action by one Backus against the Norfolk & Atlantic Terminal Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Thos. H. Willcox, for plaintiff in error.
Williams & Tunstall, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff in error, Backus, to recover damages for injuries to a pair of mules, wagon, and harness, suffered in a collision with one of the defendant's cars at a road crossing in Norfolk county, between Pine Beach and the city of Norfolk. The judgment under review was rendered for the defendant on a demurrer to the evidence.

[1] At the point of collision the defendant's road (a double track) runs through the plaintiff's farm, and on the day of the accident his negro driver was engaged in hauling hay from the west side of the road over the crossing to his barn and stables on the east side. The plaintiff's residence is located about 180 yards north of the crossing, access to which is afforded by a boulevard running parallel with the defendant's right of way.

When the driver set out from the barn, he looked toward Pine Beach, and, seeing no car approaching, drove to the crossing and upon the track, without looking again in that direction. To quote his own language: "I did not look that way then (after driving on the west track) until my mules got scared. After my mules got scared, I looked up and saw the car."

From the crossing in a northerly direction the view of the track is unobstructed for a distance of a quarter to half a mile, yet the driver before going on the track wholly failed to look in that direction to find out if he could cross in safety. In these circumstances he was plainly guilty of such negligence as would bar a recovery, unless the defendant, after knowing of the danger, or after it should have been discovered by the use of ordinary diligence, failed to exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury.

When the driver got upon the track, one of his mules scared at a hole in the bridge and stopped, and would not go forward. He then for the first time looked up the track and saw the car 75 yards away, approaching at full speed. He held up his hands as a signal to the motorman to stop, but the collision was at that time inevitable.

[2] We have found nothing, after a careful inspection of the evidence, to bring the case within the influence of the doctrine of discovered peril, or the last clear chance. The motorman saw the team coming down the boulevard at a walk, and had no reason to suspect that the driver would attempt to cross in front of him with his car in plain view. As soon as the danger was discovered, he shut off the current and put on the emergency brake; but it was impossible then to avert the accident. The colliding train consisted of a heavy motor car with a trailer attached, the schedule speed of which was from 30 to 40 miles an hour. The undisputed evidence shows that the motorman could not have stopped the cars under 400 feet.

In the case of Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Daves, 108 Va. 514, 518, 519, 62 S. E. 337, 339, the court says: "The engineman on the defendant's train saw the deceased as he was driving along the highway toward the crossing, some 70 or 80 feet from it. The fireman saw him when he was some 50 feet from it. The plaintiff's intestate, when seen by the trainmen, was sitting on the running gears of his wagon, driving very slowly along the highway. * * * There was nothing in the conduct of the plaintiff's intestate to indicate that he was not in the full possession of his faculties, that he did not know that the train was rapidly approaching, that his team was not entirely under his control, or anything to indicate that he intended to cross, or attempt to cross, the railroad track in front of the train, which was in full view. Under these circumstances, the trainmen had a right to presume that he would stop, and not go upon the track." Southern Railway Company v. Daves, 108 Va. 378, 61 S. E. 748; Virginia-Carolina Ry. Co. v. Clawson's Adm'r, 111 Va. 313, 63 S. E. 1003.

The principles enunciated in these cases and many others are conclusive, when applied to the facts of this case, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed.

A real estate broker must complete the sale, with a purchaser able, ready, and willing to complete the purchase upon the terms agreed upon, before he is entitled to his commissions; and when he has found such a purchaser, who has entered into a valid contract, his right to compensation cannot be defeated by the seller's misrepresentation, or by his unreasonable refusal to comply with his contract.

Error to Circuit Court, Goochland County.

Action by R. F. Vaughan against Alfred Pleasonton and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Rosewell Page, John Rutherford, C. B. Sands, and D. H. & Walter Leake, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Moncure & Gordon, for defendants in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by R. F. Vaughan, a real estate agent, to recover of Alfred and Theresa Pleasonton $2,000 commissions, alleged to be due the plaintiff on a sale alleged to have been made by him for the defendants of their landed estate in Goochland county, at the price of $40,000.

There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants, to which this writ of error was awarded.

The essential facts in the case are few and undisputed. It appears that on March 10, 1909, the defendants united in the following letter to the plaintiff: "You are hereby authorized to sell our farms, composed of Bolling Hall, Woodville, and Pocahontas, in Goochland county, Virginia, and containing about 2,000 acres, more or less, for the sum of $50,000, and we agree to pay you 5 per cent. commission on said price, or on whatever price we accept from your customer, said commissions to be paid out of the first cash payment, if sold through your agency."

In pursuance of this authority the plaintiff, in the following May, submitted to the defendants an offer of $40,000 for the property, made by Thomas S. Winston, which they agreed to accept, upon certain terms and conditions. In pursuance of this understanding a contract was then prepared between all the parties, including the proposed purchaser, by the plaintiff, Vaughan, the agent, which, "although not signed, was according to the testimony of all sides satisfactory to the Pleasontons and to Winston; the significance of this paper being that it embodied the terms upon which all parties were willing to meet." This statement with respect to the Vaughan contract is taken from the petition for the writ of error, and is fully sustained by the evidence. This contract set forth the property sold, which the parties of the first part covenanted to convey by a good and sufficient deed, and provided that the purchaser should assume a mortgage on the property of $15,000 and pay the balance of $25,000 in cash; these terms to be complied with as soon as the attorney for the purchaser should procure all necessary papers and releases of deeds and suits from the circuit court of Goochland county, affecting the title to said lands. The purchaser agreed to comply with these terms and to pay $1,000 in cash, the receipt of which was acknowledged in the contract, to bind the sale, which sum was to be refunded if the title to the property was not good.

At the time this contract was prepared, May 31, 1909, it was understood that all parties should meet in Richmond on the 9th day of the ensuing June and complete the sale by carrying out its terms. In accordance with this understanding, the parties, except the purchaser, met in Richmond. The purchaser, who was absent on other business, designated his attorney, who was present to act for him in carrying into final completion the terms of purchase agreed upon. When the parties met, the attorney for the purchaser presented a contract, prepared by him, for the parties to execute, which was radically different in its terms from the Vaughan contract of May 31st, which all had agreed to. There was pending in the circuit court of Goochland county against the Pleasontons a creditors' suit, in which there had been no decree for sale, and the new contract provided that the sale should be ratified by the court, that a special commissioner should be appointed to unite with the proposed vendors in a deed to the purchaser, that the $25,000 which it had been agreed should be paid in cash should be paid in bank to the credit of the court, and should not be paid until the attorney had procured all necessary decrees, orders, releases, and other things that he might think necessary to perfect the title, that the vendors should assign to the purchaser all leases now existing between either Alfred Pleasonton or his wife, and that from the date of the contract the vendors should cut no timber on the lands, nor permit any wood or timber not already cut to be removed therefrom. This new contract also omitted the provision of the Vaughan contract, which had been agreed to, that the purchaser should pay $1,000 down upon its execution to bind the contract, which was to be refunded if the title was not good.

When this contract was presented and insisted upon by the attorney of the purchaser, the proposed vendors protested that it was not the contract agreed upon, and they refused to sign it. Thereupon, the attorney abandoned further conference on the subject, and the defendants treated the proposed sale as off, and on the same day sold the property to one W. E. Harris for $42,500, Harris paying $1,000 at once, assuming certain liens on the property, and agreeing to pay the vendors the balance within 30 days, which balance was to be paid in part with a certificate for 100 shares of stock in a coal and coke company, valued at $14,900.

The essential difference between the Vaughan contract, which embodied the terms upon which all parties had met and agreed, and the contract insisted upon by the attorney for Thomas S. Winston, was that the latter contract provided that $25,000 of the purchase money should be paid upon the ratification of the contract by the circuit court of Goochland county, and the execution by its special commissioner and the vendors of a good and sufficient deed, and that such $25,000 should not be paid into bank to the credit of the court until the attorney of the proposed purchaser should procure all necessary decrees, orders, releases, and other things that he thought necessary to perfect the title. The effect of this provision was that after the attorney had procured all necessary decrees, orders, releases, and other things he might think necessary to perfect the title—after everything had been done that he considered necessary to protect his client—that then the entire $25,000 should be paid by the purchaser into the bank to the court's credit. This $25,000 included the equity of redemption of the Pleasontons in the property, which, as shown by the record, amounted to about $17,000. In other words, after the purchaser was safe, the balance due the Pleasontons was to be deposited to the credit of the court. It cannot be successfully contended that they were either unreasonable or whimsical in refusing to accede to such conditions, so manifestly unjust to them and unnecessary for the protection of the proposed purchaser. Winston, in his testimony, says that he did not "insist on the payment of the money into court, which was done by his attorney without his knowledge." The Vaughan contract, which all parties had agreed to, had no such provisions as these. It only provided for $25,000 in cash, and assuming to pay a mortgage of $15,000 when the attorney for the purchaser should procure all necessary papers, releases of deeds and suits from the circuit court of Goochland county affecting the title to said lands. The Vaughan contract acknowledged the receipt of $1,000 in cash to bind the sale. The Pleasontons attached great importance to this provision of the contract, but it was omitted from the new contract prepared by the attorney for the proposed purchaser. On this point Winston, in his testimony, says that at the time Vaughan offered him the place for $40,000 he told him that the Pleasontons required him to pay $1,000 down in order to bind the bargain, and that this provision was part of the contract prepared by Vaughan, and that he did not object to it, but left the whole matter to his attorney.

[1] "A real estate broker, to be entitled to compensation, must complete the sale. He must find a purchaser in a situation ready and willing to complete the purchase upon the terms agreed upon before he is entitled to his commissions. When he has found such a purchaser, who has entered into a valid contract, his right to compensation cannot be defeated by the fault of the seller, by his misrepresentation, or by his whimsical or unreasonable refusal to comply with his contract." Crockett v. Grayson, 98 Va. 354, 36 S. E. 477.

[2] In the case at bar it is clear that there was no completed sale between the Pleasontons and Winston. A sale of real estate involves the adjustment of many matters besides fixing the price, and these are for the determination of the seller. These had been agreed upon in this case by the sellers and the purchaser, and had been reduced to writing by the plaintiff, who was the agent of the defendants. These were the only terms upon which the defendants were willing to sell, or had ever agreed to sell, and they were ready to carry them out. The contract which the attorney for the purchaser sought to substitute contained terms which the defendants had never agreed to, and left out terms which had been agreed upon. It is clear that the contract of sale which the plaintiff attempted to consummate between his principals and Thomas S. Winston was not defeated through any fault of the sellers, who were neither unreasonable nor whimsical in refusing to execute the contract which was insisted upon by the attorney for the purchaser. The sale having failed of completion through no fault of the defendants, they are under no obligation to pay the plaintiff the commissions sought to be recovered in this suit.

As said in Crockett v. Grayson, supra, we do not deem it necessary to enter into a critical examination of the instructions given and refused upon the trial, for upon the facts presented to the jury they could not with propriety have found any other verdict than that at which they arrived.

The judgment of the circuit court, approving that verdict, must therefore be affirmed. Affirmed.

FREITAS v. GRIFFITH & BOYD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

EXECUTION (§ 386*)—SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDINGS—EXAMINATION OF THIRD PERSONS—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

Proceedings on suggestion of an execution creditor, authorized by Code 1904, §§ 3609-3613, against persons indebted to the judgment debtor, or who have property of his in their possession, do not extend to a case of the wife of a debtor, claiming personal property under transfer from the debtor, as the proceeding only contemplates reaching property which the debtor himself could sue for; the proper remedy being by suit by the officer holding the writ, under section 3614.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Dec. Dig. § 386.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Action by Griffith & Boyd against M. J. Freitas. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

J. Edward Cole and E. R. F. Wells, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Sargeant, Jr., for defendants in error.

WHITTLE, J. The defendants in error, Griffith & Boyd, execution creditors of J. D. Freitas, the husband of the plaintiff in error, M. J. Freitas, issued a summons against her under section 3609 of the Code of 1904, in which they suggested that by reason of the lien of their fieri facias there was a liability on her for the amount of either judgment. On the return day of the summons the garnishee answered, denying that she was either indebted to J. D. Freitas or had any effects belonging to him in her possession. Whereupon the plaintiffs suggested that the garnishee had not fully disclosed her liability, and, neither party demanding a jury, the court proceeded to hear the whole matter of law and fact, and being of opinion that certain personal property in the possession of and claimed by the wife as her own, of the estimated value of $500, had been transferred by the husband to the wife in fraud of the rights of the plaintiffs, rendered judgment against her for that sum, to be applied towards satisfying the plaintiffs' judgment.

Several assignments of error were pressed in argument; but, in our view of the case, the controlling question involves the power of the circuit court, in a summons on suggestion by an execution creditor of a husband, to set aside an alleged fraudulent transfer of personal property from him to the wife.

Proceedings on suggestion are prescribed by sections 3609 to 3613 of the Code, inclusive, and by the terms of these enactments the court can make no order against the party summoned, unless he is found to be either indebted to the execution debtor or to have estate of such debtor in his possession. In the present case, neither of these conditions was shown to exist. It was not pretended that the garnishee was indebted to the execution debtor, or that she had estate of the defendant in her hands. Indeed, the fact was gravely controverted whether the property in question had ever belonged to the husband. On the contrary, the wife asserted absolute title to the property, which she maintained had been in her undisputed possession for years, and used by her on her farm near the city of Norfolk.

Conceding, however, for the purposes of this case, that the property originally belonged to the husband, and was transferred by him to the wife, the transfer, nevertheless, would have been binding upon the husband, and he could not have maintained a suit against the wife for its recovery. The statute does not contemplate or operate upon estate in possession of the garnishee to which he has title, but only estate of the execution debtor for the recovery of which he may maintain an action in his own behalf against the holder. The law, in one form or another, makes ample provision for the recovery and subjection of all the debtor's personal estate on which the writ of fieri facias is a lien; but this special procedure by suggestion is available only in the two instances mentioned in the statute. It affords no remedy for the enforcement of purely equitable liabilities. Section 3614 provides an efficient remedy, by action at law or suit in equity in the name of the officer, to recover estate, or for the enforcement of any liability in respect to any such estate, on which a fieri facias in his hands, or the judgment on which it issues, is a lien.

In Swann v. Summers, 19 W. Va. 115, the West Virginia court, in construing sections of the Code of that state substantially the same as the Virginia statute, held that in a proceeding on suggestion the court could make no order against the garnishee, unless he owes a debt to the defendant in execution or has in his hands personal estate of such defendant, for which debt or estate the defendant could maintain an action at law. Otherwise, suit would have to be brought under a statute corresponding to section 3614 of the Virginia Code.

In addition to the remedy given by section 3614, it was held in Hoge v. Turner, 96 Va. 624, 32 S. E. 291, that "creditors, seeking to avoid a conveyance of personal property from a husband to a wife on the ground of fraud, may either sue in equity to avoid the conveyance and subject the property, or they may ignore the conveyance, and, after obtaining judgment, levy an execution on the property and sell it. In the latter case, if the wife claims the property levied on for her husband's debts, and an indemnifying bond is given for her protection, she may assert her claim by a suit on the indemnifying bond"—citing Harvey v. Fox, 5 Leigh, 444; Green, Trustee, v. Spaulding, 76 Va. 411; 4 Min. Inst. (1st Ed.) 818.

For these reasons, the judgment under review must be reversed, and this court will enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered, dismissing the proceeding.

SMILEY v. SMILEY'S ADM'X et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
June 8, 1911.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 305*)—SHARING PROFITS AND LOSSES—DIVISION OF CAPITAL.

The general rule, that in the absence of any agreement, express or implied, partners share profits and losses of the business equally, although they have not contributed equally to the partnership capital, does not apply to the division of partnership capital; but partners may by agreement provide for an equal share in the capital, although their contributions thereto are unequal.

2. REFERENCE (§ 99*)—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where the evidence is taken before the commissioner, and is conflicting, and there are circumstances affecting the credibility of some of the witnesses, their bearing on the stand is of importance in determining the weight of their testimony, and findings of fact by the commissioner should not as a rule be disturbed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Henrico County.

Action between W. A. Smiley and Alfred Smiley's administratrix and others. From a judgment sustaining exceptions to the findings of a commissioner, W. A. Smiley appeals. Reversed in part, and remanded.

R. E. Peyton, Jr., and Scott, Buchanan & Cardwell, for appellant. C. W. Throckmorton, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. The question to be determined on this appeal is whether or not Alfred Smiley and Warren A. Smiley owned an equal interest or share in the farm, as well as in the stock and other personal property purchased and used in their partnership business of farming and stock raising. It is a conceded fact in the case that Alfred Smiley, the father, in the purchase of the farm, which was conveyed to him and his son, Warren A. Smiley, jointly, paid more of the purchase price thereof than was paid by his son. The claim of the son, the appellant, is that when he and his father removed from the state of Michigan to this state, and purchased the farm for their partnership or joint business, while no written agreement was entered into between them, it was understood and agreed that they would devote their time, property, and combined resources for the purpose of operating the farm and the payment of the purchase price thereof, and that everything should be held and owned by them equally. The contention of the appellees, who are the other heirs and distributees of Alfred Smiley, deceased, and his widow, on the other hand, is that the partners were equally bound for the payment of the deferred purchase price of the land, and that, as the father paid more upon that account than his son, the latter must account to his father's estate for one-half of that excess, and that his half interest in the proceeds of the sale of the farm, which has been sold, is chargeable therewith.

Both the court and the commissioner were of opinion that the father and the son were partners in the land, as well as in the business for which it was used by them. The commissioner, to whom was referred the question of ascertaining what interest the son had in the real estate, was of opinion that the evidence established the claim of the appellant that there was an agreement between him and his father by which, although the amount contributed by each to the partnership was unequal, yet that they were to be equally interested in the farm, as well as in the business carried on by them, and so reported. This finding was excepted to by the appellees, and the court sustained the exception, being of opinion that each of the partners was bound to contribute one-half the capital thereof, and that the evidence did not show that the father gave to his son any excess which he, the father, put into the partnership over the amount of money contributed by the son.

[1] The general rule seems to be that in the absence of any agreement, express or implied, between partners in respect to their shares in the profits and losses of the business, they are to share equally, although they may not have contributed equally to the partnership capital. Story on Partnership, § 24; 2 Lindley on Partnership, 676-678; 3 Min. Inst. 691, 692; 3 Kent's Com. (s. p.) 28; 30 Cyc. 451. But while this is the general rule as to profits and losses, it is not the rule as to the division of the partnership capital.

In discussing this question, Lindley on Partnership (volume 2, p. 676) says: "When it is said that the shares of partners are prima facie equal, although their capitals are unequal, what is meant [is] that the losses of capital, like other losses, must be shared equally; but it is not meant that on a final settlement of accounts capitals contributed unequally are to be treated as one aggregate fund, which ought to be divided among the partners in equal shares." See, also, Moley v. Brine, 120 Mass. 324; Jackson v. Crapp, 32 Ind. 422; Johnson v. Ballard, 83 Tex. 486, 18 S. W. 686; 30 Cyc. 691, 692. But the partners may by agreement provide for an equal share in the capital, although their input is unequal. See 30 Cyc. 691, 692; 3 Min. Inst. 693, 694.

This proposition we do not understand is controverted by the appellees, but their contention is that the evidence does not establish any such agreement between the partners.

[2] The evidence on this question is conflicting. The witnesses were before the commissioner. There were circumstances in evidence tending to affect the credibility of some of them. Their bearing on the stand was, therefore, an important matter in considering their testimony, especially that of the appellant, who was rendered a competent witness by reason of the other parties in interest having first testified. Code 1904, § 3346; Brock's Adm'r v. Brock, 92 Va. 173, 23 S. E. 224. If he is to be believed, and no witness contradicts him, as to the agreement between him and his father, there can be no question that when he and his father came to this state, and purchased the farm, it was understood and agreed between them, notwithstanding the fact that the father had more means than the son, that they were to combine their resources in conducting their partnership business and in paying for the farm, and that the son was to have an equal interest with the father in the business and in the ownership of the farm. When the testimony is considered as a whole, without discussing it in detail, we are of opinion that the commissioner was well warranted in reaching the conclusion that he did, and the exceptions to his report ought to have been overruled.

Where, as was said by Judge Whittle in delivering the opinion of the court in Lusk v. Pelter, 101 Va. 790, 798, 45 S. E. 333, 336, "evidence consists of the depositions of witnesses, and they are taken by the commissioner or in his presence, he has the advantage of noting the demeanor of the witnesses, their intelligence and manner of testifying, which is of importance in judging of their credibility and weighing their evidence. The findings of a commissioner upon a question of fact will not as a rule be disturbed when the evidence is conflicting. Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 479 [22 S. E. 458]; Taylor v. McDonald, 100 Va. 487 [41 S. E. 946]."

The court is of opinion that the decrees appealed from are erroneous, in so far as they are in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion, and to that extent must be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings, to be had not in conflict with this opinion.

†Rehearing denied September 14, 1911.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Suit by E. F. Randolph against B. F. Batchelder and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frick & Williams, for appellants. Frank L. Crocker and John W. Hopper, for appellee.

KEITH, P. In this case the court decreed that a certain deed, absolute upon its face, was a mortgage, that it should be reformed, and upon payment of the debt secured appointed commissioners to convey the title in fee simple to the land in the proceedings mentioned to the appellee, who has succeeded to all the rights of the grantors in the original deed.

[1-3] In Bachrach v. Bachrach, 68 S. E. 985, it is said: "A deed, although absolute on its face, may be shown by oral evidence to have been intended as a mortgage; and such evidence is not restricted to cases of fraud, accident, or mistake. The presumption, however, is that a deed absolute on its face is what it purports to be, and the oral evidence offered for the purpose of showing that it is a mortgage must be clear and convincing. Whether it is to be regarded as a mortgage depends upon the circumstances under which it was made and the relations and negotiations between the parties."

[4] The facts of the case before us are as follows: James A. Randolph was seised of two tracts of land in the county of Norfolk, one containing 66 acres, and the other 110 acres. His wife owned a tract in that county containing 150 acres. On the 17th of December, 1885, Randolph and his wife executed a deed of trust to B. M. Batchelder, trustee, on the 110-acre tract, to secure a note for $350. Payments on this loan were made for some years, when, from ill health and other causes, Randolph was unable to keep up the payments. In the meantime the taxes on this property owned by Randolph became delinquent for the years 1892, 1893, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, and 1899, and application was made for the purchase of the same from the commonwealth under the statute. Upon being informed of this application, some time in 1900, Mrs. Randolph went to the Norfolk county clerk's office and inquired about it, and B. M. Batchelder, trustee in the deed above mentioned, being present, was informed of the condition of affairs, and agreed to pay the taxes and take up the note for $350; Mrs. Randolph agreeing to this proposition. On the 12th day of December, 1900, B. M. Batchelder and his attorney, a notary public, came to complainant's home and brought with them a deed, dated the 1st of December, 1900, conveying all of the three tracts of land above mentioned to B. M. Batchelder for the expressed consideration of $807.66. A witness present at the time testified that she heard Mrs. Randolph ask Mr. Batchelder if he had the deed of trust for her to sign, to which he replied, "Yes, madam." The notary public, on the contrary, testified that he was present and heard no such conversation, and that, if he had heard it, he would not have certified the acknowledgment without being careful to explain the nature of the transaction to the parties signing the deed.

There is proof that the land, at the time of the sale, was worth not less than $1,500 or $2,000, and that it has greatly increased in value, and at the time of the decree was worth from $10,000 to $15,000. It appears, too, that the consideration named in the deed is within a few cents of the amount of the debt due under the deed of trust, together with the taxes and interest delinquent upon the land. It further appears that the grantors in the deed have remained in undisturbed possession; that they have exercised all the rights of ownership with respect to it, not only occupying it, but selling timber from it, and offering to sell and negotiating for the sale, with the knowledge of Batchelder, the grantee, of portions of the land. As to one of the three tracts, at the time the deed under consideration was made, Batchelder, the grantee, held the title as trustee, and Randolph, the husband, was shown to have been in very feeble health at the time of the transaction.

The circuit court was of opinion, and so decreed, that the deed from the Randolphs to Batchelder of the 12th of December, 1900, though absolute upon its face, was intended as a mortgage, and we are of opinion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain that conclusion. The decree appealed from is affirmed.

Affirmed.

NORFOLK FIRE INS. CO. v. TALLEY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

INSURANCE (§ 326*)—FIRE INSURANCE—PROVISION AGAINST FIREWORKS—GENERAL MERCHANDISE STORE.

In the absence of fraud or mistake, recovery cannot be had on a fire policy, conditioned to "be void if (any use or custom of trade * * * on the contrary notwithstanding) there be * * * on the above-described premises * * * fireworks," where fireworks were kept in stock in the building at the time of the fire, and this, though the building was insured as a "general merchandise" store, and fireworks are generally kept in such a store; the keeping of them not being necessary in such a business, and this, too, though the prohibition is in the printed part, and the description of the business to be conducted on the premises is in writing, the written part not overriding the printed part, except in case of irreconcilable conflict.

Error to Circuit Court, Louisa County.

Action by one Talley against the Norfolk Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Peatross & Savage and Gordon & Gordon, for plaintiff in error. Bibb & Bibb and Jas. L. Shelton, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This suit was brought to recover on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant company, insuring against loss by fire a certain building in the county of Louisa, used at the time as a store for general merchandise purposes. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, to which this writ of error was awarded.

The first assignment of error, which was to the action of the circuit court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration, was properly abandoned at bar.

A number of defenses were made by the defendant, and a number of assignments of error have been taken to the rulings of the circuit court, and discussed here; but, in our view of the case, there is one defense which conclusively settles the controversy in favor of the defendant, and therefore it will not be necessary to deal with others.

Among other provisions, the policy sued on contains the following condition: "This entire policy shall be void if (any usage or custom of trade or manufacture to the contrary notwithstanding) there be kept, used, or allowed on the above-described premises * * * fireworks."

Notwithstanding this express provision forbidding it, fireworks were kept in stock, and were in the building when the fire occurred. Over the objection of the defendant, the circuit court permitted the introduction of evidence tending to show that it was customary for general merchandise stores in Louisa county to carry fireworks as a part of their stock in trade, and instructed the jury that, although they believed from the evidence that fireworks were in the store at the time of the fire, yet if they believed that such goods were kept in general merchandise stores in the course of trade, and this was the custom and habit of such stores in that section, that then the keeping of such fireworks could not be a bar to recovery under the policy sued on.

These rulings of the circuit court were clearly erroneous. Contracts of insurance are subject to the same rules of construction that are applicable to other written contracts. Home Ins. Co. v. Gwathmey, 82 Va. 923, 1 S. E. 209; U. S. Mut. Accident Ass'n v. Newman, 84 Va. 52, 3 S. E. 805; Watertown Fire Ins. Co. v. Cherry, 84 Va. 72, 3 S. E. 876; Insurance Co. v. Devore, 88 Va. 773, 14 S. E. 532.

There is neither fraud nor mistake alleged in the execution of the policy in question. It is not denied that the plaintiff knew what the policy contained, but it is contended that the provision in question did not affect the right of the insured to keep and sell fireworks in the insured property, because it was usual in that county for general merchandise stores to keep and sell such goods; that the term "general merchandise" embraces fireworks, and the right to sell is implied, although the prohibition is express. This position cannot be sustained. The fact that fireworks are usually kept in country retail stores does not authorize their being kept and sold by one who has contracted in writing that he will not deal in them, and that the policy shall be void if violated in that particular. The reason for the prohibition may have arisen from the fact of the custom of selling fireworks in country stores; for, if the article was never found in such stocks, its prohibition would be useless.

The keeping of fireworks was a hazard which the premium paid did not cover, and its prohibition was, therefore, a material part of the contract, of the benefit of which the company could not be deprived because others kept fireworks in their stores. Assurance Co. v. Rector, 85 Ky. 294, 3 S. W. 415; Beer v. Insurance Co., 39 Ohio St. 109; Sperry v. Insurance Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 234; Steinbach v. Insurance Co., 13 Wall. 183, 20 L. Ed. 615; Insurance Company v. Gunther, 116 U. S. 113, 6 Sup. Ct. 306, 29 L. Ed. 575.

There are cases relied on by the plaintiff, where the policy or its meaning has been interpreted in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution, as where a building insured was being used for the manufacture of certain articles that required the use of inflammable material, and without which the building and the business in it would have been useless. In such cases it has been held that the right existed to keep and use everything necessary or essential to the manufacture of the articles, although forbidden; consent having been given by the company that the building insured might be used for the purpose of manufacturing the particular article. This line of cases has no application to the case at bar, where the business conducted in the building insured was a general merchandise business. Keeping and selling fireworks is in no sense necessary or essential in such a business. The privilege of keeping fireworks as part of such a stock might, for a cheaper rate of insurance, well be surrendered without impairing the business.

Nor can plaintiff's contention that the printed portion of the policy, containing the prohibition against fireworks, is overridden by the written portion, which describes the property and its uses for general merchandise purposes, avail to enable her to introduce parol evidence as to a custom, because the rule that the written overrides the printed part of a policy only applies where the conflict between the written and printed parts is irreconcilable. The written and printed parts of a policy must, if possible, be construed together so as to give effect to both, and the written part of a policy never overrides the printed part, except when the two are inconsistent, and not capable of a reasonable interpretation when read together. One clause of a policy should never be segregated, and an effect given to it inconsistent with the apparent intention of the parties as gathered from the whole instrument. Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Edmond, 17 Grat. 138.

In the case at bar there is no conflict between the written and the printed parts of the policy. The intention of the parties is apparent, and each part is clear and easily understood. Both can stand together without the slightest difficulty in reconciling them.

The meaning of the clause of the policy in question is plain. The plaintiff expressly undertook, by accepting the policy, not to claim the benefit of any custom contrary to the terms of the policy, and in accepting the policy at the premium named she surrendered the right to carry in stock such articles customarily carried in such stores as are expressly prohibited by the terms of the policy.

In Ostrander on Fire Insurance (2d Ed.) § 329, the author says: "But it will be otherwise if the policy distinctly prohibits the using or keeping of dangerous articles particularly specified. Custom and ordinary use will create a presumptive right only when the contract is silent or its meaning uncertain. The insurer has unquestionably the privilege to decline acceptance of a risk, except on conditions which he may impose; and as to whether such conditions are reasonable he has the power of ultimate decision. The parties do not come together by compulsion. There is an absolute freedom of choice. They may agree on terms, advantageous or otherwise, or they may refuse to agree altogether; but when the minds of insurer and insured have met, and the terms of their agreement are distinctly set forth in the policy, there is nothing for the courts to construe, and it is not for them to say that particular things cannot be prohibited because of their customary use in connection with the business to which the insurance relates. In consideration of the insurer's promise of indemnity at a rate of premium named, the insured surrenders somewhat of the uses and privileges that he has ordinarily enjoyed in the occupation of his premises, or in the management of his business. Whether he has acted wisely or not is immaterial. He has exercised his natural and his constitutional right to make his own contract, and that is an end of the matter."

To enforce the payment of this policy in the face of the plain and unwarranted violation of the written agreement of the parties that fireworks should not be kept on the insured premises would be to remove all safeguards embodied in the contract of insurance for the protection of the insurance company.

As said by Judge Keith in Westchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Ocean View Co., 106 Va. 633, 56 S. E. 584, referring to a clause like that under consideration: "It was a lawful condition and recklessly violated; and, if it be not sufficient to protect the insurance company against loss, it would seem to be an idle task to write conditions into a policy."

For the reasons given, the defendant company was plainly entitled to a judgment. Therefore the judgment of the circuit court in favor of the plaintiff must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for further trial, if the plaintiff shall be so advised, not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mecklenburg County.

Petition by R. L. Thomasson and others against J. W. Edmonson and another, receivers of the Bank of Mecklenburg, to establish a right to set-off. From a decree granting the relief prayed for, the receivers appeal. Reversed and remanded.

E. P. Buford, C. T. Baskerville, Abner G. Goode, W. E. Homes, and Chas. J. Faulkner, Jr., for appellants. R. Turnbull & Son, for appellees.

KEITH, P. Certain stockholders of the Bank of Mecklenburg filed their bill, setting up the insolvency of the bank, and asking that receivers be appointed to wind up its affairs. The court appointed the appellants, and directed them to take charge of the assets of the bank, collect them, and distribute the proceeds under its direction.

R. L. Thomasson filed his petition in this suit, in which he states that he is a member of the mercantile firm of Thomasson & Stembridge; that at the time the receivers were appointed the bank held, among other assets, two notes made by Thomasson & Stembridge, one for $1,000, dated February 14, 1908, payable 90 days after date, on which certain payments had been made, and the other for $1,041.60, dated February 18, 1908, payable 90 days after date, no part of which had been paid; that both of these notes had been made payable to the order of R. L. Thomasson and R. L. Stembridge, were regularly indorsed by the payees and discounted by the bank, and the proceeds thereof placed to the credit of the firm of Thomasson & Stembridge; that at the time of the appointment of the receivers Thomasson had on deposit in the bank to his individual credit $1,341.67; that he, as indorser of the two notes, was entitled to have the said amount so due to him individually by the bank set off against the amount due on the two notes made by the firm of Thomasson & Stembridge and indorsed by the individual members of the firm, and prayed that this set-off be allowed.

The receivers resisted this petition, and filed their answer, denying the right of Thomasson to the set-off claimed, and alleging that the firm of Thomasson & Stembridge was solvent, and had sufficient assets fully to discharge the balances due on the two notes, and that to allow such set-off would be creating a preference in favor of Thomasson over the other creditors of the Bank of Mecklenburg.

Depositions were taken by Thomasson to support the allegations of his petition, and the cause coming on to be heard on the petition, the demurrer and answer thereto, and the depositions, the court entered a decree granting the prayer of the petition and allowing the set-off prayed for. From that decree an appeal was allowed by this court.

[1] It appears that the notes were made by the partnership for partnership purposes, and that the proceeds were placed to the credit of and used by the partnership. Thomasson indorsed the notes as additional security, the bank requiring all notes to have two good indorsers. Thomasson, it is true, was a member of the partnership; but partnership demands and demands due to individual partners cannot be set off against each other—a proposition too well established to need authority in support of it.

The sole question is whether an indorser of notes held by the receivers of an insolvent bank is entitled to set off against such notes the amount of an individual deposit due him by the bank, when the maker of the notes is solvent and the receivers can collect them in full from the maker?

This question was before the chancery court of New York in the case of Middle District Bank, 9 Cow. 414, note, and Chancellor Walworth said: "If the real debtor is unable to pay, and the receiver is compelled to resort to the indorser, who is eventually to be the loser, he has the same equitable claim to set off bills which he had at the time the bank stopped payment. But no such effect should be allowed to an indorser when he is indemnified by the real debtor, or when the latter can be compelled to pay."

Davis v. Industrial Manufacturing Co., 114 N. C. 321, 19 S. E. 371, 23 L. R. A. 322, is very similar to the case in judgment. The opinion refers to the case just cited as follows: "The rule thus stated by the learned chancellor seems to us eminently just and equitable. It was applied by him to the settlement of the affairs of a bank of issue. The Bank of New Hanover was not a bank of issue, but of deposit and discount; but we know of no reason why it should not effect an equitable result as well when the indebtedness of the insolvent bank consists of accounts and certificates of deposit as where its liabilities were represented by bills."

[2] The partnership of Thomasson & Stembridge was the principal debtor. If Thomasson, as indorser, pays the debt in any way whatever by the application of the set-off in accordance with his petition or otherwise, he can indemnify himself by resort to the assets of the firm, if it be solvent, or to the extent, at least, of any dividends to which he might be entitled upon a distribution of its assets. He would then be precisely within the terms of the principle stated by Chancellor Walworth. If, however, the partnership, which is the real debtor, be unable to pay, and the receivers are compelled to resort to the indorser, who individually would be the loser, he will be plainly entitled to set off his claim against the bank in satisfaction of any demand made by the receivers upon him as indorser.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

1. MANDAMUS (§ 169*)—VOLUNTARY NONSUIT—CONDITION OF CAUSE.

The right to take a nonsuit, recognized by Code 1904, § 3387, providing that the right to a nonsuit must be exercised before the jury retires from the bar, exists until the case is submitted for decision to the jury, or to the court when sitting without a jury; so that a relator in mandamus, who before the conclusion of the argument before the court trying the case asks leave to take a nonsuit, is entitled thereto as a matter of right, in the absence of rights of defendant which would be prejudiced by a dismissal of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 375; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—DISPOSITION OF CASE ON APPEAL—RENDITION OF PROPER JUDGMENT.

Where the trial court erroneously denied a nonsuit and dismissed the action, the Supreme Court of Appeals on writ of error will reverse the judgment of dismissal, and enter judgment permitting a nonsuit, with costs on the writ of error.

Error to Circuit Court, Loudoun County.

Mandamus by Henry Harrison and others against William H. Clemens, Commissioner of Roads in Leesburg District, in Loudoun County, and another. There was a judgment dismissing the petition, and adjudging that relators pay costs, and they bring error. Reversed.

J. W. Foster, for plaintiffs in error. E. E. Garrett, for defendants in error.

CARDWELL, J. Henry Harrison, Anne L. Harrison, and John F. Lee, at the October term of the circuit court of Loudoun county, filed their petition praying a peremptory writ of mandamus, directed to Wm. H. Clemens, commissioner of roads for Leesburg district, in Loudoun county, commanding and compelling him to open a certain road described in said petition, and which the relators claim is a public road. Clemens, as road commissioner, answered the said petition at the December term of the circuit court, setting forth his readiness to perform any duty his office devolved upon him, or that the court might impose upon him in this proceeding; and at the same term of court Harry T. Harrison appeared by counsel, and on his motion was admitted as a party defendant to the cause, and leave given him to file his answer, in which he sets forth at length the reasons why the mandamus prayed by the relators should not be awarded.

It appears that there was some agreement of counsel as to the facts on which the court, without the intervention of a jury, was to hear and determine the issue involved, and during the argument of the cause, and while counsel for the relators was addressing the court, he was asked a question by the court, and there ensued a colloquy between counsel for the relators and counsel for the respondents, which developed that there was a misunderstanding as to the agreement upon which the case was being heard; counsel for the respondent Harry T. Harrison insisting that the statements in the latter's answer were to be treated as facts proved, while counsel for the relators insisted that the agreement was that the statements should only be taken for what they were worth when stated upon Harry T. Harrison's own knowledge and uncontradicted by the records or deeds, or conclusions drawn therefrom.

Upon these conditions arising, and before the conclusion of the argument of the case, and therefore before it was submitted for decision, counsel for the relators moved the court for leave to withdraw their petition and suffer a nonsuit. This motion was overruled by the court, to which ruling the relators duly excepted, and counsel was compelled to go on with the case. Upon the conclusion of the argument, the case was continued to the February term, 1910, at which term the court entered the order to which this writ of error was awarded, dismissing the petition of relators, and adjudging that they pay to Harry T. Harrison his costs expended in this litigation.

In the opinion of the learned judge, made a part of the judgment of the court, the facts as to the time and the circumstances in which the relators asked permission to dismiss their petition and suffer a nonsuit were set forth as above stated; but the court, sustaining the objection made by counsel for Harry T. Harrison, upon the ground that the motion to dismiss was too late and the case should be disposed of on its merits, refused to allow relators to suffer a nonsuit.

[I] We are of opinion that this was error. To enter a nonsuit has been recognized as a matter of right under the law and practice in Virginia from a very early date down to the present time. The statute (section 3387) recognizes this right, and only fixes the stage at which a plaintiff is precluded from taking a nonsuit to wit, when the case has been submitted to the jury and they have retired from the courtroom.

The rule seems to be the same in other jurisdictions, and applies, whether the case is to be tried by a jury, or by the court without the intervention of a jury. When the case goes to the jury, it is considered to be submitted for decision; and when the case is to be tried before the court, clearly the right to take a nonsuit continues until the case is finally concluded and submitted to the court for its decision. 14 Cyc. 402.

In 4 Minor's Inst. (2d Ed.) *783, 867, the author says: "The nonsuit is resorted to in our practice when the plaintiff finds himself unprepared * * * or for any other reason."

In Cahoon v. McCullough, 92 Va. 180, 23 S. E. 226, it is said in the opinion by Riely, J., that "the nonsuit is resorted to when the plaintiff finds himself unprepared with evidence to maintain his cause, either in consequence of his being ruled into a trial when not ready, or when surprised by the testimony of a witness or some ruling of the court, or other similar reason."

To the same effect is the opinion in Mallory v. Taylor, 90 Va. 348, 18 S. E. 438.

In Duffy v. Glucose Sugar Refining Company (C. C.) 141 Fed. 206, the court, in construing the Iowa statute, which is exactly the same as our statute, except that it goes further and makes the rule apply whether the case is being tried by the jury or by the court, reviews the authorities, and the opinion clearly sustains the view that, whether the case is before a jury for trial or before the court, the plaintiff has the right, before it is finally submitted for decision either to the jury or to the court, to take a nonsuit if he so desires.

In Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Central Transportation Co., 171 U. S. 138, 18 Sup. Ct. 808, 43 L. Ed. 108, the opinion holds that, in order to authorize a denial of the plaintiff's motion to discontinue a suit, there must be some plain legal prejudice to the defendant, other than the mere prospect of future litigation rendered possible by the discontinuance.

In reviewing the statute of South Dakota, similar to our statute, Cooke v. McQuaters, 19 S. D. 361, 103 N. W. 385, maintains the right of the plaintiff to suffer a nonsuit at any time before the case is decided. In that, as in other cases, an exception to the general rule is recognized, as where a counterclaim has been interposed, or the rights of the defendant would be necessarily prejudiced by dismissal of the action. But no such conditions exist in the case here. Our statute specifies only the time when a nonsuit may not be suffered, to wit, after the jury retire from the bar; and it follows necessarily that a nonsuit is to be allowed at any time before the jury retire, or, as in this case, before the case is submitted to the court hearing it as a common-law case.

[2] For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the circuit court, denying the motion of plaintiffs in error to be allowed to take a nonsuit and withdraw their petition, must be reversed and annulled, and this court will enter the judgment the circuit court should have entered, permitting the plaintiffs in error to withdraw their petition and suffer a nonsuit, and recover costs against the defendants in error here, other than William H. Clemens, road commissioner.

Having taken the foregoing view of the case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the other assignments of error presented in the petition and argued before this court.

Reversed.

WASHINGTON SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. COMMONWEALTH ex rel. STATE CORPORATION COMMISSION.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. COMMERCE (§ 62*) — ESTABLISHMENT OF RATES—OBJECTIONS.

Where a carrier, in the unrestrained course of business, adopted a lower schedule of charges for intrastate and interstate passenger service than the rate allowed by the State Corporation Commission for intrastate business, it cannot object to the rates fixed by the commission as substantially burdening interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 81; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 12*) — REASONABLENESS OF RATES.

The rule that the reasonableness of railroad rates prescribed by state authority for passenger traffic wholly within its limits must ordinarily be determined by the intrastate business, and that the value of the property employed, cost of maintenance, operating expenses, and the like, must be considered in fixing fair rates, is applicable to railroads doing a substantial intrastate business, but not to a railroad built and operated essentially for interstate purposes, and where the intrastate business is merely incidental and too inconsiderable to make it feasible to fix a reasonable maximum rate on the basis of comparative values.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 18*) — ESTABLISHMENT OF RATES—DECISION OF STATE CORPORATION COMMISSION—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

Under Const. 1902, §§ 156d, 156f (Code 1904, pp. ccliv, cclv), authorizing appeals from orders of the State Corporation Commission establishing rates which will be regarded as prima facie reasonable, the burden of showing the unreasonableness of rates fixed by the commission rests on the carrier, appealing from the order of the commission; and, unless it does so, the determination of the commission will be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

Keith, P., and Cardwell, J., dissenting.

Appeal from State Corporation Commission.

Proceedings on the relation of the State Corporation Commission for the establishment of a maximum intrastate passenger rate for the Washington Southern Railway Company. From an order of the commission, the railway company appeals. Affirmed.

Hill Carter, for appellant. The Attorney General, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. This appeal is from an order of the State Corporation Commission of June 23, 1910, establishing a maximum intrastate passenger rate for the Washington Southern Railway Company of 2½ cents, instead of 3 cents, per mile for each passenger.

The contention of the company in its petition to the commission was that the former rate of 2 cents per mile was confiscatory.

The litigation between the State Corporation Commission and some of the more important railroads in the state touching the subject of intrastate passenger rates is a matter of public knowledge and germane to the present inquiry. Prior to April 27, 1907, no restriction by state authority had been placed upon the right of railroads to fix their own schedule of rates for carrying passengers, and the uniform rate established by them in Virginia was 3 cents per mile. At that date, the commission fixed the general maximum intrastate rate at 2 cents per mile. Whereupon, several of the principal railroads obtained injunctions from the judge of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, restraining the commission from the enforcement of the rate prescribed, upon the allegation that such rate was confiscatory. The state strenuously denied the jurisdiction of a federal judge to enjoin the action of the commission, insisting that these rate orders were the orders of a state court of competent jurisdiction, and that by express provision of section 720 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 581) the United States courts are forbidden "to stay proceedings in any court of the state."

* * * On appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States (November 30, 1908), by divided court, reversed the decree of the Circuit Court. See Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., 211 U. S. 210, 29 Sup. Ct. 67, 53 L. Ed. 150. The decision of the majority, however, was considered inconclusive and unsatisfactory by both parties to the litigation, and the suit in the Circuit Court of the United States was not further prosecuted. It seems that, before the opinion of the Supreme Court was announced, a compact had been entered into between the litigating railroad companies and counsel for the state that, whatever the result might be, a rehearing of the matter of rates on the merits would be allowed the railroads by the commission. The rehearing thus agreed upon was accordingly had, and the commission settled upon a general maximum intrastate passenger rate of 2½ cents per mile. Their action in that regard has been acquiesced in by all of the leading railroads in the state, and the injunction proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States dismissed.

The Washington Southern Railway Company extends from Quantico (the northern terminus of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad), a distance of 36 miles, to the southern end of the bridge across the Potomac river at Washington. The company was originally formed by the consolidation of the Alexandria & Fredericksburg Railroad with the Washington Railroad. The old road has been practically relocated, rebuilt, and double-tracked. As one of the witnesses describes the situation, the present road bears the same relation to the old road as the two straight lines of the dollar mark to the letter "S." Hence the road practically carries double capitalization, and the expense of rebuilding it was materially increased by reason of the nature of the route selected for relocation and the high grade of construction. The road is located between the Potomac river, on one side, and a range of bluffs, on the other, and, beyond the immediate vicinity of the northern terminus, passes through an extremely sparsely settled territory. It was rebuilt almost exclusively for the accommodation of interstate traffic, which composes 95 per cent. of its entire business.

The road is controlled (through stock ownership) by the Baltimore & Ohio, the Chesapeake & Ohio, the Atlantic Coast Line, the Seaboard Air Line, the Southern, and the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroads, and forms the link between the Northern and Southern connections of these great systems. The intrastate traffic is a mere incident to the substantial business of the company, and is so inconsiderable and comparatively of such minor importance as to render the ordinary methods of distribution of burdens and benefits between the two classes of business impracticable.

In dealing with this aspect of the case, Prentis, Chairman (in an excellent opinion), observes: "It would not have been constructed and could not be maintained for intrastate business alone. Its strictly intrastate passenger business is only an incident to its general business and almost a negligible consideration."

It plainly appears, from data furnished by the appellant itself, that if the cost of construction, maintenance, and operation of the road were apportioned on the basis of the volume of interstate and intrastate business, respectively, and 5 per cent. of the joint business allotted to intrastate traffic, it would represent an utterly insufficient capital to build, upon the cheapest possible plan, or even to maintain, any sort of a railroad between the termini of the Washington Southern. Moreover, it was admitted by counsel in argument that a maximum rate of 5 cents per mile on intrastate travel alone would not yield a fair return on the capital invested upon any apportionment of values submitted to the commission. This admission of itself shows the impracticability, in the circumstances of this case, of making a ressonable return on the capital invested from intrastate traffic solely the basis for the establishment of a maximum passenger rate.

Since this case was submitted, our attention has been called to the decision of Judge Sanborn in the "Minnesota Rate Case," Shepard v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co. (U. S. Circuit Court) 184 Fed. 765, decided April 11, 1911. It is cited as authority for the proposition that it is beyond the competency of the state to establish a different and lesser maximum passenger rate for intrastate travel than the maximum rate allowed for interstate travel, where the effect of such action will necessarily amount to or operate as a regulation of or substantial burden upon interstate commerce. In that case it was the finding of the master (which the court confirmed) that the necessary effect of the reductions in rates in Minnesota below the basis of its lawful interstate rates deprived the company of its power to transact interstate business outside the state, and that the necessary operation and effect of the installation of the reduced rates was to materially burden interstate business and to regulate interstate commerce.

[1] No such results can be predicated of the action of the commission under the facts of this case. There is no contention on the part of the appellant that its earnings from its general operations, even at a lesser rate than the maximum rate fixed by the commission, are not ample to meet all lawful demands upon it and to make a fair return on the capital invested and for services rendered to the public. Indeed, the record shows that in the unrestrained course of business the company adopted a lower schedule of charges, both for intrastate and interstate passenger service, than the rate allowed by the commission. This fact alone would seem to afford a conclusive answer to appellant's pretension.

In this connection we again quote from the opinion of Judge Prentiss: "The company has been perfectly free to fix its interstate rates, except so far as it may have been controlled by competition and trade conditions. Notwithstanding this freedom with reference to interstate business, it has been doing its entire passenger business at an average of 2.47 cents per mile, and its entire passenger business in Virginia, both state and interstate, at 2.35 cents per mile. As the total revenues from its strictly intrastate passenger traffic does not exceed 6 per cent. of its total passenger traffic, the enforcement of the 2-cent passenger rate for its strictly intrastate passenger business cannot very seriously affect these average rates per mile. Taking a general view of the situation, and taking notice of the fact that the standard rate upon the chief lines of railway in Virginia is a maximum of 2½ cents per mile, * * * we think the Washington Southern, as a part of a great railway line between the North and the South on the Atlantic coast, should be placed in the same class with the railways which have been named."

[2] We are not unmindful of the general rules enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 18 Sup. Ct. 418, 42 L. R. A. 819, and that line of decisions, namely, that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates prescribed by state authority for transportation of persons over a road wholly within its limits must ordinarily be determined by the intrastate business, and, besides, that the value of the property employed, the cost of maintenance, operating expenses, and the like, are proper constituents to be considered in fixing a rate which will pay a fair return to the company on its investment and for its services to the public. Under ordinary conditions these principles are eminently wise and just, and admit of practical application, and should be controlling. Take, for example, the Norfolk & Western, or the Southern (whose lines extend across the state), or, indeed, any other railroad company doing a substantial intrastate business. To such railways the foregoing rules are appropriate, and may well be applied. But they can in no sense be regarded as dominating factors, where, as in this case, the road is built, maintained, and operated essentially for interstate purposes, and where the intrastate business is incidental merely and confessedly too inconsiderable to render feasible the fixing of a reasonable maximum passenger rate on the basis of comparative values.

[3] By article 12, § 156d, of the Constitution of Virginia of 1902 (Code 1904, p. ccliv), an appeal of right lies to this court from the order of the commission.

Section 156f (page cclv) prescribes that "the appellate court shall have jurisdiction to consider and determine the reasonableness and justness of the action of the commission appealed from, as well as any other matter arising under such appeal: Provided, however, that the action of the commission appealed from shall be regarded as prima facie just, reasonable and correct."

The same rule of decision has been established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Tompkins, 176 U. S. 167, 20 Sup. Ct. 336, 44 L. Ed. 417; Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co., 212 U. S. 1, 29 Sup. Ct. 148, 53 L. Ed. 871; Willcox v. Consol. Gas Co., 212 U. S. 19, 29 Sup. Ct. 192, 53 L. Ed. 382.

In conclusion, we are of opinion that the appellant has failed to sustain the burden cast upon it by the foregoing rule of decision, and that the order of the commission is just, reasonable, and correct, and ought to be affirmed.

Where a servant notifies the master of a defect in an appliance, and the master promises to remedy it, and the servant, relying on the promise, continues to use the appliance, and is shortly thereafter injured, the master is liable, unless the danger is so manifest that no reasonably prudent person would incur the risk.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

While a so-called "Ariel swing," operated by electricity, was being run at night, the trolleys, by which it was lighted, and which were worn and likely to come off, came off; and, a passenger being frightened and threatening to jump, the operator, in accordance with instructions, as there was evidence, for such circumstances, not only turned off the power, but, before the machinery stopped, attempted to rearrange the trolleys, necessitating his working over uncovered cogwheels, in doing which he slipped, and was caught therein. Held, that whether he was guilty of contributory negligence, in having continued to use the defective trolleys, relying on the master's promise to substitute new trolleys, which had been gotten a week before, was a question for the jury.

Error to Circuit Court, Alexandria County.

Action by Frederick Schwab against the Washington Luna Park Company, Incorporated. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed and rendered.

J. K. M. Norton, for plaintiff in error. Moore, Barbour & Keith, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. Frederick Schwab brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries, resulting, as alleged, from the negligence of the defendant company. The plaintiff was the only witness in the case, and a demurrer to his evidence was filed by the defendant. Thereupon the jury ascertained the damages, and the court gave judgment upon the demurrer to the evidence in favor of the defendant. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The testimony of the plaintiff shows that he was employed by the defendant at its pleasure park to run a machine known as an "Ariel swing." The swing was composed of a center shaft, to which was attached six swings, each holding eight passengers. There were large uncovered cogwheels at the foot of the shaft. The machine was run by electricity, and when the power was applied the swings circled out from the center until they reached a height of some 30 feet from the ground. The machine was operated both in the day and at night, and was chiefly patronized by women and children. At night, the light for its operation, and for the protection of the passengers, was supplied by three small trolleys running on wires attached to the shaft. If all three of these trolleys slipped from the wires, the passengers, the large uncovered cogwheels and the operator were left in darkness. When this would happen, the women and children, swinging high in the air, would sometimes become terrified and attempt to jump out. In such cases it was the duty of the operator to shut off the power and endeavor to get the trolleys back in place. To do this it was necessary to get near the shaft and lean over the uncovered cogwheels, and with a hook on the end of a stick pull the trolleys into place. The plaintiff, who was the operator, was instructed as to this means of getting the trolleys back into place, and had repeatedly performed the duty. When there was no danger to passengers, if all three trolleys slipped off, he would send for, or go himself and hunt up, the electrician, and bring him to readjust the trolleys; but his general and chief instructions were to look out at all times for the safety of the passengers, and to exercise his best judgment for their protection. For some time before the injury complained of, the trolleys which furnished the light had become so badly worn that they were constantly slipping off and leaving the passengers high in the air in darkness. The plaintiff brought this condition of the trolley wheels to the attention of the superintendent, who was in entire charge of the grounds, and urged the importance of substituting new wheels for the old ones, and was repeatedly promised by the superintendent that he would have the trolleys fixed. In pursuance of the instructions of the superintendent, the plaintiff took the trolleys to a machinist to have new ones made by them. The old ones were, however, again put on by the electrician for use while the new ones were being made. Finally the new trolleys were made and delivered to the electrician, whose duty it was to put them on. Not being put on, the plaintiff reported the fact to the superintendent several times, who promised him that he would have them put on, and told the plaintiff to tell the electrician to put them on. This the plaintiff did, saying, "Some time these things are going to fly off and hurt somebody," to which the electrician replied, "I am going to fix them for you; don't you let that alarm you." The new trolleys were under the control of the electrician for at least one week prior to the accident, but were not put on; the plaintiff being left to run the machine with the old trolleys, which were, on account of their badly worn condition, frequently slipping off the wires and leaving the apparatus in darkness.

On the night of the accident, between 10 and 11 o'clock, all three of the old trolleys slipped off while a number of passengers were in the swings, high in the air, and a woman with a child in her arms became frightened and began hollering, "This thing is going to break down; I am going to jump out." The plaintiff hollered up to her, "For God's sake, don't jump; I will try and get you some lights," and immediately shut off the current and attempted to get the trolleys back in place, so that there might be light and the woman prevented from jumping out. In doing this he had to lean over the cog-wheels in the darkness, and reach over with his hooked stick and pull the trolleys back into place. While in this position, in some way not explained, he slipped, and one foot was caught in the cogs and crushed off with part of his leg above the ankle.

It is insisted by the defendant company that the testimony of the plaintiff shows that when all three of the trolleys slipped his instructions were not merely to shut the power off, but to wait until the machine stopped before attempting to readjust the trolleys, and that if he had done this he would not have been injured.

It is clear that the plaintiff is an ignorant man, and that under a rigid cross-examination he had difficulty in making himself understood, and several times made statements that, taken alone, would seem to sustain the defendant's contention as to his instructions; but, when his evidence is read as a whole, it shows very satisfactorily that his understanding of his instructions was that he was, in the existing emergency, to cut off the current and proceed at once to readjust the trolleys, and especially that his instructions made it his duty in such a situation to use his best judgment to protect the passengers and save them from injury. This interpretation of his evidence is strengthened by the fact that if the contention of the defendant, that he was to wait until the machine stopped before restoring the trolleys, was sound, the swings would have then reached the ground, and there would have been no occasion to do anything to protect the passengers or allay their alarm.

The case is before us upon a demurrer to the evidence. The jury might reasonably have concluded from the testimony of the plaintiff, taken as a whole, that the plaintiff, in the course he pursued, acted in accordance with the instructions of his master, which did not contemplate his waiting until the machinery had entirely ceased its motion before proceeding to act.

[1-3] It is the duty of the master to use ordinary care to provide reasonably safe machinery and appliances for the use of his servants, and the master will be held liable for any injury to the servant which results from omission to exercise such care. If the servant, knowing of defects in machinery, or unsuitableness of an appliance, notifies the master thereof, and the master promises to remedy the defect, and the servant, in reliance upon such promise, continues to use the appliance, and is shortly thereafter injured, the master is liable, unless the danger is so manifest that no reasonably prudent person would incur the risk. It was for the jury to say whether the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care in relying upon the master's promise, and in using the defective trolleys after knowledge of their condition. Virginia & N. C. Wheel Co. v. Harris, 103 Va. 708, 49 S. E. 991; Truckers' Co. v. White, 108 Va. 147, 60 S. E. 630; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612.

In the case at bar the jury might well have concluded that the failure of the defendant to substitute the new trolleys in the place of the old was the proximate and efficient cause of the plaintiff's injury, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in relying upon the defendant's promise to repair, and in continuing to use the old trolleys for a reasonable time until the new trolleys were substituted. This being so, under the demurrer to the evidence, we must so find.

In the brief the defendant, under rule 8, assigns as cross-error the action of the circuit court in overruling its demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration. This assignment of error was not mentioned in the oral argument of the case, and it is sufficient to say that the objection is not tenable. The declaration stated a good cause of action, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of must be reversed, and this court will, upon the demurrer to the evidence, enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have entered, in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of damages ascertained by the verdict of the jury.

A. B. Dickinson, for plaintiff in error. Watkins, Brock & Epes, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The question in controversy in this case, which is an action of ejectment, is the true location of the southern boundary line of an 86-acre parcel of land, designated as lot No. 2 in the partition of a large tract of land known as the "Hurd land," lying in Prince Edward county, and near, but outside the limits of, the town of Farmville.

In the plat and survey of the county surveyor, who ran the lines by which the partition was made, and which are made a part of the deed of partition, the 86-acre tract is described as follows: "Lot north of house lot contains 86 acres. Line commencing at rock on corner of Ely and Ninth streets, or better known as street south of race track, due west along street to Little Buffalo river."

The conveyances under which the plaintiff in error, who was the plaintiff in the trial court, claims all refer to the deed of partition for a further description of the land conveyed. The contention of the plaintiff is and was that "Ninth street" as projected, and not the street "better known as the street south of race track," was the correct line. Neither of the streets in question had been opened.

To sustain his contention the defendant introduced as a witness the county surveyor, who testified over the objection of the plaintiff that he made the survey and plat which were attached to and made a part of the deed of partition; "that in making the said survey and plat he surveyed and ran the line along Eighth street, which by mistake he called Ninth street on said plat, but that he was not sure of the name of the street, but to make sure what street he did mean he added in his notes attached to said plat that it was the street better known as the street south of the race track, which is the street along which the defendant's fence now runs; that that was where he was instructed to run said line; that that was where he did run said line, and that is where the line runs to-day; that he made no survey of the race track at that time, but that he stepped off the distance from said street to the race track, and it was between 30 and 40 yards; that the distance from Eighth street to Ninth street was about 300 feet. * * *"

The objection made to this evidence is that it was inadmissible because it tended to vary or contradict the recorded plat, and because if by mistake the plat called for Eighth street, instead of Ninth street, the parties to the deed had no notice of the mistake, or of the surveyor's intention to make Eighth street, instead of Ninth street, the line.

[1] The report of the survey was a part of the plat, and both were referred to in the partition deed for the purpose of fixing the metes and bounds of the several parcels of land conveyed. The report of survey and plat were therefore as much a part of the deed of partition as if they had been copied into the deed. State Sav. Bk. v. Stewart, 93 Va. 447, 25 S. E. 543. The conveyances to the plaintiff refer to the partition deed for a more particular description of the land conveyed. One of them refers to the land as "particularly described in a deed of partition between parties of the first part and Lydia A. Hurd et al., duly recorded in the clerk's office of the county of Prince Edward, in the state of Virginia, together with the survey and plat to said lands made by J. W. Overton, county surveyor (see Deed Book 44, pages 270-274), to which said deed and survey reference is to be had for a more particular description." The reference to the partition deed was not, as insisted by the plaintiff's counsel, for the purpose of showing merely the source from which title was derived, but for a fuller description of the land conveyed.

There were two descriptions of the line between lots numbered 1 and 2, equally explicit, but repugnant. In locating that line, that repugnancy did appear. Ninth street and the street better known as the street south of the race track were not the same. The question then was upon which of those streets the line was originally located, if run.

[2] Where there is doubt as to the correct location of a survey, or as to the application of a grant to its proper subject-matter, evidence aliunde is always admissible. It is not a question of construction, but of location. It is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury by the aid of extrinsic evidence, under proper instructions from the court. See 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 288; Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 235, 21 S. E. 847.

The evidence was properly admitted.

[3] The next error assigned is that the court permitted evidence to be introduced tending to show that E. S. Hurd, one of the parties under whom the plaintiff claims the land, whilst one of the joint owners thereof, admitted that the defendant's fence was located along Eighth street, the boundary line as claimed by the latter.

The evidence was clearly admissible, not as an estoppel, as plaintiff's counsel seems to think, but merely as evidence tending to show that the true boundary line was where defendant claimed it to be. Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 238, 21 S. E. 847; Fry v. Stowers, 92 Va. 18, 16, 22 S. E. 500.

[4] The plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury "that the deeds in this case convey the land to Ninth street, and the sole question for the jury to determine is what is the location of Ninth street, and if they shall believe from the evidence that the fence of the defendant runs west along Eighth street to Buffalo river, then they must find for the plaintiff." The court refused to so instruct the jury, but told them, in lieu thereof, "that if they believed from the evidence that the true northern line of lot No. 2 in the partition of the Hurd lands was a projected line from the southern boundary of Ninth street to Buffalo river, as shown on the map of the Farmville Coal & Iron Company's land, they must find for the plaintiff; but if the jury believe from the evidence that the true line of said lot No. 2 was the southern boundary of the first street south of the race track, then they must find for the defendant." This action of the court is assigned as error.

The court, as we have seen, properly admitted evidence tending to show where the line between lots Nos. 1 and 2 in the partition of the Hurd farm had actually been located or run. The calls in the title papers for that line were ambiguous. Either call was sufficient; but one was false, and the other correct. Which was the false, and which the true line, was to be determined by the jury from all the evidence in the case.

If the line had been actually run along Ninth street, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover although it was not the street "better known as the street south of the race track." If, on the other hand, the line was actually run along the street immediately south of the race track, and not along Ninth street, then the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The instruction given fairly submitted those questions to the jury.

[5] The remaining assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and the evidence.

The evidence shows that the line between lots Nos. 1 and 2 was actually located on the ground as claimed and held by the defendant, and was the true partition line between those lots as found by the jury; and, there being no error of law in submitting the case to the jury, the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

FRASER v. STOKES et al.

1. DOWER (§ 58*)—ELECTION.

A husband, desiring to make provision for his wife and his children, executed a deed whereby he covenanted to stand seised of described real estate in trust for his wife and children, without making any reference to dower. A subsequent deed designated a new trustee, and recited that he covenanted on behalf of the wife that she would relinquish her dower in any real estate which the husband owned or should subsequently acquire, other than the real estate described in the deed. Held, that the provision for the wife was not in lieu of dower in the lands of the husband, and she was not required to elect whether to retain the benefits of the deeds or renounce them and claim dower.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Goochland County.

Suit by Salley B. Fraser against Willie A. Stokes and another. From a decree denying relief in part, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

D. H. & Walter Leake, for appellant. Smith, Moncure & Gordon and Wise & Chichester, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Goochland county, and the case arises out of the following facts: George S. Stokes was, on April 22, 1887, seised and possessed of three several contiguous tracts of land, situated in Goochland county, commonly known and spoken of as "Bolling Island," and on that date he, by deed duly executed and recorded, covenanted to stand seised and possessed of said lands for the joint use, benefit, support, and maintenance of his wife, Willie A. Stokes, and their children, Margaret Pickett Stokes and Sally B. Stokes. This deed contains the following recital: "And whereas, the said George S. Stokes desires to make some provisions for his wife, Willie A. Stokes, and his children by her now born and that may hereafter be born, so as to secure to them a support and maintenance and livelihood and to the children a proper education, and to these purposes desires and has determined to devote the said lands: * * * Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which the said George S. Stokes bears to his wife and children, he, the said George S. Stokes, doth hereby make, create, and declare the trusts hereinafter set forth, and doth charge and impose the same upon himself and upon the said lands which are also hereinafter more fully described," etc. Immediately following is a description of the property of which George S. Stokes covenanted that he would stand seised and possessed upon the declared trusts, and the second clause of the deed is as follows:

"At the death of him, the said George S. Stokes, if the said Willie A. Stokes be then living and surviving him, and there be then also living and surviving heirs, any child or children of him, the said George S. Stokes, and his said wife, or any issue of any such child or children who may have died, the whole of said lands shall pass, and the said George S. Stokes does hereby grant and convey the same as follows; that is to say: One undivided moiety thereof to the said Willie A. Stokes for the term of her natural life; and the other undivided moiety thereof to go with the remainder after the death of the said Willie A. Stokes in the undivided moiety above granted and conveyed to her for life, to the child or children of him the said George S. Stokes and his said wife living at his death and the then living issue of any child who may then be dead, such issue taking per stirpes."

At the date of the aforesaid deed, Stokes and his wife knew no differences one with the other, but between that date and 1894—at what time does not appear—differences were engendered from which the utmost discord resulted, destroying harmony between the husband and the wife, and finally resulting in a separation; but before the separation occurred Stokes executed and had duly recorded another deed, dated September 8, 1894, substituting for himself as trustee in the deed of April 22, 1887, the brother of his wife, and the opening recitals of the second deed, made just prior to what proved to be the husband's final separation from his wife, are as follows:

"Whereas, heretofore, to wit, on the 22d day of April, in the year 1887, the said George S. Stokes made a deed of settlement, which is of record in the office of the county court of the said county of Goochland, by which deed he created certain uses and trusts which he imposed on himself and certain lands in the said deed mentioned for the benefit of himself, his wife, Willie A. Stokes, and their children between them begotten, together with other trusts and limitations in said deed, to which deed reference is here made;

"And whereas, differences of opinion and incompatibility of temperaments unhappily exist between the said George S. Stokes and Willie A. Stokes, his wife, and they have mutually agreed to live separate and apart; and whereas, the said George S. Stokes now desires to make more effectual the provisions of said deed for the benefit of his said wife and their children between them begotten:

"Now, therefore, this deed witnesseth that the said George S. Stokes, in consideration of the premises and of the natural love and affection which he bears to his said wife and their children, * * * hath constituted and appointed, and by these presents do constitute and appoint, the said Orris A. Browne a trustee to carry into effect the provisions of the said deed dated the 22d day of April, 1887," etc.

"* * * And the said Orris A. Browne, for and on behalf of the said Willie A. Stokes, covenants with the said George S. Stokes that the said Willie A. Stokes shall and will maintain herself without any cost, charge, or expense to the said George S. Stokes. And the said Orris A. Browne, for and on behalf of the said Willie A. Stokes, covenants that she will support and maintain their children between them begotten until they shall marry, without any cost, charge, or expense to the said George S. Stokes. And the said Orris A. Browne for and on behalf of the said Willie A. Stokes covenants with the said George S. Stokes that in consideration of the settlement and provisions for her benefit by this deed that she will relinquish her dower and all rights of dower in any real estate which the said George S. Stokes now owns or shall hereafter acquire, other than the real estate named in this deed and in the deed of April 22, 1887."

George S. Stokes departed from Bolling Island in 1895, and to the date of his death in 1909 he lived entirely apart from his wife and daughters, and at various times, in accordance with the terms of the deed of September 8, 1894, his wife released her dower right in his property other than the real estate named in the two deeds. Her elder daughter, Margaret Pickett Stokes, has continued to live with her mother at Bolling Island, receiving support and enjoying the fruits of her mother's labor, and the other daughter, Sally B., received support from and enjoyed the fruits of her mother's labor until her marriage with one Fraser, from which time she lived apart from her mother and sister, and soon after her father's death, which occurred in 1909, she filed the bill in this cause, praying that partition be made of the lands mentioned in the deeds of 1887 and 1894, her interest in which she claimed to be one-fourth in fee and the remainder in another undivided fourth interest in said lands after the death of her mother, Willie A. Stokes, and that the share to which she was entitled thereunder be set apart to her, etc.

To this bill the widow, Willie A. Stokes, filed her answer, claiming dower in the portions of said lands going to the daughters upon the death of their father, George S. Stokes, and admitting that the lands could be divided in kind, subject to her dower. The unmarried daughter, Margaret Pickett Stokes, filed her separate answer, in which she united in the prayer of and adopted as her own the answer of her mother, Willie A. Stokes.

Upon a hearing of the cause upon the pleadings and the evidence taken for both the complainant and the defendants, the circuit court held that Willie A. Stokes was entitled to dower in the moiety of the lands in question which came to the complainant, Sally B. Fraser, and Margaret Pickett Stokes upon the death of their father, George S. Stokes; and the sole question, therefore, for our decision, is whether or not the court erred in its decree.

[1] It is insisted on behalf of the appellant that the deeds in question created in the defendant Willie A. Stokes a jointure in the lands they conveyed, and that she was thereby put to an election as to whether she would retain the benefits of the deeds or renounce the same and claim dower in lieu thereof.

We do not think this contention at all tenable, as the deed of September 8, 1894, makes no reference whatever to dower, except in that part of it in which it is declared, pursuant to a covenant made by her trustee on her behalf, that "she will relinquish her dower and all rights of dower in any real estate which the said George S. Stokes now owns or shall hereafter acquire, other than the real estate named in this deed and in the deed of April 22, 1887." After the departure of George S. Stokes from Bolling Island in 1895 to the time of his death, he lived apart from his wife and daughters, and at various times, in accordance with the deed of 1894, his wife released her dower rights in his property other than the real estate named in the two deeds. It therefore plainly appears that the provision made for the wife, Willie B. Stokes, by the deeds, was not intended as in lieu of dower in the lands of the grantor, George S. Stokes.

[2] It is a general maxim that the law favors dower, and as we have held in Lewis v. Apperson, 103 Va. 624, 49 S. E. 978, 68 L. R. A. 867, 106 Am. St. Rep. 903, a widow will not be deprived of her dower as a rule, unless it is barred by the statutory requirements for that purpose—in other words, that nothing short of the statutory requirements for that purpose will deprive a widow of her right of dower in the lands of her husband of which he was seised and possessed during coverture. See, also, 1 Minor, Real Prop. § 295.

[3] This is a rule so well recognized that a further citation of authority is deemed unnecessary; indeed, we think that the provisions of the deeds in question themselves plainly show that it was never intended to deprive Willie A. Stokes, the widow of George S. Stokes, of her dower rights, inchoate at the execution of said deeds, but consummated upon the death of George S. Stokes, in the lands known as Bolling Island. To repeat, in the deed of 1887 no reference whatever is made to the dower rights of Willie A. Stokes; but in the subsequent deed of 1894 the following appears: "And the said Orris A. Browne, for and on behalf of the said Willie A. Stokes, covenants with the said George S. Stokes that in consideration of the settlement and provisions for her benefit by this deed, that she will relinquish her dower and all rights of dower in any real estate which the said George S. Stokes now owns or shall hereafter acquire, other than the real estate named in this deed and in the deed of April 22, 1887." Language could not be plainer to convey the meaning that the covenant made by the trustee on behalf of the wife provided for the relinquishment of the dower rights of the wife in all the real estate then owned by the husband or thereafter acquired by him, except Bolling Island, and that the sideration of the wife accepting the benefits on condition that she shall subsequently support herself and the children, is supported by a sufficient consideration, because releasing him from an obligation.

We do not think this contention at all tenable, as the deed of September 8, 1894, makes no reference whatever to dower, except in that part of it in which it is declared, pursuant to a covenant made by her trustee on her behalf, that "she will relinquish her dower and all rights of dower in any real estate which the said George S. Language could not be plainer to convey the meaning that the covenant made by the trustee on behalf of the wife provided for the relinquishment of the dower rights of the wife in all the real estate then owned by the husband or thereafter acquired by him, except Bolling Island, and that the

to. Wherefore, if the said committee were in any sense liable to Sweeney, which they, of course, deny, he could sue them at law for the amount of his claim as specifically set out in the amended bill.

[2] Moreover, upon the face of the amended bill, the complainant had no cause of action, and could maintain no action whatever against Foster, Simcoe, and Cobb arising out of the transactions set out in the amended bill, until he had obtained a reassignment of his alleged contract with them, which he had assigned to Zell and Van Dyke, and with which assignment Foster, Simcoe, and Cobb were never at any time concerned, and Zell and Van Dyke are not before the court in this cause.

Section 2415a of the Code, relied on by appellant, has no application to the case. The provision of that section is that when the legal title to any claim or chose in action, for the enforcement of the collection of which a court of equity has jurisdiction, is in one person, and the beneficial equitable title is in another, the latter may either maintain a suit in the name of the holder of the legal title, for his use and benefit, or in his own name, to enforce collection of the same, and in either case the beneficial equitable owner shall be deemed the real plaintiff, and shall be alone liable for costs. Now, in this case, not only the legal title to the contract upon which appellant brings this suit has been transferred, but also the equitable title, to Zell and Van Dyke, who have never appeared in this cause, or had legal process served upon them to appear; and as the holders of said contract, as plainly appears upon the face of appellant's bill, they have refused to reassign to the appellant. Wherefore the respective rights of the present and the former holders of the contract are necessarily involved in this litigation, and must necessarily be determined; but, before there can be any adjudication of the liability of the appellees, Foster, Simcoe, and Cobb, the rights of Zell and Van Dyke under the contract in question have first to be determined, and they are not before the court or within its jurisdiction. There is nothing in the bill to connect the appellees with the transactions that resulted in the assignment by the appellant to Zell and Van Dyke, and therefore it is not averred that these two groups of defendants have acted in concert; in other words, appellees have no interest in a litigation to compel Zell and Van Dyke to reassign the contract in question to the appellant, nor have Zell and Van Dyke any interest in the litigation in which the appellant seeks to recover damages from the appellees, sustained, as he alleges, by reason of their transaction with Smith & Co.

[3. 4] The case, therefore, comes plainly within the control of the decision of this court in Bonsal v. Camp, 111 Va. 595, 69 S. E. 978, where it appears from the opinion of Keith, P., that Camp filed his bill in the circuit court of the city of Norfolk against Bonsal, in which he prayed the rescission of a deed made by Bonsal to him for a tract of land in the state of North Carolina, upon the ground that he was deceived into making the purchase by fraudulent misrepresentations upon the part of Bonsal and his agent, one Brewer; that Bonsal, the sole defendant, demurred to the bill because Brewer was not made a party defendant, and also answered the bill. The bill further sets out the grounds upon which the complainant sought the relief he asked; but it was made to appear that Brewer became, under the contract of sale, entitled to one-twentieth part of the price of the land sold by Bonsal to Camp. Brewer was not made a party defendant to the bill, and therefore never appeared in the cause. Camp was a resident of Florida, Brewer a resident of Tennessee, Bonsal a resident of Virginia, and the subject-matter of controversy was situated in the state of North Carolina. In disposing of the demurrer of Bonsal to the bill, the opinion by Mr. Justice Miller, in Barney v. Baltimore City, 6 Wall. 284, 18 L. Ed. 825, is quoted with approval as follows: "There is a class of persons having such relations to the matter in controversy, merely formal or otherwise, that while they may be called proper parties, the court will take no account of the omission to make them parties. There is another class of persons whose relations to the suit are such that, if their interest and their absence are formally brought to the attention of the court, it will require them to be made parties, if within its jurisdiction, before deciding the case; but, if this cannot be done, it will proceed to administer such relief as may be in its power between the parties before it. And there is a third class, whose interests in the subject-matter of the suit, and in the relief sought, are so bound up with that of the other parties that their legal presence as parties to the proceeding is an absolute necessity, without which the court cannot proceed. In such cases the court refuses to entertain the suit, when these parties cannot be subjected to its jurisdiction." It was held that the case made by Camp's bill fell within the third class of cases mentioned in the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller—in other words, that Brewer was a necessary party to the litigation and that, as he was not before the court, the relief sought could not be decreed. In that case several authorities are also cited, which sustain the general proposition that all persons interested in the subject-matter of a suit and to be affected by its results are necessary parties. The rule was there also laid down, with respect to the rescission of contracts, that in seeking a remedy which calls for the highest and most drastic exercise of the power of a court of chancery—to annul and set at naught the solemn contracts of parties—there must be first a sufficient averment of facts showing the plaintiff entitled in equity to the relief which he seeks, and satisfactory proof of these facts, to justify the interposition of a court; and the opinion then proceeds: "And, in addition to all this, the court must be able substantially to restore the parties to the position which they occupied before they entered into the contract."

[5] In the case here, the title of Zell and Van Dyke in and to the alleged contract between the appellant and the appellees was obtained in a legal, businesslike way, and appellant received compensation therefor. His assignment of the contract was absolute, and carried with it all right, title, and interest he had in and to any benefits under the contract, and he acknowledges the receipt of an adequate legal consideration for the assignment. It further appears from the amended bill and the exhibits therewith that the appellant subsequently recognized and ratified his former assignment of the contract to Zell and Van Dyke, so that there could be no question that the contract passed from the appellant absolutely and became vested in Zell and Van Dyke. Clearly, therefore, the case made is not one in which the court could even substantially restore the parties to the position which they occupied before the assignment of the contract by the appellant to Zell and Van Dyke. No decree that the court could have entered in this case against Zell and Van Dyke in favor of appellant would relieve the appellees from liability to be again sued by Zell and Van Dyke upon the same contract and the same cause of action. Wherefore Zell and Van Dyke are necessary parties to this litigation, without whose presence complete justice cannot be done the appellees; and it necessarily follows that the decree of the court of law and chancery upon the demurrer should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond. Bill by J. W. Harris against W. M. Cary and others. Decree dismissing the suit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

G. A. Hanson and P. W. Hardin, for appellant. Bev. T. Crump and Lucius F. Cary, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. A demurrer to the original bill filed in this cause was sustained by the chancery court of the city of Richmond, and thereupon the complainant, J. W. Harris, by leave of court, filed an amended and supplemental bill, making the original bill part thereof, to which amended bill a separate demurrer was filed by the defendant W. M. Cary, which was also sustained. From the decree sustaining the demurrer to these bills and dismissing the same, this appeal was allowed. The original bill being in totidem verbis made a part of the amended and supplemental bill, the two will be treated and considered as one bill.

The more important allegations are that in January, 1904, J. Samuel McCue and Caroline H. Harris entered into a contract between themselves and the complainant that the parties, other than the complainant, would furnish a sum of money sufficient to option, open up, purchase, and sell lands and mineral rights in Buchanan county, Va., and that the complainant should share equally with them in the net proceeds, after the money advanced, with interest and expenses, had been paid, in consideration of his time and services in developing, opening, and selling the lands and mineral rights so optioned or purchased. It is further alleged that on May 23, 1904, the parties, together with the defendant W. M. Cary, entered into another contract, enlarging the first and agreeing to advance a larger amount of money for the purchase of additional lands, and further agreeing to organize a corporation, to be known as the Buchanan Coal & Coke Company, to which the properties bought should be conveyed. It was further agreed that all moneys advanced and to be advanced should be represented by the preferred stock of the company in proportion to the amount advanced by each; that the common stock was to be likewise apportioned, except that the rights of the complainant were provided for in these words: "And J. W. Harris, in lieu of his services rendered in securing said property and to be rendered until said preferred stock is redeemed, is to receive one-third of the common stock of said corporation, issued for said property." It is further alleged that subsequently the defendant W. M. Cary and W. E. Harris visited Buchanan county and inspected the lands then under option, and other lands adjacent and in that section, and while there the defendant W. M. Cary, though well satisfied with complainant's work and much elated over the value of the lands, insisted that as they were buying more lands than originally contemplated, and as he was advancing and paying out so much money to secure the lands, complainant should be willing to surrender one-ninth of his interest in the common stock; that for the sake of harmony he had agreed to this, and on September 3, 1904, had united with the defendant Cary and W. E. Harris in a written contract, under which he was to receive, in consideration of his services, two-ninths of the common stock of the company, instead of one-third thereof, as provided in the previous contracts. It is further alleged that under this agreement of September 3, 1904, complainant continued his work and services, as he had under the former agreements, faithfully and assiduously doing and performing his work under the direction of the defendant Cary, president of the company, from whom he received approximately 150 letters, instructing and directing him in regard to taking more options, renewing others, dropping some, and buying and paying for certain lands, having the surveys made and opening the coal—in fact, everything in detail pertaining to the lands and interests of the company; that under these directions certain lands embraced in the options to McCue were dropped, and other lands, in their stead, bought for the company, the complainant being directed not to stop taking options and buying lands until from 22,000 to 30,000 acres were secured.

In the meantime Cary, the defendant, had become the purchaser of all of the interests in the company of J. Samuel McCue, under the contract of May 23, 1904, and had thereby become the owner of three-fourths of the holdings of the company, and was under obligation to advance three-fourths of the money necessary to pay for all the lands bought and the costs incident to their purchase; and, holding the majority interest in the company, he was elected president, and his two sons directors, one of them being secretary and treasurer, thereby having complete control of the affairs of the company.

Complainant further alleges that from September 3, 1904, the date of his agreement to take two-ninths of the common stock for his share in the profits, instead of three-ninths, as formerly agreed, to July 19, 1907, there had been no dispute or question raised, or even intimated, as to the meaning of the agreement of September 3, 1904, fixing his interest at two-ninths of the common stock of the Buchanan Coal & Coke Company; that on July 19, 1907, the defendant Cary, while acting as president of the company, and as such a trustee for complainant, for the purpose of forcing complainant to surrender and sacrifice his interests in the company to him (Cary), wrote a letter to complainant, saying that he had had the two contracts of May and September, 1904, submitted to competent men, and that their finding was, and his interpretation always had been, that complainant's interest in the common stock was limited to such lands as were optioned to J. Samuel McCue, when the defendant Cary knew at the time that complainant had worked for three years, without notice of such construction of the contracts, under his direction, and that at his instance a large part of the lands optioned to McCue had been rejected, and many thousands of acres of other lands taken in their stead by the company; that other letters of like import were sent to complainant by the defendant, in one of which he was told that his interest in the common stock was based upon less than 7,000 acres of the land owned by the company.

It is further alleged that from the time the letter of July, 1907, was written, until March, 1908, the defendant Cary continuously demanded and insisted that complainant should surrender to him one-half of his two-ninths interest in the common stock, and by every conceivable device tried to persuade, induce, and force him to do so, finally threatening complainant that, if he did not surrender to him the stock demanded, he would let the whole thing go, and the company be sold out, and that complainant would then get nothing.

It is further alleged that, at the time of these importunities and threats, complainant had faithfully performed and fully completed his obligations under the contracts between the parties, and that the defendant Cary had wholly failed to perform his part of the contracts by advancing the money to pay for the lands that had been bought; that the defendant Cary then owed about $50,000 that he had agreed to advance, but instead of paying the same he permitted suits to be brought against the company on the obligations due for land, for the sole purpose of carrying out his threats to have the land sold, and thereby to destroy the entire interest of complainant in the common stock of the company, refusing at the same time to issue to complainant any part of the common stock until he should yield and comply with his demand that part of complainant's interest be given to him. Complainant further alleges that, at the time this force and coercion was being exerted over him by the defendant Cary, he had no business experience, except that had with the Buchanan Coal & Coke Company, and other work of like character; that all of his life, since leaving school, had been spent in the mountains getting options upon coal and timber lands, prospecting and making openings in and otherwise developing such lands; that on March 6, 1908, he had no property except his interest in this company; that he was practically without money, having only about $25, and without any immediate prospect of getting employment; that he had a family to support, and owed nearly $1,000 which he had borrowed to sustain himself and family while working for the Buchanan Coal & Coke Company; that he was in financial and mental distress, brought about by the actions of the defendant Cary; that in this distress, so brought about, he was unable to resist the threat of the defendant to let the debts go unpaid, and thereby force a sale of the property, which would result in the total loss of complainant's entire interest in the stock; that complainant was, and had been for some time prior to March 6, 1908, in constant fear that all of his stock would be made worthless by the fraudulent course of the defendant Cary; and that while in this state of fear and financial and mental distress, much against his will, he was forced to and did, for the purpose of having the debts paid and thereby saving himself from financial ruin, make and execute two agreements, dated, respectively, March 6, 1908, and March 18, 1908, which provided that he should only receive three-eighteenths, instead of two-ninths, of the common stock, which two-ninths, under the contract in writing of September 3, 1904, represented his interest, not only for his time and labor for the three years he was at work subsequent to September 3, 1904, but also for one year of work rendered prior thereto under the contract known as the "McCue contract."

Complainant charges that the defendant Cary took advantage of the fact that he was helpless and in his power, and of his own delinquency in failing to comply with his part of the contract by paying the outstanding debts, and of his power as president of the company, chief owner of its assets, in control of its board of directors, and sole manager of its interests, to compel him to surrender, without consideration, one-fourth of his stock to the sole use and benefit of said Cary; that the stock he was thus required to give the defendant Cary was 166% shares, which at its par value amounted to $16,666.66%. Complainant further charges that the agreements of March 6, 1908, and March 18, 1908, were obtained from him by force, fraud, intimidation, and duress; that they are wholly without consideration, equity, or right; and that, if there was any basis or reason for his being required to give up any part of his stock, which he denies, the portion taken from him should go to the company, and the defendant Cary not be allowed to appropriate the same, as he has done, as his individual property.

The prayer of the bill is that the agreements of March 6 and March 18, 1908, by which complainant was forced to surrender to the defendant Cary one-fourth of his two-ninths interest in the common stock of the company, be set aside as null and void, so far as they affect the interest of complainant; that pending the further order of the court the defendant Cary be enjoined and restrained from selling or otherwise disposing of the stock acquired by said agreements, or either of them, or, if said Cary has parted with any part thereof, that he may be compelled to keep in his possession and under his control and ownership, subject to the future order of the court, an equal number of shares of like stock of the company to that obtained from complainant; that the said Cary or the Buchanan Coal & Coke Company be required to transfer or issue to complainant an equal number of shares of the company to that taken from him under the agreements aforesaid; and for general relief according to equity and good conscience, as may be deemed proper by the court.

[1, 2] The doctrine appears to be well established that where one party has possession or control of the property of another, and refuses to surrender it to the control and use of the owner, except upon compliance with an unlawful demand, a contract made by the owner under such circumstances to emancipate the property is to be regarded as made under compulsion and duress. Nor can it be doubted that a contract procured by threats, inducing fear of the destruction of one's property, may be avoided on the ground of duress, there being nothing in such a case but the form of a contract, wholly lacking the voluntary assent of the party to be bound by it. To constitute duress, it is sufficient if the will be constrained by the unlawful presentation of a choice between comparative evils, as inconvenience and loss by the detention of property, loss of property altogether, or compliance with an unconscionable demand.

[3] In civil cases, the rule as to duress has a broader application at the present day than that it formerly had. So when concessions are exacted through the necessity of a person, in order to save his property, illegally withheld by another, from destruction or irreparable injury, such a transaction may be avoided on the ground of compulsion, though not amounting to technical duress. Ritzger-ald v. Construction Co., 44 Neb. 463, 62 N. W. 899; Vyne v. Glenn, 41 Mich. 112, 1 N. W. 997; Brueggstradt v. Ludwig, 184 Ill. 24, 56 N. E. 419; Alston v. Durant, 2 Strob. (S. C.) 257, 49 Am. Dec. 596, and note; Adams v. Schiffer, 11 Colo. 15, 17 Pac. 21, 7 Am. St. Rep. 202; Lonergan v. Buford, 148 U. S. 581, 13 Sup. Ct. 684, 37 L. Ed. 569.

In the case last mentioned, citing Radich v. Hutchins, 95 U. S. 210, 24 L. Ed. 409, it is said that: "To constitute coercion or duress which will be regarded as sufficient to make the payment involuntary, there must be some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed, or believed to be possessed, by the party exacting or receiving the payment over the person or property of another, from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by making the payment."

In Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. 99-117, 62 Am. Dec. 142, cited by Mr. Justice Brewer in 148 U. S. 581, 13 Sup. Ct. 684, 37 L. Ed. 569, supra, it is said: "If a party has in his possession goods or other property belonging to another, and refuses to deliver such property to that other unless the latter pays him a sum of money which he has no right to receive, and the latter in order to obtain possession of his property, pays that sum, the money so paid is a payment by compulsion."

[4, 5] In the case at bar, the allegations of the bill, which are admitted to be true by the demurrer, state a case clearly calling for the interposition of a court of equity to afford relief. The helpless situation and the extreme necessities of the complainant were taken advantage of to compel him to surrender to the defendant one-fourth of his property, which was under the latter's control, and to which, as alleged, he had no lawful right, in order to save such property from sacrifice; the choice offered the complainant being financial ruin or immediate compliance with the alleged fraudulent, oppressive, and unconscionable demands of the defendant.

It is clear, both upon reason and authority, that the bill states a good cause of action, entitling the complainant to relief, if the facts alleged are established by the evidence to be adduced.

The decree complained of, sustaining the demurrer to the bill, must therefore be set aside, and this court will enter such decree as the chancery court ought to have entered, overruling the demurrer. And the cause will be remanded to the chancery court, which will, in accordance with the prayer of the bill, enjoin and restrain the defendant W. M. Cary from disposing of the stock in controversy until the further order of that court, and for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

CARTER v. KEETON & COLEMAN et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 58*)—CONSENT OF OWNER—AUTHORITY TO CONTRACT—TENANT.

A tenant in possession has no authority to make repairs or cause improvements on the leased premises which will subject the owner's interest to a mechanic's lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 72, 73; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 58*)—CONSENT OF OWNER—NECESSITY FOR CONSENT OF OWNER—IMPROVEMENTS BY TENANT.

Under Code 1904, § 2475, which provides that for repairs only no lien shall attach unless ordered by the owner or his agent, and section 2483, which provides that, where a person causing a building to be erected or repaired owns less than a fee-simple estate in the land, his interest alone shall be subjected to a mechanic's lien, the landlord's reversion is not subject to a mechanic's lien for improvements and repairs made under a contract with the tenant in his individual capacity, unless the repairs were ordered by the tenant as agent for the landlord, and the landlord ratified the act of the tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 72, 73; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 72*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—INTERESTS AFFECTED—LANDLORD'S REVERSION.

Labor and materials were furnished by plaintiffs in repairs and improvements on premises in possession of defendant's tenant under a contract with the tenant, with constructive notice to plaintiffs of the landlord's reversionary interests, and on the tenant's assurance that he, the tenant, would pay them. The landlord had no notice that the work was being performed, and did nothing to mislead plaintiffs as to the ownership of the land. Held, that under Code 1904, § 2483, which provides that, where a person causing a building to be erected or repaired owns less than the fee simple, his interest alone shall be subjected to such lien, the landlord's reversion was not subject to a lien.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 309*)—REVIEW—DIRECTING JUDGMENT—PERSONAL JUDGMENT.

A suit to enforce a mechanic's lien being in equity, the court may, on reversing a decree against a landlord, direct a personal decree against the tenant for the amount ascertained to be due plaintiffs for labor and materials furnished under contract with the tenant individually, as ascertained by the report of a commissioner.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pittsylvania County.

Action by Keeton & Coleman and others against Mollie A. Carter. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. T. Rison, for appellant. Wm. Leigh and B. H. Custer, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. The question involved in this case is whether or not the claims asserted in the bill and proceedings are liens upon the lands of Mrs. Carter, the appellant, under the provisions of sections 2475 and 2483 of the Code of 1904. These claims are for labor done and materials furnished in making repairs and erecting outhouses upon the lands of the appellant under a contract entered into between her tenant and the contractors, Keeton & Coleman.

By section 2475 of the Code it is provided that, where the claim is for repairs only, no lien shall attach to the property unless the repairs were ordered by the owner or his agent.

Section 2483 provides that, if the person who shall cause the building or structure to be erected or repaired owns less than a fee-simple estate in the land, only his interest therein shall be subjected to such liens.

The appellant, who was the owner of the land in fee, testifies that at the time the repairs and improvements were made, and for some years prior thereto, she resided with her two sons, Z. V. Carter and Wade H. Carter, one of whom lived in Tazewell and the other in Giles county, and that she had not been in Pittsylvania county where the lands were situated for four or five years; that she did not authorize her son, W. D. Carter, who was her tenant from year to year and in possession of the land, or any other person, to erect any improvements or buildings, or make any repairs upon the buildings on the land; that she did not know that any repairs or improvements were being made or had been made on the premises until she was served with process in this suit. These statements of Mrs. Carter are not contradicted by any witness, neither is there any evidence tending to show that she had any communication, directly or indirectly, with the lien claimants. But it is insisted that inasmuch as W. D. Carter, with whom the contract for repairs and improvements was made, was her son and tenant in possession of the land, and her son Z. V. Carter, with whom she resided in Tazewell county a portion of the time, was upon the leased premises during the time the repairs and improvements were being made, and saw the work going on, she must be presumed to have known that the work was being done and consented to it, and thus be held to have authorized the repairs and caused the improvements to be made, within the meaning of sections 2475 and 2483 of the Code.

[1] These circumstances do not show that W. D. Carter was her agent to make, or that she caused the repairs and improvements to be made. Neither do they show, even if Mrs. Carter knew what her tenant was doing (which she denies), that she consented to having the work done. The tenant in possession of land, whether he be the son of the owner or be a stranger, has no authority by reason of those relations merely to make repairs or cause improvements to be made on the leased premises which will bind the owner's interest in the land for their payment. Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, § 79; Baxter v.

Hutchings, 49 Ill. 116; Leismann v. Lovely, 45 Wis. 420.

[2] In order to bind her interest in the land, it must appear that the tenant making the repairs was her agent for that purpose (Code, § 2475), or that she caused the repairs or improvements to be made (Code, § 2483; Atlas Portland Cement Co. v. Main Line Realty Corp., 70 S. E. 536, decided at March term, 1911, of the court), or that she ratified what the tenant had done.

Mrs. Carter was the fee-simple owner of the land. The deed evidencing her title was of record. She did nothing to mislead the contractors, or to induce them to believe that her son was the owner of the land, or that he was authorized to have the repairs or improvements made. They contracted with the tenant, not as her agent, but in his individual capacity. When the repairs and improvements were about half completed, they stopped work because W. D. Carter, with whom they had made their contract, failed to pay them in accordance with its terms. About that time they had actual knowledge (having had constructive notice all the time) that Mrs. Carter was the owner of the property; yet they returned to work upon the assurance of W. D. Carter that he would pay them, and completed the repairs and improvements without informing Mrs. Carter of what they were doing, or that they were or would look to her or her property for the payment of the labor they were performing and the materials they were furnishing.

Whatever moral obligation Mrs. Carter may be under to pay them for what their labor and materials have added to the value of her property, it is clear, under the facts disclosed by this record, that neither she nor her property is under any legal liability therefor.

[4] The decree of the circuit court must therefore be reversed, as to Mrs. M. A. Carter, W. H. Carter, and Z. V. Carter, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, with direction, if asked so to do by the lien claimants, to render a personal decree (Johnson v. Bunn, 108 Va. 490, 493, 62 S. E. 341, 19 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1084) against W. D. Carter for the amount ascertained to be due them by the report of Commissioner Clement.

STATES (§ 61*)—COMPENSATION OF AGENTS—
PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

The state, having claims against the federal government, appointed agents to prosecute and settle them for a percentage of the sum recovered by them. One of the agents reported to the Governor unsuccessful efforts to collect the claims, and stated that the federal government would not recognize their validity until bonds issued by the state and held by the federal government were satisfied. Subsequently the state, through the efforts of others, obtained an adjustment of the claims without any assistance from the agents. Held, that the agents were not entitled to the compensation agreed on, under the rule that, where an agent assumes to do a specified act, no compensation is earned until performance.

CARDWELL, J. George B. Stone, administrator of Bernard P. Green, deceased, and Frank D. Wynn, administrator of John A. Parker, deceased, filed their petition in the circuit court of the city of Richmond, pursuant to sections 746 and 747 of the Code of 1904, against Morton Marye, Auditor of Public Accounts, in which it is claimed that the commonwealth of Virginia is indebted to the petitioners' intestates in the sum of $172,358.26, with interest thereon from the — day of April, 1903, being 10 per cent. of $1,723,582.63, which it is alleged was collected by the commonwealth of Virginia on account of advances made by Virginia to the United States government for aid in carrying on the war with Great Britain, beginning in the year 1812.

The cause was heard before the circuit court upon said petition, the demurrer and answer of the Auditor of Public Accounts thereto, and the evidence. Whereupon the judgment to which this writ of error was awarded was entered, denying the relief asked by the petitioners, and dismissing their petition, with costs to the commonwealth.

In the view that we take of the case, it is immaterial whether the proceeding is to be regarded as one at law or in equity, or whether the evidence has been incorporated into the record by a proper bill of exceptions or not, or whether the alleged agency of petitioners' intestates was joint or several, or whether the alleged contract upon which this action is brought should be construed to be a contract for procuring legislation, and, therefore, void as contra bonos mores.

Coming to the consideration of the case upon its merits, it appears that during the war with Great Britain, beginning, as above mentioned, in 1812, Virginia and other states of the Union advanced to the United States government certain moneys for military purposes, which the United States regarded and treated as advances spent for the benefit of the United States government, and therefore a debt payable by the latter, with interest. The rule adopted by the government by which the interest upon these advances was to be calculated or computed brought forth a formal protest from the states which had made these advances, and delay in their settlement followed. Pursuant to an act of Congress theretofore passed, the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 8th of January, 1859, reported that upon a readjustment of the account and a proper computation of interest Virginia would be entitled to $339,312, with interest from 1833, whereby the amount due the state of Virginia was fixed and determined by the Secretary of the Treasury as of the said date. On February 14, 1859, the Governor of Virginia Hon. Henry A. Wise, received a communication from John A. Parker, Esq., stating that a large balance seemed to be due the state from the United States, whereupon Gov. Wise authorized Parker to examine and report upon this claim, and on February 10, 1860, the General Assembly of Virginia passed a joint resolution continuing Thomas Green (who had been appointed by the General Assembly in 1850 to prosecute said claim) and John A. Parker as agents to recover of the United States government the said claim, and directing that, upon recovery being made, "It shall be the duty of said agents to obtain payment of the same by draft from the United States government; * * * but, if paid in United States stock or bonds, the same shall be transmitted to the Auditor, and the Auditor is hereby directed to pay to the said agents 3 per cent. commission on such amount as may be by them recovered."

Prior to the adoption of the resolution of February 10, 1860, supra, to wit, in 1858, the commonwealth of Virginia became indebted to the United States government upon certain bonds or certificates of indebtedness of Virginia, obtained by the United States by purchase on account of certain Indian trust funds, and amounting to $531,000, with interest. Upon this sum Virginia paid interest up to 1861, when default was made, and, of course, it was thereafter claimed on behalf of the United States government that said indebtedness of Virginia was to be credited upon the indebtedness of the United States government to Virginia; i. e., that the one was to be set off against the other as a matter of accounting.

Thomas Green died about the year 1877, and on March 12, 1884, an act of the General Assembly was passed (Acts 1883-84, c. 399), which provided: "That Bernard P. Green is hereby appointed in the place of the said Thomas Green (his father), deceased, to prosecute, in association with the said John A.

Parker, to settlement, the said claims of the state of Virginia against the United States, upon the terms and conditions specified by the act or acts creating the said Thomas Green and John A. Parker agents as aforesaid, except so far as the said terms are in conflict with this act."

(2) "That the Treasurer of the State is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Bernard P. Green and John A. Parker, jointly, and upon their receipts, ten per centum of any sum or sums appropriated by the Congress of the United States for the payment of said claims, and paid to the state for amount due from the United States."

John A. Parker died in 1895, and Bernard P. Green in September, 1902.

On the 14th of November, 1899, Green made a report to the Governor of Virginia, in which he gave a statement of the efforts that had been made by him and his associate, Parker, to recover the several amounts claimed as due from the United States to Virginia, and said: "Our claim, of course, as it now stands, is not recognized by the treasury; and, therefore, if the United States should ever owe Virginia for anything, past or future, nothing will be paid her until these bonds are satisfied. The United States statute forbids it. I therefore respectfully submit, as the efforts of Virginia to secure a settlement of this account for two-thirds of a century have brought no relief from Congress, it is now expedient that the accounts between the state of Virginia and the United States be referred to the Supreme Court of the United States for a speedy and final adjustment."

Whatever may have been the reasons for the change in the amount of commissions to be allowed on any sum or sums recovered by Green and Parker from 3 per cent., which had been originally provided, to 10 per cent., as fixed by the act of March 12, 1884, it was bound to have been understood by all concerned, and especially by Green and Parker, who were conversant with the situation, that in any settlement made of the claims of Virginia against the United States the latter would be entitled to have taken into account the indebtedness of Virginia to the United States upon the bonds referred to in the report of Green in 1899, supra. It is very true that when the act of March 12, 1884, was passed the bonds of the state of Virginia held by the United States, upon their face, did not become due till 1894, but the interest thereon was payable annually, and had not been paid since 1861. Certainly nothing had been accomplished by Green and Parker when said bonds became payable in 1894, nor by Green after Parker's death in 1895, for the latter's report to the Governor in 1899 admits of no other construction than that all his efforts had proven fruitless, and that nothing had been accomplished by any agency or efforts that had been put forth by himself, or by his father, or by Parker, who had from time to time been representing the state; indeed, the long and earnest efforts of our representatives in Congress to secure by act of Congress a settlement of the claims of Virginia against the United States had at that time been of no avail.

The bonds, etc., of the state, held by the United States, having matured in 1894, suit for the enforcement of their payment was threatened by the United States, as authorized and directed by the Fifty-Fifth Congress. Whereupon Virginia's Senators in that body arranged with the Attorney General of the United States for a postponement of the bringing of the said suit in order that they might have opportunity to get Congress to pass such legislation as was necessary to effect a settlement of the respective claims of Virginia and the United States, and to do justice with respect thereto without litigation in the courts; and subsequently a successful effort was made in the senate to have incorporated in the "Omnibus Claims Bill" an amendment, which was retained in the bill when it was finally passed by the House of Representatives, providing for a settlement of the claim of Virginia by an offset against the claim of the bonds of Virginia held by the United States government as of the dates, respectively, at which the accounts would be completely or most nearly balanced; and the balance found due on such date, after deducting the principal and interest on said bonds or other evidences of debt to such date, should be paid to or by the state of Virginia. Said statute applied alike to claims held by the city of Baltimore and other states of the Union similar to the claim asserted by Virginia. After the said statute became effective, the settlement contemplated and provided for with respect to the claim of Virginia against the United States was taken up by our Senators, the then Governor and the Second Auditor of Virginia, and in April, 1903, a final settlement was reached whereby the sum of $5.50 was found to be the balance due Virginia, which balance was paid into the treasury of the state by the United States.

The proof in the record is conclusive that the plan for the settlement of this controversy, authorized by the said act of Congress, was conceived and the final settlement effected pursuant to the statute without any aid or suggestion from Bernard P. Green (Parker being then dead); and there is proof, also, that he did not and could not have aided in the efforts made by our representatives in Congress to secure the passage of said act, but that any activity on his part or on the part of any other paid agent of the state in that connection would probably have been more hurtful than helpful.

As we have seen, this action is founded upon an alleged contract between the commonwealth of Virginia and Bernard P. Green and John A. Parker, arising out of the act of the General Assembly approved March 12, 1884, whereby it is claimed that Green and Parker became entitled to 10 per cent. commissions on the full amount of the claim that Virginia was asserting against the United States government, without deducting therefrom the amount of the bonds and interest owing by the state which were then held by the United States; and such is the claim asserted in this action by plaintiffs in error, notwithstanding it was, as has been observed, known of all parties interested, including plaintiffs in error's intestates, when said act of March 12, 1884, was passed, that the United States held the said bonds against the state of Virginia. And it must of necessity have been also known by all parties interested that Virginia was relying upon the cancellation of these bonds as a payment pro tanto of the claims she held against the United States.

Aside, however, from this view of the case, let us see what, if anything, was done by Green and Parker pursuant to the said act of March 12, 1884, which entitled plaintiffs in error to a recovery upon the claim they are here asserting. Certainly nothing was done by Green and Parker up to the death of the latter in 1895, and nothing by Green up to the date of his report to the Governor of Virginia in November, 1899; for he distinctly says that "the efforts of Virginia, continued for two-thirds of a century, to secure a settlement of Virginia's claim against the United States had brought no relief from Congress," and suggested a course of action to be taken by the state entirely foreign to the line of action contemplated by whatever agency was conferred upon him and his associate, Parker, by the act of March 12, 1884. In other words, Green plainly, in his said report to the Governor abandoned all hope of beneficial results to Virginia from the efforts that he and Parker had made, or that he could thereafter himself make, and the record in this case does not disclose a single act or suggestion on his part after the date of his report in furtherance of the aim and purpose of Virginia to have her claim against the United States adjusted and finally settled.

We are unable to appreciate the force of the argument of the learned counsel for plaintiffs in error that, if Green and Parker were diligent in trying to effect a settlement of Virginia's claim, they were entitled to their commissions thereon, whether or not their efforts brought about a settlement of the claim, or it was accomplished by some other agency; nor do we (for the reasons already given) recognize any force in the argument that when Virginia admitted the validity of her obligation held by the United States, and agreed that it should be treated as an offset against the claim which she had contracted with Green and Parker to prosecute, and thereby put it beyond the power of said agents to effect a settlement upon any other basis, said agents were nevertheless entitled to their commissions on the aggregate amount for which Virginia was given credit in the settlement of her claim under Act Cong. May 27, 1902, c. 887, 32 Stat. 235.

It may be, as counsel contend, that "if one contracting party can show that the other prevented his performance, it is to be taken as prima facie true that he would have accomplished it, if he had not been thus stopped"; but that is by no means the case here. There is no foundation whatever for the contention that the state of Virginia in any way prevented Green and Parker, or the first-named after the latter's death, from accomplishing the purpose they undertook pursuant to the contract with them set out in the said act of the General Assembly approved March 12, 1884. No such claim was made by Green or Parker in their lifetime or could have been made. The fact is they undertook, pursuant to said act, to prosecute to a settlement the claims of the state of Virginia against the United States upon certain terms and conditions specified in an act or acts theretofore creating Thomas Green and John A. Parker agents for the same purpose, and were to receive as their compensation "ten per centum of any sum or sums appropriated by the Congress of the United States for the payment of said claims and paid to the state for amount due from the United States." This action, as we have seen, is founded on said statute of March 12, 1884, and the complaining parties, plaintiffs in error, have utterly failed in their proof to fix upon the state of Virginia any liability to their intestates under that act.

The principle of law with respect to the right of an agent to compensation for his services, applicable here, is the same as that which applies to agencies of like character, generally, viz., that where the agent assumes to do a specified act, until the specified act is performed or substantially performed (except in exceptional circumstances, none of which apply here), no right to compensation arises to the agent. The agency must be fully completed. Mechem on Agency, §§ 610, 635, 682; Crockett v. Grayson, 98 Va. 354, 86 S. E. 477; Parker v. Building & Loan Ass'n, 55 W. Va. 135, 46 S. E. 811; 1 A. & E. Ency. of L., 1101, 1111, and cases cited.

We do not intend by anything said in this opinion to disparage the diligent and intelligent efforts of both Green and Parker, or those of Green after Parker's death, in trying to bring about the desired settlement of Virginia's claim against the United States; but the fact is, as Green frankly stated in his report of 1899, that all of their efforts were without avail, and we know of no principle of law which denies the right of the state thereafter to effect a settlement of her claim through the efforts of her representatives in Congress, without subjecting herself to liability to plaintiffs in error's intestates.

for commissions on the amount of her claim, set off by the United States in the settlement finally made under the act of Congress, the passage of which was procured by the unaided efforts of the state's representatives in that body.

There is no error in the judgment of the circuit court complained of and therefore it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CARPENTER v. CAMP MFG. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—DEEDS—RIGHTS ACQUIRED.

A deed to standing timber and the right to cut and remove the same within a fixed period, and within such additional time as the purchaser may desire on paying interest on the price annually, gives the purchaser, after the expiration of the fixed period, a reasonable time in which to cut and remove the timber, and an additional reasonable time in which to remove the buildings, railroads, and tramways erected on the land as permitted by the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—CONVEYANCE OF TIMBER—RESERVATION—CONSTRUCTION.

An owner conveyed standing timber, with a right to cut and remove the timber within a specified time, and such additional time as the purchaser might desire on paying interest on the price annually. Subsequently he conveyed the land to a third person, but reserved to himself all the timber on the land previously conveyed, and all rights to the timber, whether of reversion of the timber or payments to be made by the purchaser thereof. Held, that the rights reserved must be exercised within a reasonable time after the expiration of the period fixed for the cutting and removal of the timber by the purchaser thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 90*)—CONSTRUCTION.

The court, in construing a deed, must give effect, if possible, to all of its terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 237; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 90*)—CONSTRUCTION AGAINST GRANTOR.

The language of a deed must be construed most strongly against the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 235; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

5. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION.

A covenant in a deed to standing timber, which gives to the purchaser the right to build and operate railroads on the land to remove the timber, or anything else which he may wish to carry over the railroads, gives to the purchaser the right, not only to build railroads to remove the timber acquired by that deed, but to transport anything else which he may wish to carry over the railroads; and his right thereto may continue for an indefinite period, subject to such control by the courts as will prevent the rights from being exercised inequitably to the owner.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Brunswick County.

Suit by W. R. Carpenter against the Camp Manufacturing Company and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and remanded.

See, also, 70 S. E. 496.

Marvin Smithey and R. B. Davis, for appellant. E. R. Turnbull, Jr., and E. P. Buford, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The Camp Manufacturing Company is the successor in title to the Brunswick Lumber Company, which purchased from John W. Harrison and wife all of the timber, pine and poplar, 10 inches in diameter across the stump and larger at the time of cutting, upon a certain tract of land, together with the privilege of erecting buildings and operating railroads, tramways, and boggy roads across the land, as set out in the deeds.

Each of the two deeds conveying the timber above referred to contains this provision: "The said party of the second part, its assigns or successors, shall have five years from the date of this deed in which to remove the timber herein conveyed from the said land; and, if they shall fail to remove said timber in the said time, they may have such further time in which to remove the same as they may desire: Provided, however, that they pay interest to the said parties of the first part, or their assigns, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the amount of the purchase price above mentioned, from the expiration of the said five years until they remove the said timber."

These deeds were duly recorded in the clerk's office of Brunswick county. By a subsequent deed John W. Harrison conveyed this land to George O. Dromgoole, in which he reserved certain rights, as follows: " * * * But there is reserved to the parties of the first part all the timber on said land heretofore conveyed to the Brunswick Lumber Company, and all rights under the contracts of sale to said lumber company, whether of reversion of said timber or payments to be made by said company for any cause, and all other rights whatever."

The rights of the Brunswick Lumber Company under its deeds have passed to and are now vested in the Camp Manufacturing Company, and those of the grantor, John W. Harrison, have passed to and are now vested in the appellant, W. R. Carpenter, subject to the above reservation. John W. Harrison is since deceased, and Daisy R. Harrison is his devisee and personal representative.

Carpenter, the appellant, filed his bill, making the Camp Manufacturing Company, the Safe Deposit & Trust Company of Baltimore, trustee in a deed of trust executed by the Camp Manufacturing Company, and Daisy R. Harrison, in her own right and as personal representative of John W. Harrison, deceased, parties defendant. His contention is that all the rights of the Camp Manufacturing Company and of Daisy R. Harrison under the deeds herein referred to have ceased, and he prays the court so to declare, as, being claimed under deeds of record, they constitute a cloud upon appellant's title, and he prays, also, for an injunction against the Camp Manufacturing Company, its agents, attorneys, and employes, to prohibit it from constructing or attempting to construct any spur tracks or branch lines of railway leading from or connecting with the line of lumber railway first constructed by said company across the Harrison plantation, and to enjoin and restrain the said company, its agents, etc., from hauling, transporting, or carrying lumber or any substance whatsoever over the said Harrison farm, except on and by means of the lumber railway first constructed and located by the said company across the said farm, except for the purpose of cutting and removing the timber now standing on the John W. Harrison plantation.

The case was regularly brought on to be heard upon the bill and exhibits, the demurrer and answer of the defendant the Camp Manufacturing Company, and exhibits filed therewith, and upon the depositions of witnesses, in consideration of which the court decreed that the deeds from Harrison and wife to the Brunswick Lumber Company vested in the Brunswick Lumber Company a present absolute title to all of the timber mentioned and described in said deeds that was on the tract of land in the bill and proceedings mentioned, at the date of said deeds, which was then 10 inches in diameter across the tree stump and larger, or which would grow to said size at the time the said timber shall be reached in the process of cutting, which title is defeasible as to such of said timber as shall not be removed from the said land within the time limited by said deeds, to wit, five years from the said 18th day of May, 1890, and five years from the said 27th day of May, 1899, respectively, and within such further time after the expiration of said period of five years as said Brunswick Lumber Company, its assigns or successors, and the said John W. Harrison and wife, the parties to the contracts embodied in said deeds, may agree upon, or, in the event of their failure or inability to agree, within such further time as the said Brunswick Lumber Company, its assigns or successors, upon the payment or tender of the interest provided for in said deeds, shall be entitled to demand upon a fair construction of the said deeds.

"That the said defendant Camp Manufacturing Company, as the assignee of the said Brunswick Lumber Company, is, by virtue of the deed executed to the said Camp Manufacturing Company by the said Brunswick Lumber Company on the 1st day of November, 1902, in the bill and proceedings mentioned, entitled to and is vested with all of the rights and titles in and to the said timber, and is entitled to exercise all of the rights and privileges so granted to and vested in the said Brunswick Lumber Company by the deeds aforesaid, as set forth in the first paragraph of this decree.

"That by virtue of the deeds so executed by the said John W. Harrison and wife to the said Brunswick Lumber Company, and the deed so executed by the said Brunswick Lumber Company to the said Camp Manufacturing Company, the said Camp Manufacturing Company is entitled to and has the right to erect such buildings on said land as it may see fit, and to build, use, and operate railroads, tramways, or bogy roads across the said land for the purpose of removing said timber, or anything else which it may now or hereafter wish to carry over said railroads and tramways in the conduct of its business, and the right to use such material from said lands along said railroads and tramways as may be necessary or convenient to build and maintain the same, which said rights, mentioned in this the third clause of this decree, may be exercised by the said Camp Manufacturing Company during such time as it shall be entitled to remove the said timber under the first and second clauses of this decree, and to remove said buildings, railroads, and tramways from said land within one year after ceasing to operate, use, or occupy the same."

[1] With respect to the timber conveyed in the deeds to the Brunswick Lumber Company, and the right to cut and remove it, and to extend the time for its removal, if not removed within the stipulated period, and all rights incident to the cutting and removing of the timber upon the 892-acre tract of land, such as the right to erect buildings and the right to build, use, and operate railroads, tramways, and bogy roads, as the covenants and reservations with respect to these matters in this case, are identical with those passed upon in the cases of Wright v. Camp Manufacturing Company and Young v. Camp Manufacturing Company, reported in 110 Va. at page 678, 68 S. E. at page 843, we shall content ourselves with the reasoning and conclusions contained in the opinions then rendered. It was there stated that the question of what is a reasonable time is one of fact, depending upon the circumstances of each case; and in this case we are of opinion that one year from the time the decree is certified to the circuit court of Brunswick will be a reasonable time within which the Camp Manufacturing Company shall exercise its rights of removing the timber, and the incidental right of cutting timber for the construction of roads, erection of houses, etc., and that it should have leave, within two years, to remove said buildings, railroads, and tramways from said land.

[2] We think the same principles apply to-the rights reserved to John W. Harrison and wife under their deed to Dromgoole, and should be exercised and enjoyed by the successor in title of John W. Harrison, his devisee, and personal representative, within the same period prescribed to the Camp Manufacturing Company.

[3-5] What we have said is not intended to apply to the right of the Camp Manufacturing Company to the use and enjoyment of the railroad across the 892¼-acre tract. In construing the covenant between John W. Harrison and the Brunswick Lumber Company, effect must be given, if possible, to all of its terms and to its every word. The covenant provides that the Brunswick Lumber Company, its assigns and successors, shall have the right to erect such buildings on the land as they see fit, "and to build, use, and operate railroads, tramways, or bogy roads across the lands of the said parties of the first part, for the purpose of removing said timber or anything else which they now or may hereafter wish to carry over said railroads," etc. The manifest intent of the grantor (and the language is to be construed most strongly against him) was to clothe the Brunswick Lumber Company with the right, not only to build railroads, tramways, and bogy roads for the purpose of removing the timber acquired by that deed, but for the transportation of "anything else which they now or may hereafter wish to carry over said railroads" across the lands of the grantor. Now, with respect to every right contained in that covenant we have dealt in the foregoing part of this opinion, and have held that they must cease within one year from the time the decree is certified, with an additional year for the exercise of the right of removal of such buildings, railroads, and tramways as the Camp Manufacturing Company may desire to remove; but with respect to the right of transit over the road built across the lands in question we are of opinion that the limitation imposed upon the exercise of other rights would not be just, under the circumstances of this case, to the Camp Manufacturing Company, and with respect to it we are of opinion that it should be continued for an indefinite period, but that the court should reserve such control as will prevent the right from being exercised oppressively or inequitably, and, to that end, that leave should be reserved at the foot of the decree for either party to apply for and obtain such relief as may in the future appear to be proper, so that the court may be able to see that the Camp Manufacturing Company shall not arbitrarily and oppressively exercise its rights, and that Carpenter shall not interfere with the just exercise of those rights, and, when the proper time arrives, that the court may make such final adjudication upon the subject as to equity may seem meet.

The decree will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein not inconsistent with the foregoing opinion.

Reversed in part.

MORTON'S EX'R v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

June 8, 1911.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 320*)—PRECAUTIONS AS TO PERSONS AT CROSSING.

It is not the duty of an engineer to stop when he sees a person approaching the track at a crossing as he has the right to assume, in the absence of anything showing the contrary, that such a person will take reasonable precaution for his own safety, and not rush in front of a rapidly moving train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1014-1016; Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 338*)—PERSONS AT CROSSING—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

Where there is nothing to show that an engineer knew, or could have known, in time to have stopped his train, that one on the track at a crossing would be unable to cross before the train struck him, the doctrine of the last clear chance has no application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1086-1089; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 351*)—PERSONS AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by the executor of one killed by a railroad train at a crossing, the instructions held to be sufficient, and to have fully and fairly submitted the case upon the evidence to the jury.

Error to Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Action by Charles S. Morton's executor against the Southern Railway Company. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following instructions were given by the court:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that the track of a railway company is of itself a proclamation of danger to a traveler, and that he must not only use his eyes and ears, looking and listening in both directions, but he must, when about to cross a track, look and listen, so as to make these acts reasonably effective. If such looking and listening does or would warn him of the near approach of a train, then it is his duty to keep off the track until the train has passed, and to go on the track under such circumstances is negligence, and he cannot recover.

"(2) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the engineer was guilty of negligence in failing to see Dr. Morton, or warn him of the approach of the train, or in failing to endeavor to stop or reduce the speed of the train after the engineer could by the exercise of due care have seen Dr. Morton's danger, and if they further believe from the evidence that Dr. Morton by the exercise of due care on his part would or should have discovered the negligent omission of the engineer in time to have saved himself, the jury must find for the defendant.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that Dr. Morton, the plaintiff's testator, in going upon the tracks in front of the approaching train, was guilty of negligence, and in the absence of evidence that he could not have gotten off the track sooner, his negligence continued as long as he remained on the track, and until the train collided with him. Therefore, notwithstanding the engineer, also, may have been guilty of negligence in not seeing Dr. Morton, or in not sounding the whistle, or in not endeavoring to stop or reduce the speed of the train, the jury must nevertheless find for the defendant.

"(4) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the decedent, Charles S. Morton, could have stepped from the track and avoided collision with the train after the train had reached a point at which no effort on the part of the engineer could have prevented the collision, then the jury must find for the defendant, even though they believe from the evidence that the engineer might, by the previous exercise of due care, have discovered, in time to have prevented the collision, the said Morton's intention to cross the track in front of the train.

"(5) The court instructs the jury that if the engineer failed to see and warn Dr. Morton, and failed to endeavor to stop or reduce the speed of the train when by the exercise of due care he could or should have done so, and that Dr. Morton failed to see the approaching train when by the exercise of due care he could have done so, and prevented the collision, then the jury must find for the defendant.

"(6) The court instructs the jury that if Dr. Morton's death was due to the concurring negligence of himself and the defendant's servants in charge of the train, that is, to the negligence of both parties, Dr. Morton and the company, operating and in effect at the same time, they must find for the defendant.

"(7) The court instructs the jury that the duty of Dr. Morton to look out for his own safety was as great as the duty of the defendant to look out for him, and the court instructs the jury that the negligence of the defendant, if it was negligent, did not excuse Dr. Morton from the reciprocal duties he owed to care for his own safety, and that no negligence of the defendant would entitle the plaintiff to recover, unless it was the sole, proximate cause of the death of Dr. Morton."

The following instructions were requested by plaintiff, and refused:

"(A) The court instructs the jury that, although they may believe from the evidence that the defendant's engineer sounded the crossing signal at the proper point as he approached the crossing in question, this would not relieve the defendant of the duty of exercising ordinary care in keeping a reasonable lookout as its engine approached said crossing (should the jury believe from the evidence that it was a public highway crossing) in order to avoid injuring persons traveling thereon, and such failure on its part to exercise such care in keeping such lookout would be negligence.

"(B) The court instructs the jury that the law imposes upon a railway company and its agents in charge of its locomotive engines the duty of exercising ordinary care in keeping a reasonable lookout when such engine is approaching a public highway crossing, in order to avoid injury to persons passing across its tracks at such crossing, and a failure to exercise such care constitutes negligence.

"(C) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's testator went dangerously near to or upon the defendant's north-bound track under the conditions disclosed by the evidence in the case, thereby placing himself in a position of peril from defendant's engine and train approaching along said track from the south, he was guilty of negligence in so doing, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, unless the jury further believe from the evidence that the point at which the plaintiff's testator was crossing said track was a public highway crossing, and that, after he has so placed himself in a position of peril, the defendant's engineer in charge of said approaching engine could and would, by the exercise of ordinary care in keeping a reasonable lookout as the engine approached said crossing, have discovered plaintiff's testator's peril in time to have avoided striking him, and that the said engineer failed to exercise such care, and by reason of such failure ran upon and killed him, in which event the defendant would, notwithstanding the said negligence of plaintiff's testator, be liable for his death."

Lee & Kemp, for plaintiff in error. Coleman, Easley & Coleman, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. Charles S. Morton's executor brought this action against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for the death of his testator, caused, it is alleged, by the negligence of the defendant company, and at the trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment for the defendant company, to which judgment the plaintiff obtained this writ of error.

The deceased was killed on the 28th day of July, 1909, by a freight train at the crossing of defendant in error's track over a public highway at Lawyer's Station, in Campbell county, Va., in broad daylight, about 6 o'clock in the afternoon. While deceased was 77 years of age, according to the testimony of his son, the plaintiff in error, he had led "an extremely active life," and his general health and mind were very good—"in rather splendid condition"—at the time of the accident, though "his limbs were very feeble and he moved very slowly in his walking."

The defendant in error, at the point of this accident, maintained a double track, which crosses the public highway practically at right angles; the station at Lawyer's being on the right-hand side going north. From this highway crossing south the railway track is perfectly straight for at least a mile, so that a person at the crossing could see an approaching train, and could in turn be seen by the engineer in charge of the engine while the engine was traveling that distance. The rumbling of the train could be and was heard before it "came over the hill," more than a mile, and it was not a train scheduled to stop at that station. Deceased had bought a farm some miles from Lawyer's, and on the day of his death rode over to the farm with a man named Withers. He walked from the depot to Withers' house, a distance of three-fourths of a mile, and Withers drove him in a buggy to the farm and back to the station. Withers, testifying in this case, states that he saw nothing the matter with deceased; that his hearing was "as good as anybody's"; that his eyesight was as good "as anybody's"—"unusually good"; and that "he was all right mentally." When deceased returned to the depot, he visited a store on the side of the tracks opposite the station to secure an envelope and paper upon which to write a letter, and with the envelope and paper in his hand came on along the public highway towards the railway tracks in the direction of the station. When he reached the right of way of defendant in error, according to the statement of Marshal Payne, colored, the only eyewitness as to what took place, his figure was bent, his head bowed, and his eyes fixed upon the ground, coming slowly and feebly up to and across defendant in error's south-bound track, and into the space between the south-bound and the north-bound track. Payne was on the "towpath" about 110 yards north of the crossing, and was going south towards the crossing; the "towpath" being on the right-hand side (going south) of all the tracks, thus putting the witness out of line with the north-bound track upon which the train was running. The witness Payne undertakes to fix the point at which he was and where the train was when he first saw deceased approaching the crossing by certain objects on the side of the railroad track, or freight cars standing on one of the tracks south of the crossing; but, as clearly appears from his statement, he did not consider deceased in any danger until the latter had actually stepped upon the north-bound track on which the train that struck him was running. To a question as to when he commenced hollering at deceased, the witness answered: "He had started across the north-bound track, just made one step, when I hollered to him to come back before the train come. I hollered to him for him not to go over there, because I saw danger coming." The witness further says: "After he (deceased) aimed to go, to make it across the north-bound track, it (the train) was right there at the side of them box cars." And according to measurements furnished by plaintiff in error, the distance the train was then from the crossing was 105 yards (315 feet) and traveling at the rate of from 30 to 35 miles an hour, and the rumbling of which was distinctly heard by plaintiff in error's witness Wheeler (66 years old) a mile off, "before it come over the hill," so that, without entering upon a calculation in figures of the time and the distance made by the train therein, the conclusion is irresistible that, had the engineer seen the deceased the instant he stepped on the north-bound track, he must have thought, and he had the right to think, that there was ample time for deceased to clear the track before the engine reached the crossing, and that, had he seen deceased approaching the track in front of the rapidly approaching train, he (the engineer) expected, as he had the right to expect, that deceased would keep off the track until the train passed. The engineer, an experienced employé, testifies that he neither saw the deceased nor knew that he had been struck and killed till the train reached the next station. He was sitting on the right-hand side of the engine, the opposite side from that which the deceased was approaching the track; and the witness Harvey, for plaintiff in error, says that, standing about midway between the north-bound and south-bound tracks at the crossing (the distance between them being 8 feet), he could see an engineer on his seat in an engine coming north from Danville until the engine got about five rails from the crossing, which would be 170 feet, but after getting within the 170 feet the engineer would be obscured from the witness' view, and the witness from the engineer's view, by the boiler and the smokestack of the engine.

There are but two bills of exceptions made a part of the record—the one to the giving and refusing of instructions, and the other to the ruling of the court upon the motion of plaintiff in error to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant a new trial; and these exceptions are relied on here for a reversal of the judgment of the trial court.

The contention of plaintiff in error is (1) that it was the duty of defendant in error's engineer in charge of its engine to exercise ordinary care in keeping a reasonable lookout as the engine approached the public highway crossing, in order to avoid injury to persons crossing its tracks at such crossing, and that a failure to exercise such care would constitute negligence; (2) that, although it should appear from the evidence that the engineer had sounded the crossing signal at the proper point upon approaching the crossing, that fact would not relieve him from the duty of keeping a reasonable lookout as the engine approached the highway crossing; (3) that, under the facts of this particular case, the doctrine of last clear chance might properly have been applied by the jury, and that question should have been submitted to them under proper instructions.

On the other hand, defendant in error contends that the facts of the case bring it solely within the doctrine of concurring negligence, and there could be no recovery.

[1] The rule as to the degree of care imposed upon a railroad company in keeping a lookout to avoid inflicting injury at a crossing is stated in 33 Cyc. p. 923, to be "such as a prudent person would exercise under the circumstances at the particular time and crossing in endeavoring to perform his duty"; and the rule so stated has been repeatedly sanctioned by this court, one of its latest expressions being in Southern Railway Company v. Hansbrough, 107 Va. 733, 60 S. E. 58, cited in Cyc., supra. This court has also repeatedly sanctioned the rule, approved by practically all courts, that trainmen have a right to assume that a traveler will, in the discharge of his duty, take reasonable precautions for his own safety, that he will look and listen before undertaking to cross a railroad track, and that it is only after it comes to the knowledge of the trainmen (or by the exercise of ordinary diligence upon their part should come to their knowledge) that the traveler, disregarding his duty has placed himself in peril of which he was unconscious, that any duty devolves upon the trainmen to undertake to stop the train; and this rule has been applied even in a case of a child eight years of age, as well as in the case of an adult. Southern Ry. Co. v. Daves, 108 Va. 378, 61 S. E. 748. See, also, Johnson v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 91 Va. 171, 21 S. E. 238; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Hall, 109 Va. 296, 63 S. E. 1007.

Assuming for argument's sake that the engineer in this case saw, or ought to have seen, plaintiff in error's decedent before or even after he had stepped over the west rail of the track, the rules to which we have just adverted apply, since there was no evidence tending to show that there was something in the appearance of the deceased to suggest to the engineer that he did not intend to remain in a place of safety until the train passed, or would be unable to clear the track after he had stepped over its west rail, before the engine reached the crossing, and to do this the decedent would have had to travel but a distance of less than $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet. According to plaintiff in error's own evidence this freight train, traveling 30 or 35 miles an hour, was 105 yards south of the crossing when the decedent stepped across the first rail of the track upon which the train was approaching. The distance the train would have made and the distance the deceased should have traveled in the time it would have taken the engine to reach the crossing warranted the engineer in assuming that there was ample time for decedent to clear the track before being struck by the engine, there being nothing in his appearance to indicate that he was physically unable to do so or was unaware of his peril.

[2] Plaintiff in error's instructions A, B and C were properly refused. The latter told the jury that if they believed from the evidence that, after decedent had placed himself in a position of peril, the engineer could and would, by the exercise of ordinary care in keeping a reasonable lookout as the engine approached the crossing, have discovered the decedent in peril in time to have avoided striking him, defendant in error would be liable, notwithstanding decedent's negligence. In other words, the instruction sought to have applied to this case the doctrine of the last clear chance, when there was no evidence upon which it could be based, and therefore the doctrine invoked had no application whatever to the case. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Davis, 108 Va. 514, 62 S. E. 337; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Hall, supra; Southern Ry. Co. v. Bailey, 110 Va. 833, 67 S. E. 365, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379.

It may be that if the engineer knew, or could have known by the exercise of reasonable care, that the decedent could not clear the track before the engine struck him, the engineer might have sufficiently reduced the speed of the train, so as to have avoided the collision; but there is no evidence whatever to support such a theory.

[3] The seven instructions given by the court fully and fairly submitted the case upon the evidence to the jury, and the objections made thereto are without merit.

The evidence has been sufficiently adverted to, in the statement of the case and in considering the instructions refused at the trial, to clearly show that this court would not be warranted in disturbing the verdict of the jury, approved by the circuit court, and therefore said judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

MANSON & SHELL v. RAWLINGS' EX'X
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.)

June 8, 1911.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 64*)—BY CONFESSION—ENTRY BY CLERK—STATUTE.

Code 1904, § 3283, providing that in any suit a defendant may in vacation, whether the suit be on docket or not, confess judgment in the clerk's office, and that the same shall be entered of record by the clerk in the order or minute book, and be as valid as if entered in court on the day of such confession, and that the clerk shall enter upon the margin of such book, opposite where the decree is entered, the date when it was confessed, is merely declaratory of the common law, and a substantial compliance is sufficient; and hence a judgment by confession is valid, though the only memorandum be a note in the fee book of the clerk of the circuit court referring to the confession, a certificate by him to the clerk of the county court, and a memorandum by the clerk of the circuit court showing that execution was delivered to the sheriff, for a judgment is not invalid because there was no suit actually pending, or for the lack of a declaration, or for failure of the clerk to make an entry in the order book.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 172*)—EFFECT OF BAR—JOINT JUDGMENT.

Where a joint judgment returned against two defendants was barred against the estate of one, because not enforced against the personal representative of that decedent within five years, it is not barred against the estate of the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 188*)—LIABILITY OF SURETY—NATURE.

The liability of a surety is the same as that of the principal; the creditor being under no obligation to look to the principal before resorting to the surety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 387; Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 167*)—EFFECT OF BAR—LIABILITY OF SURETY.

A surety is primarily liable for the debt of his principal, save that under the direct provisions of Code 1904, §§ 2890, 2891, he may require the creditor to sue, and a failure on the part of the creditor to reduce his claim to judgment will absolve the surety, but where a judgment has been recovered against both the principal and the surety the judgment must be barred against the surety to release him; for Code 1904, § 3395, provides that in an action founded on contract, though plaintiff be barred against some of the defendants, he may have judgment against any of the others against whom he would have been entitled to recover if he had sued them only, and hence a surety is not released because a joint judgment is barred as to the principal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Brunswick County.

Action by R. W. Manson and J. R. Shell, copartners doing business under the name of Manson & Shell, against W. P. Rawlings' executrix and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

E. R. Turnbull, Jr., for appellants. R. B. Davis and E. P. Buford, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. The following are the material facts bearing upon the questions involved in this appeal: The appellants, Manson and Shell, filed their petition in a creditors' suit, pending in the circuit court of Brunswick county against the executrix and devisees of W. P. Rawlings, deceased, to subject the assets of the estate to the payment of debts, setting up a judgment in their favor against J. R. Rawlings and W. P. Rawlings, alleged to have been confessed in the clerk's office of Brunswick circuit court on March 19, 1895.

J. R. Rawlings was principal and W. P. Rawlings surety in the debt on which the judgment was founded.

By the decree under review the circuit court disallowed the judgment, holding: (1) That the evidence was not sufficient to establish it; and (2) that, if the judgment had been proved, more than five years having elapsed from the qualification of the personal representative of J. R. Rawlings, the principal debtor, before the institution of any proceedings for its enforcement, it was barred by section 3577 of the Code of 1904, and, being barred as to the estate of the principal debtor, it was likewise barred, by the same statute, as to the estate of the surety.

[1] It is admitted that appellants' petition to enforce the judgment was filed in the creditors' suit within five years from the qualification of the personal representative of W. P. Rawlings, deceased.

The following memoranda from the records of the circuit and county courts of Brunswick county were relied on to sustain the judgment:

(1) A memorandum taken from the fee book of R. P. Buford, clerk of the circuit court, dated March 19, 1895, admitted to be in his handwriting, as follows:

W. P. Rawlings and J. R. Rawlings, to judgment confessed ads Manson & Shell	$1 79
To writ tax.....	1 00
Total	$2 79

(2) A certificate from R. P. Buford, clerk of the circuit court, to Geo. R. Mallory, clerk of the county court, as follows:

"Brunswick Circuit Court, March 19th, 1895.
"Manson & Shell, Pltff. J. R. & W. P. Rawlings, Deft. In Debt.

"Judgment against defendant for $300.00 with interest from the 23d Feby., 1891, subject to credit for $50.00 paid Jan'y 10, 1893, till paid.

"Extract Tests:

"Ro. P. Buford, Clerk.
"Entered on Judgment Docket 19th day of March, 1895. G. R. Mallory, Clerk."

(3) A memorandum on the execution docket, made by R. P. Buford, clerk of the circuit court, showing the entry of an execution on the judgment in question, with the indorsement: "Fl. Fa. held up by order of plaintiff's attorney. R. P. Buford, Clerk."

(4) A memorandum made by the clerk of the circuit court on the execution book, on October 20, 1897, of an execution on the judgment, returnable to first January rules, 1898, and the indorsement opposite the entry of the execution: "Delivered to sheriff."

Though section 3283 of the Code of 1904 prescribes how a judgment by confession may be entered by the clerk in his office in vacation with particularity, the statute has been held for the most part to be declaratory merely of the common law, and that such judgment or decree will be valid when there has been substantial compliance with the statute. Thus the statute declares that in any suit the defendant may confess judgment. Nevertheless it has been repeatedly held that such judgment is not invalid because there was no suit actually pending, and no previous process. Brockenbrough's Ex'r v. Brockenbrough's Adm'r, 31 Grat. 580, 599; Shadrack's Adm'r v. Woolfolk, 32 Grat. 707; Saunders v. Lipscomb, 90 Va. 647, 19 S. E. 450.

So, also, in Pickett v. Claiborne, 4 Call, 99, the court held that the filing of a declaration was not essential to the validity of a judgment by confession. Pendleton, P., in delivering the opinion of the court, observes: "Upon the whole the court are unanimously of opinion that, as a declaration in this case would have served no other purpose than to swell fees and papers, the judgment of the general court ought to be reversed, and that of the county court affirmed."

In Shadrack's Adm'r v. Woolfolk and Saunders v. Lipscomb, supra, it was held that the provision in the statute that the judgment should be "entered of record by the clerk in the order or minute book" was only directory, and the omission of the clerk to comply with that requirement, or, indeed, his failure to enter the confession on any other book in his office, would not vitiate the judgment. In the former case there was an unsigned memorandum indorsed by the clerk on the declaration; yet the court sustained the judgment, and said the clerk could make the entry at any time on the order book, and if he failed to do so the court might direct such entry to be made.

We are of opinion that these decisions are conclusive of the validity of the judgment.

[2] Upon the second assignment of error, there can be no doubt that, as the petition for the enforcement of the judgment was filed within five years from the qualification of the personal representative of W. P. Rawlings, deceased, it was not barred as to the estate of that decedent. It is a joint judgment against J. R. Rawlings and W. P. Rawlings, and, even if barred as to the estate of the former (upon which question we express no opinion), it would not for that reason merely be barred as to the estate of the latter. And that is true, though the relation of principal and surety may have existed between them.

[3, 4] In general, the liability of the surety to the creditor is the same as that of the principal. The responsibility of both is primary; and, at law, the creditor rests under no obligation to look to the principal or to his property, or to exhaust his remedies against him before resorting to the surety. He may collect his debt out of either. Penn v. Ingles, 82 Va. 68; Southall v. Farish, 85

Va. 409, 7 S. E. 534, 1 L. R. A. 641; Alexander v. Byrd, 85 Va. 690, 8 S. E. 577; Piedmont Guano & Mfg. Co. v. Morris, 86 Va. 941, 945, 11 S. E. 883. The surety, it is true, by statute (sections 2890, 2891, Code 1904), may require the creditor to sue, and if he neglects to do so within a reasonable time the surety is absolved from all liability on account of his suretyship; but where judgment has been recovered against principal and surety, no length of time short of the period prescribed by the act of limitations will bar the right of the creditor to enforce his judgment against the surety or his estate. The judgment must be barred as to the surety himself to produce that result. Va. Code 1904, § 3395, provides that: "In an action, founded on contract, against two or more defendants, although the plaintiff may be barred as to one or more of them, yet he may have judgment against any other or others of the defendants against whom he would have been entitled to recover if he had sued them only."

For these reasons, the decree of the circuit court must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

MULLEN v. COOK et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 19, 1911.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 351*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

For a breach of contract to convey land, the vendor acting in good faith, the rule in Virginia and in West Virginia is that the vendee can recover only the amount which he has paid and interest thereon; and, if he has paid nothing, he can recover only nominal damages. But if the vendor has, since sale to vendee, voluntarily put it beyond his power to comply with his contract, or if, having good title, he refuses to convey, he will be held liable in substantial damages; and in such case the measure is the market value of the land at the time of the breach, less the unpaid purchase money, and interest may be allowed on such sum from that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 349*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—ACTION—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF DECLARATION.

A declaration by a vendee, averring a breach of contract to convey land, and alleging substantial and direct, or general, damages, is not demurrable because it states a method of measuring damages which may or may not be applicable on the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by W. C. Mullen against M. J. Cook and another. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Isbell & Perry and Geo. J. McComas, for plaintiff in error. Vinson & Thompson, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, P. W. C. Mullen brought suit in the circuit court of Cabell county against M. J. Cook and C. C. Cook, to recover alleged damages for breach of a contract for the sale of real estate. A demurrer to the declaration was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend, the court dismissed his suit, and he obtained this writ of error.

The price to be paid for the land was $3,600, and the conveyance was to be executed and delivered in 30 days from date of sale. No money was paid, but a 30-day note for $100 was executed, payable on condition of the delivery of deed conveying good title. Plaintiff avers, as the measure of damages, that at the time he should have received his deed the land "was then and there worth, and could have been sold by this plaintiff for the sum of, $4,850." He also avers generally that, by reason of defendants' breach of the contract, he has suffered damages to the amount of $1,200. That sum is the difference between the contract price, and the alleged value of the land at the time of the breach.

[1] What is the correct measure of damages for the breach of contract to convey land? The rule is not uniform. The Supreme Court of the United States and the courts of most of the states have adopted as the rule for measuring the damages in such case the difference between the market value of the land at the time of the breach, with interest, less the purchase price unpaid, without regard to the reason for the failure to convey. 29 A. & E. E. L. 724, 725, and 2 Sutherland on Damages, 579. But that is not the rule in England, nor the rule adopted in Virginia before the formation of this state. In Virginia, a purchaser is not entitled to recover for the loss of his bargain. The value of the land at the date of the sale, and not its value at the time of the breach, is to be considered; and, if a price has been agreed to, then it is to be taken as the best evidence of value. Consequently, in Virginia, if the purchaser has paid nothing, the general rule is that his damages are only nominal. Of course, the purchaser is always entitled to recover the money paid, together with interest. 2 Min. 865; Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. (Va.) 132; Threlkeld's Adm'r v. Fitzhugh's Ex'r, 2 Leigh (Va.) 451; Thompson's Ex'r v. Guthrie's Adm'r, 9 Leigh (Va.) 101, 33 Am. Dec. 225; Stuart v. Pennis, 100 Va. 612, 42 S. E. 667; Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh (Va.) 261.

The above is the general rule in Virginia, and, therefore, the law of this state, because those early Virginia decisions are binding authority on us. This general rule, however, is subject to exceptions. It does not apply, if after the sale the vendor has voluntarily put it out of his power to comply with his contract, as, for instance, by making sale to another, or if he has good title and willfully refuses to convey. In such case he will be held liable for the enhanced value of the land; in other words, he will then be held liable to the vendee for his loss of bargain. Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh (Va.) 261. See, also, opinion of Judge Snyder in Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. at page 454, 53 Am. Rep. 89.

[2] In view of the general rule of law which prevails in Virginia and in this state, the question presented by the writ of error is: Did the court err in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action? We think it did. The declaration alleges the contract, and avers its breach, and claims $1,200 damages. It states a good cause of action. Whether plaintiff can prove a case entitling him to substantial damages depends, not alone upon the mere breach of contract, but also upon proof that the vendor has, since sale to the vendee, voluntarily disabled himself from making conveyance, or that he is able to make good conveyance and willfully refuses to do so. This is a matter of evidence, not of pleading; and hence it cannot be inquired into on demurrer. The fact that plaintiff avers a method or manner of measuring his damages, which may not turn out to be the correct one upon the development of the facts, is not material. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. D. L. I. Co., 144 N. Y. 34, 39 N. E. 7; 1 Joyce on Damages, § 79.

If defendants have acted in good faith, and are unable, from good cause, to comply with their contract, then plaintiff can recover only nominal damages; but if they have voluntarily incapacitated themselves to perform, as by conveying to another since their sale to plaintiff, or if they have good title and willfully refuse to convey to plaintiff, they are liable in substantial damages. "Breach of contract gives a right of action, whether special damages be alleged or not, and therefore, extruding from the declaration all averments of special damages, will not warrant the court in dismissing the action." Kenny v. Collier, 79 Ga. 743, 8 S. E. 58. See, also, Sutton v. Sou. Ry. Co., 101 Ga. 776, 29 S. E. 53; Roberts v. Glass, 112 Ga. 456, 37 S. E. 704; Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. D. L. I. Co., 144 N. Y. 34, 39 N. E. 7.

The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration, and we will reverse the judgment of the circuit court, and will enter a judgment here overruling the demurrer and reinstating and remanding the cause, with leave to defendants to plead, and for further proceedings according to law.

HEARN et al. v. McDONALD.

May 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

DAMAGES (§ 111*)—DESTRUCTION OF ROOF.

In an action for destruction of a roof of a house, the measure of damages is the value of the roof; that is, what it would cost to replace it new, less an allowance for depreciation from use, age, or like cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 274-278; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by L. L. Hearn and others against D. J. McDonald. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Woods & Martin and Ritz & Ritz, for appellant. Hale & Pendleton, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Hearn and Massie owned two houses, and McDonald was a contractor, building a section of the Virginian or Deep-water Railroad. The line of the road was on a hillside above the houses, and in blasting rock some of the rock were cast upon the metal roofs of these houses, and did great damage to them, and Hearn and Massie brought suit against McDonald, and recovered the sum of $110.25, $5.25 of it being interest, and McDonald has appealed to this court.

The only point involved in the case is this: The plaintiffs gave evidence showing what a new roof for the houses would cost, and gave no evidence to show what amount should be allowed for wear and tear of the roofs during the three or four years of their life, and claimed that a recovery of the cost of new roofs, without abatement for use and wear, is erroneous. The argument is that the recovery could be only for the value of the roofs at the time of their destruction; that it should have been shown what was the depreciation from the cost of new roofs owing to wear and tear; that from the cost of new roofs there should have been proven a specific sum for such wear and tear, and that deducted from the cost of new roofs; and on this basis the claim is there was no measure of damages fixed.

We do not deny the legal proposition that, where a building is destroyed, the value is to be ascertained by taking into account the original cost and the cost of replacing it, and making an allowance for depreciation from use, age, and other like causes as the condition in which it was required. Sutherland on Damages, 2967; Wall v. Platt, 169 Mass. 398, 48 N. E. 270. But upon the evidence in this case we find that the roofs were as good as new, practically, that they had been on but a short time, and had been well preserved by being kept painted, and were practically as good as new. Under the evidence such deduction would be small or nominal. It seems a small matter upon which to reverse a decree and protract litigation. Nothing else is involved.

Therefore we affirm the decree, as substantial justice has been done.

McDONALD COLLIERY CO. v. CROTTY.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 51*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT.

A defendant cannot acquire a right of appeal by filing a counterclaim which is manifestly specious and not provable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 145*)—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

The amount in controversy before a justice of the peace cannot be increased by a fictitious counterclaim, so as to entitle the defendant to an appeal, or to a writ of error in case an appeal is denied him by the justice and the circuit court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 479-489; Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

3. RIGHT TO APPEAL FROM JUSTICE.

Quere: Does a defendant in a case before a justice of the peace acquire the right to appeal by filing even a bona fide counterclaim of appellate amount, if he offers no evidence on the trial before the justice in support thereof?

Brannon, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Action by the McDonald Colliery Company against G. E. Crotty. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Dismissed.

M. Van Pelt, for plaintiff in error. Dillon & Nuckolls, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. Plaintiff and defendant had some controversy as to the possession of a mule and plaintiff obtained possession of the animal from defendant by paying him twelve dollars. Thereafter, plaintiff, before a justice of the peace, sued defendant for the sum so paid. Defendant filed an answer to the suit, which is indefinite and uncertain as to the basis of the counterclaims which it undertakes to interpose. It demands one hundred dollars for the mule and twenty dollars for curing the mule's sore shoulder. By this answer, the defendant in effect says to the plaintiff: "I did let you have the mule for twelve dollars, but since you sue me for the return of that amount, I charge you one hundred dollars for the mule and also twenty dollars for doctoring the mule while it was yet mine." The record does not disclose on what ground plaintiff sought judgment for the twelve dollars.

At the trial before the justice, defendant offered not a word of evidence to support his alleged counterclaims. Plaintiff recovered judgment for the twelve dollars, and defendant filed bond for an appeal. The justice refused an appeal; and, upon petition to the circuit court in the premises, that court also denied defendant an appeal. To this action of the circuit court, defendant obtained a writ of error.

[1] Defendant says that as to him the case involves an amount within the right to appeal from the judgment of the justice and also within the right to prosecute the writ of error. If his counterclaims could be considered bona fide, he might have the right to appeal from the judgment of the justice, or to prosecute the writ of error to correct the action of the circuit court in denying him an appeal. But the case is too pregnant with the fact that his counterclaims are merely filed to raise the jurisdictional amount so that he can further contest the real amount at issue, that is, the sum of twelve dollars. By the counterclaim route, defendant proposes to avoid the statute which prescribes that a controversy about the sum of twelve dollars can go no further than a justice of the peace. It would not be consistent with the foundation and dignity of this court to assist him in the procedure which he has undertaken.

The answer setting up the alleged counterclaims shows that, when defendant allowed plaintiff to take possession of the mule from him, he considered that it was only of the value of twelve dollars to him. That negotiation is clear proof of the mule's value to defendant. We are not told in the record what rights defendant then claimed as to the animal, nor what rights plaintiff claimed as to it. The answer alleging the counterclaim does not directly aver that defendant ever owned the mule. His charge for curing its shoulder would indicate that it belonged to plaintiff when he had it in his possession. At any rate, we do not understand how defendant can be in good faith in charging one hundred dollars for that which he admits in his answer he agreed to deliver for twelve dollars; nor how he can consistently charge twenty dollars for curing the mule's sore shoulder if the mule belonged to him so that he could demand one hundred dollars or even twelve dollars for it. The two items of counterclaim are totally inconsistent, the one to the other. And again, twenty dollars seems an outrageous price for curing the sore shoulder of a twelve dollar mule. The latter price was all defendant demanded and received for the mule before this suit began.

All too plainly does it appear from the very nature of the alleged counterclaims that they are merely specious, and that they are filed only for the purpose of procuring the jurisdiction which defendant seeks in the circuit court. Another indication of the specious character of the counterclaims is that defendant offered no evidence to support them at the trial before the justice. If he was in good faith as to them, it is strange that he did not use them to defeat the action against him before the justice and to secure a judgment in his favor there. If the counterclaims are bona fide and provable, he could thus have avoided the demand for the appeal which he is seeking. Shall he be entitled to an appeal when he might have avoided the necessity for it by proving before the justice that which he desires to prove on appeal? Shall we thus allow him to deny the justice's jurisdiction to pass on his claims, notwithstanding the statute plainly contemplates that they shall be adjudicated there? His sole aim seems to be to get around the jurisdiction of the justice. Shall we uphold defendant in totally ousting the justice of jurisdiction for the adjudication of these counterclaims, and give him the right to have them adjudicated on appeal in the circuit court? And, by so upholding him, shall we permit him to go to the circuit court where again he may offer no substantial proof of the counterclaims, thinking only, as it certainly appears he does, there to reverse the finding of the twelve dollars against him?

[2] Indeed it may be questioned seriously whether defendant could demand any appeal on his counterclaims, even if they appeared ever so bona fide, since he offered no proof in support of them before the justice. But since the counterclaims from their very relation to the case bear evidence of sham, and indicate that they were filed solely for the purpose of demanding an appeal, we need not carry this phase of the case to a decision. Can a defendant appeal on even a bona fide counterclaim of appellate amount, which he has not put in controversy on the trial before the justice by introducing evidence in support of it? The following citations may assist in answering the question. Code 1906, c. 50, §§ 55, 163; Dickey v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 806, 26 S. E. 373; 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 735; Kurtz v. Hoffman, 65 Iowa, 260, 21 N. W. 597.

That the amount in controversy cannot be increased fictitiously for the purpose of conferring the right to appeal is without question. Yet it is palpably evident that defendant undertook to violate this principle in the case at hand. "A defendant cannot acquire the right of appeal by filing a set-off manifestly specious and unprovable." 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 712. To know that defendant's claims are fictitious, specious, and not provable we have only to observe the inconsistency of defendant in claiming one hundred dollars for that which he admits he delivered for twelve dollars; or in now claiming twenty dollars for doctoring the mule, an item he had not invented when he gave over the mule for twelve dollars. We have only to observe the record as a whole to know beyond doubt that the only purpose of the counterclaims was to litigate a twelve dollar suit in courts other than that of the justice of the peace. Defendant has filed no brief before us. Has he realized how glaringly appears the real purpose of his use of these alleged counterclaims?

We may appropriately say of defendant's counterclaims what the Virginia court said as to an action to recover rent, which was met by a counterclaim for rents previously paid under the lease: "The claim thus to set off the plaintiff's demand is not only a mere colorable claim, but is obviously nothing other than a specious pretense of a claim that has no foundation either in law or conscience. To permit a party to acquire jurisdiction in this court under such circumstances would open wide the door to fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court, and would largely tend to abrogate the constitutional provision limiting the minimum jurisdictional amount of this court." Manchester Paper Mills Co. v. Heth, 1 Va. Dec. 776, 18 S. E. 189.

The writ of error will be dismissed as improvidently awarded.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). I dissent. I deem the matter of sufficient importance to make a short note. The decision virtually denies the right of a defendant filing in an action in a justice's court offsets to choose between a trial in that court and the circuit court. Appeal from a justice's judgment is a matter of right. No cause need be shown, and in the circuit court there is a new trial, without regard to the trial before the justice. That trial has nothing to do with the trial on the appeal. The defendant may prefer a trial before a competent judge. Or he may have forgotten to attend before the justice, or even neglected the trial, or have failed for other cause. He can appeal of right within the limit for appeal. You cannot say his offset is fictitious. That is a matter to be tested by the evidence on appeal. This is a question of fact for the jury. The character of the claim, whether well founded or fictitious or genuine, must be decided on the trial by the jury. That is a question of fact on which the suitor has a right to appeal to a jury, and I cannot see how the court can put its stamp of condemnation on it in advance of the evidence before a jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by C. H. Scott and others against L. H. Keenan and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. Blue & Dayton and Jared L. Wamsley, for appellees.

MILLER, J. The object of the bill, or, as it styles itself, the petition, is to enjoin defendant L. H. Keenan from further proceedings in the cause of said Keenan against Scott and Cobb, and others, pending in the same court, as required by the decree and mandate of this Court pronounced in said cause, on appeal, 64 W. Va. 137, 61 S. E. 806, until the petition of Elizabeth Keenan, filed therein, subsequently, shall be finally matured and heard, and until her rights, as against said L. H. Keenan, the present plaintiffs, and others, parties thereto, set up therein, be finally determined and adjudicated.

We find nothing alleged in the present bill, or petition, justifying the relief prayed for. The petition of Mrs. Keenan was filed in the cause, proceedings in which are sought to be enjoined. She alleges ownership of the land by virtue of a deed from her husband, executed and delivered, pendente lite, a few days before the decision of this court on the appeal. She does aver in her petition, the equitable ownership of the land, with notice thereof to defendants, prior to said deed, and that said Scott and Cobb, then holding the legal title, had no authority, without her consent, to sell the land to the Davis Colliery Company, nevertheless, the prayer of her petition is, that she be substituted as the true plaintiff in said suit, in place of her husband, L. H. Keenan, and that said land, or the value thereof may be decreed to her, subject to the just and equitable charges against the same.

Notwithstanding the scope of her petition may be broader it is hardly likely the petitioner will be able to show herself entitled to greater relief than that granted her husband, L. H. Keenan, under whom she holds by deed, and in whose room and stead she seeks to be substituted as plaintiff. Keenan in his answer avers and charges that his deed to his wife can not in any event amount to more than an equitable assignment to her of whatever amount he may be entitled to recover from Scott and Cobb in said cause.

[1, 2] But whatever the rights of petitioner may be, her petition is pending in the cause which is sought to be enjoined, not as an independent suit. The Court has the jurisdiction of the whole case of the subject matter and of the parties, and is competent on proper pleading filed, or proper motions addressed to the court in the cause, to protect and adjudicate the rights of all parties; and if error be committed therein, to the prejudice of any litigant, that error is correctible here on appeal from a final decree, or decree adjudicating the principles of the cause. Certainly no independent suit is proper or necessary.

We do not see that the cases collated in 11 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 712, and to which we are referred, have any application to the question presented here. If we should treat the petition of Mrs. Keenan as an independent suit, pending in the same court, and the present suit as a motion for a stay of proceedings, under section 6, chapter 136, Code 1906, and the decree appealed from as an order denying the motion, that order would not be the subject of appeal to this Court, except upon a final decree entered in the cause, or one adjudicating the principles of the cause, made upon the pleadings, and proofs therein. Stay of such proceedings under said statute, as was decided by this Court in Dunfee v. Childs, 59 W. Va. 225, 53 S. E. 209, rests in the sound discretion of the court, and to warrant such stay it must be essential to justice, and it must be that the judgment or decree, by another court, or the same court, in another cause, will have legal operation and effect in the suit in which the stay is asked, and settle the matter of controversy in it. But we have here no such independent suits to deal with, and that case has no real application.

For these reasons we think the decree below should be and it will be affirmed.

MAXWELL v. MAXWELL

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 16, 1911.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 27*)—"CRUEL AND INHUMAN TREATMENT."

In a suit for divorce from bed and board, based on alleged cruel and inhuman treatment, the true issue and test is whether under all the facts proven, plaintiff can with safety to person and health continue to live with defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-83; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1768-1777; vol. 8, p. 7624.]

2. DIVORCE (§ 27*)—GROUNDS—DRUNKENNESS NOT HABITUAL.

Drunkenness, not habitual, though not ground for divorce, is no excuse for cruelty. Cruelty, resulting from drunkenness, is cause for divorce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-83; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 27*)—CRUEL AND INHUMAN TREATMENT.

It is not cruel and inhuman treatment, justifying divorce, for a husband residing with a second wife and his children by a former wife, to separate her from them, and to provide for himself and her elsewhere, if that be necessary for the protection of the children against the wife's abuse, or evil influences, and for the peace and happiness of all concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-83; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

4. EQUITY (§ 65*)—CLEAN HANDS—DIVORCE.

The rule that one who comes into a court of equity must come with clean hands is applicable to divorce proceedings. Courts of equity are not open to give relief to husband or wife if the complaining party be responsible in a substantial degree for the wrongs and injuries complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 185-187; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. DIVORCE (§ 27*)—CRUEL AND INHUMAN TREATMENT—FALSE ARREST.

False arrest, without more, is not ground for divorce from bed and board, as cruel and inhuman treatment; cruelty being measured by the results upon complainant, and not by the law of damages for malicious prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-83; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Suit by Emma W. Maxwell against A. O. Maxwell. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 67 W. Va. 119, 67 S. E. 379, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 712.

T. S. Riley and A. L. Sawtell, for appellant. John J. Coniff and Henry M. Russell, for appellee.

MILLER, J. As ground for a divorce from bed and board plaintiff charges defendant, her husband, with desertion, and with cruel and inhuman treatment; but here, as in the court below, she relies on cruel and inhuman treatment.

Plaintiff is the second wife of defendant, and he is her second husband. From her first husband she obtained a divorce, and was married to defendant in 1899. He took her to his home in Wheeling, where he had been living, with his five children by his first wife, all infants. Disagreements soon began, involving the two oldest daughters, resulting finally, in 1904, in defendant's turning over to his daughters the ostensible control of the house, he and his wife remaining as boarders. The understanding between him and the daughters, of which plaintiff was informed, was that she was to be confined to the use of her bed room, the bath room, the dining room for meals, and the hall way for going in and out, and was not to go into any other part of the house, parlor not excepted, or to interfere in any way with the daughters in their control of the house. Disregard of this arrangement by plaintiff, on several occasions, resulted in quarrels between herself and husband, and his daughters, the husband always taking the side of his children against her. The breach became so wide that he did not always occupy the same room with her, but lodged in other rooms of the house. In 1904, defendant notified his wife that they were going to leave; she went out to be gone a short time, and not returning quite as soon as she had expected, she found herself barred out of the house by the daughters. They notified her, they say, she denies it, that she would find defendant, at a certain hotel. She says she went to her mother's home for shelter. There she received a special delivery letter from defendant, informing her that he had "secured quarters at the Park Hotel, Water Street, this City, for our accommodation, where you can come."

Plaintiff refused to go to the hotel, but remained with her mother, and soon afterwards sued for divorce. This suit remained pending until about February, 1905, when, after some understanding, it was dismissed, and defendant arranged with plaintiff to resume their marital relations, and to take up their abode with plaintiff's mother, and he arranged with the latter for room and board for himself and wife, making his wife a small allowance of ten dollars per month for personal expenses.

The specific acts of cruelty charged are, gross intoxication, before and after the separation in 1904, rendering life unpleasant, almost unbearable; abuse and mistreatment of her, and encouraging his children to abuse and mistreat her, before that separation, instancing the depriving her of the control and management of the home, and giving it over to the daughters, and confining her to her room, bath, dining room, and hall, as already noted, resulting finally in the proposition to leave, and to turn her out entirely, and the divorce proceedings of 1904; false accusations of unfaithfulness, criminal abortion, before and after the separation of 1904, of being a prostitute, and of improper relations with other men, calling her vile names, as liar, bitch, dirty whelp, degenerate, hell-cat, and other names of like character; false arrest and imprisonment on a false charge of threatening him with great bodily harm, and causing her to be taken before a justice, and there failing to appear against her; choking her, and threatening to shoot her and otherwise abusing and mistreating her, rendering life unbearable, and refusal to provide her with the necessities of life and proper medical treatment in sickness; and on one occasion, after 1905, locking her out of the house in the night time.

The answer of defendant denies all material averments of the bill on which divorce, as prayed for, could be predicated. It makes counter charges, of wrongs and injuries inflicted by plaintiff on defendant, in accusing him to his children of crimes and misdemeanors, in threatening to shoot him, and to do him other acts of violence, and in the use of vile epithets against him. Other acts unbecoming a wife are charged, and other facts are alleged, justifying defendant's suspicions, not accusations, of improper relations by her with another man, and criminal self abuses, by all which plaintiff is alleged to have brought on herself and on defendant all their domestic troubles, of which she complains against him.

[1] Cruel and inhuman treatment, such as calls for divorce from bed and board, is defined by this Court in Goff v. Goff, 60 W. Va. 9, 53 S. E. 769, following authorities cited, as follows: "Such conduct and acts by a husband toward his wife, such treatment of her by him, as produces reasonable apprehension in her of personal violence, or produces mental anguish, distress and sorrow, and renders co-habitation miserable, impairing, or likely to impair, the wife's health or mind, is cruel and inhuman treatment authorizing a divorce from bed and board under the Code of 1899, chapter 64, section 6, though there be no personal violence."

[2] We have carefully examined all the evidence, and with special reference to the specific charges and counter charges of the parties in pleadings and evidence. First, with respect to abuse, as a result of excessive drunkenness. Drunkenness, not habitual, section 6, chapter 64, Code 1906, though not a ground of divorce, is no excuse for cruelty. Cruelty resulting from drunkenness is a cause for divorce. 1 Nelson on Divorce and Separation, section 322. Defendant admits occasional drinking, and sometimes slight intoxication, but denies cruel treatment of his wife. He accuses her, and she does not deny it, that she frequently drank with him. He testifies that she often urged him to drink liquor when he did not want it, and to supply it for her use and his.

The abuse of plaintiff by defendant, or his children, or his encouraging that abuse, as alleged, is denied by him and by them. We do not think the evidence supports these charges. It is true the management of the house was apparently turned over to the daughters, but defendant and the daughters prove accusations by plaintiff of wrong doings by the father; the use of vile and abusive language and epithets; threats that when they should reach their majority the children would be required to leave the home; loud and boisterous talking over the telephone; indecent and obscene language in the presence of the children, thereby rendering conditions in the home unbearable, and necessitating a separation of the family, the wife from the children, and providing for her elsewhere.

[3] The evidence does not entirely satisfy us that defendant was justified in turning over the management of the household to the daughters, and afterwards in entirely excluding plaintiff, first from certain portions of the house, and afterwards entirely from the home, and proposing to provide for her at an undesirable hotel, resulting in the divorce proceedings of 1904. It has been suggested that whatever be the truth about these transactions, they were condoned by plaintiff by her subsequent resumption of marital relations with defendant. Such, however, is not the law. 1 Minor Inst. 282. We are unable to say, however, from all the evidence that the court erred in denying the divorce. It must be conceded that defendant had the duty imposed upon him of providing for his children as well as his wife. If his evidence and that of his daughters is to be taken for true, an intolerable condition existed in the household justifying him perhaps in separating his wife from his children and providing for her elsewhere. If, however, this evidence be false, defendant's treatment of his wife in depriving her of his home, either in part, in the first instance, or finally putting her out, was cruel and inhuman. True it is the right of the husband, given by law, to manage the household, and protect his children. This justified him, if there was good cause, in separating her from them, and providing for her elsewhere. Such authority we think may be found in the general rules and principles relating to the subject, laid down in 1 Nelson on Divorce and Separation, sections 294, 296, and 299. These sections hold that the restraint by the husband over his wife and children, and in the management of his household, even to the extent of such separation, if that be necessary, will not amount to cruel and inhuman treatment, justifying divorce.

Defendant specifically denies in his answer and testimony, that he accused plaintiff of unfaithfulness to her marriage vows, or of criminal abortion, and prostitution, the evidence of plaintiff contradicting that of defendant. Defendant does not deny that he suspected his wife, and that he reprimanded her for conduct which he regarded unbecoming to a wife, particularly, in connection with the witness Beardmore. But he denies that he ever accused her of criminality. The evidence satisfies us that defendant was not without grounds of suspicion. He testifies, and she denies, that shortly before a miscarriage in 1905, she requested him to employ a doctor to produce an abortion, which he refused to do. It is an admitted fact, however, that a day or two afterwards, on going home, defendant found his wife in a critical condition, attended by a doctor, and that a miscarriage, due to natural or artificial causes, had taken place. A miscarriage under like circumstances had taken place in 1904, before the separation of that year. If a husband accuse his wife falsely of such crimes such accusations would be cause for divorce, provided, as in the case of other false accusations of crime, they be made under such circumstances, as to bring the wife into disrepute, affecting her reputation for chastity, and inflict upon her grievous mental suffering, impairing or likely to impair her health or mind, and rendering co-habitation miserable and unbearable. Goff v. Goff, supra. The test is the mental suffering of the wife, impairing the health, and threatening her life. 1 Nelson on Divorce and Separation, sections 274, 284.

[4] It is admitted by defendant that he accused his wife of lying, and of being a hell-cat; and in his evidence in this case he refers to her as the "degenerate daughter of an honored sire." He denies, however, the use of the other epithets, of which he is accused. But, as is the case when a wife is accused of adultery, prostitution and the like, whether such accusations will amount to cruel and inhuman treatment depends upon the effect produced or likely to be produced upon the mind, or health of the accused. If no such evil results follow, or are likely to follow, they will not amount to cruel and inhuman treatment, giving cause for divorce. See authorities cited in the preceding paragraph. And if the fact be, as the evidence in this case tends to show, that the plaintiff was herself guilty of crimination and recrimination, and of the like use of abusive language and epithets against defendant, and was guilty of conduct unbecoming her as a consort, and thus brought upon herself the troubles of which she complains, a court of equity should deny her relief. One who comes into a court of equity for divorce, must, as in all other cases, come with clean hands, and substantially without fault. Courts of equity are not open to give relief to husband and wife if responsible in a substantial degree for the wrongs and injuries of which they complain. This doctrine is fully covered by the opinion of this court in the recent case of Hall v. Hall, 71 S. E. 103, decided at the present term, and not yet officially reported. And the same principles were applied in Bacon v. Bacon, 70 S. E. 762.

[5] The charge of false arrest, though the evidence tends to support it, without more, is not a good ground for divorce from bed and board. Defendant accused plaintiff before a justice of threatening his life, and did not appear against her, giving as a reason the advice of his counsel, that without evidence to corroborate his own he could not succeed. The rule respecting malicious prosecutions seems to be, as in other cases of false accusation, that the fact that the accused has been acquitted, or that the charge was groundless, does not establish cruelty, for cruelty is measured by the results upon the complainant, and is not determined by the law of damages for malicious prosecutions. 1 Nelson on Divorce and Separation, section 280. The test here as in other cases is, not the fact of false accusation, but the effect thereof on the health or mind of the accused.

The charges of choking, threatening to shoot, refusal to provide necessities of life, and to provide proper medical treatment, and defendant's alleged lock out of plaintiff, all substantially depend on plaintiff's unsupported testimony, except as to one instance, where defendant is accused of having raised his hand as to strike his wife. This was just before the present suit, in the presence of one Beardmore, a fellow boarder at her mother's house. The testimony of Beardmore is relied on by plaintiff in support of her evidence. The evidence, with corroborating circumstances, satisfies us, however, that this demonstration, if any, was directed, not against plaintiff, but against Beardmore, who admits he thrust himself between plaintiff and defendant, when the latter late at night was endeavoring to induce his wife to return to her room. Defendant's denial of personal violence, or threats of personal violence, prior to the separation of 1904, is supported by the evidence of his daughters; and he is supported in his denials of similar acts, while living with plaintiff's mother, by the mother herself. She testifies, that so far as her observations went, defendant's treatment of his wife was always gentle and kind, and that she never saw defendant abuse his wife. She was present when defendant is accused of having raised his hand as if in the act of striking his wife. The charge of failure to provide, as a ground for divorce, for cruel and inhuman treatment, is unsupported by the evidence. The provision for the support of the plaintiff the last two years before the institution of the suit, while in some respect it may appear to have been meagre, particularly the monthly allowance to the plaintiff for personal expenses, yet it seems to have been fairly satisfactory to her. There is some evidence that defendant neglected his wife to a certain extent when she was ill and suffering from her last miscarriage; but after some reluctance he paid the doctor's bill. Such neglect, to be ground for divorce for cruel and inhuman treatment, must cause or be likely to cause injury to health, or to produce great mental suffering. 1 Nelson on Divorce and Separation, section 374. There is nothing in the evidence justifying such conclusion in this case.

We conclude as the court below concluded that a case for divorce on the grounds of cruel and inhuman treatment, or upon any ground, has not been made out, by proof, and that the decree below should be affirmed.

MILLS v. EDGELL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EJECTMENT (§ 86)—BURDEN OF PROOF—IDENTITY OF LAND.

A plaintiff in ejectment, claiming title under a deed which excepts certain parcels of land out of the tract therein described, and seeking recovery of only a small part of such boundary, must identify the land in controversy as his by proving it to be within the lines of the tract granted, subject to exceptions, and outside of the excepted parcels.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 238-245; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

2. EJECTMENT (§ 86*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—IDENTITY OF LAND.

Demand of the land in two counts, one covering the entire boundary and the other limited to the land actually withheld, does not alter the rule of practice here stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 238-245; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 139*)—DESCRIPTION—EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

An exception of "some small tracts quit-claimed in settlement and exchange of lands" by the grantor is sufficiently definite and certain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 453, 459; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)4. DEEDS (§ 95)—CONSTRUCTION—USE OF WORDS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Parties to a deed are presumed to have used the words therein in the sense in which they are generally understood.

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Action by John Mills against James A. Edgell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Thomas P. Jacobs and Hall & Hall, for plaintiff in error. E. L. Robinson and Glenn Snodgrass, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. Withdrawal of this case from the consideration of the jury by a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant constitutes the basis of all the errors assigned. It is an action of ejectment for the recovery of 35 acres of land, lying within the boundaries of a 9,000-acre grant, according to the claims of the plaintiff, but wholly or partially outside thereof, under the defendant's interpretation of the evidence. Though the evidence set forth in some hundreds of pages of the printed record, pertains to locations, boundary lines and possession, these are by no means the only questions involved. On the contrary, failure of the plaintiff to adduce any evidence of the location of exceptions from his title papers may render all this great mass of testimony utterly valueless to both parties.

In his declaration the plaintiff demands the whole of the Isaac Hilliard 9,000-acre survey, granted to Hilliard July 17, 1797, and then a portion thereof, 35 acres, described as the land actually withheld. The defendant entered a disclaimer as to all the land except the 35 acres and apparently as to a small portion of it. The Hilliard grant came down to the plaintiff by a long chain of conveyances, but certain deeds excepted portions thereof. One made by William H. Johnson and wife to Thomas W. Ewart, September 14, 1869, excepted 684 acres out of the southwest corner of the grant, and also 800 acres, granted, according to the recital in the exception, to Sterling Johnson, and "to be surveyed and set off to said Sterling in a square form on one of the outside lines" of the Hilliard grant. By a deed dated March 28, 1878, Ewart conveyed to McEldowney the land he acquired from Johnson and also the excepted 800 acres, reciting a purchase thereof from Sterling Johnson. As the land in controversy here lies in the eastern portion of the Hilliard grant, if in it at all, the 684-acre exception, lying in the southwestern corner of that grant does not cover it, and, as Ewart acquired the 800-acre exception and included it in his deed to McEldowney, trustee, and necessity for locating it was thus dispensed with, the plaintiff was obviously under no duty to locate either of these. But there were other exceptions, apparently out of the re-acquired 800 acres, but certainly not of some portion of the 9,000-acre grant, as shown by the following clause of the Ewart deed: "Also the eight hundred acre tract excepted in said deed as the property of Sterling Johnson since purchased in the name of T. W. Ewart, John Mills and Jared Maris in the suit of Wm. H. Johnson against Sterling Johnson, sale confirmed and George E. Boyd Commissioner ordered to make a deed therefor in Law Order Book No. 4 at page 162 in Clerk's office of Wetzel County, excepting some small tracts quitclaimed in settlement and exchange of lands, but including all tracts deeded to me in exchange specially by Alexander Lantz (Lantz) by his deeds to me recorded at pages 184 & 396 of Deed Book No. 7, Wetzel county." This deed conveyed the land to McEldowney, subject to these exceptions, in trust to indemnify sureties. Having sold an undivided one-sixth thereof to John Mills and others under the deed of trust, McEldowney, as trustee, conveyed said portion to them, by his deed, dated Nov. 3, 1882, making the same exception Ewart had made in his deed. John Mills, the plaintiff, claims under these deeds.

The defendant is in possession of the 35 acres, claiming title thereto. It is a portion of an 85-acre tract, surveyed and entered, by Thomas Tucker, under a land office treasury warrant, issued May 10, 1848. Tucker sold his right under this survey to Silas Wiatt, giving him a memorandum of the sale. Wiatt assigned this to James Edgell, who conveyed a portion of the land to Abram Ice.

By a deed, dated January 5, 1894, he conveyed the residue thereof, the 35 acres in controversy, together with two other tracts, making an aggregate of 92.25 acres, to his son, James A. Edgell, the defendant in this action. As the 35-acre tract had never been entered upon the land books for taxation, it was sold, in the manner prescribed by law, as forfeited land, in the year 1889, and purchased by said James A. Edgell.

[1, 3, 4] If this land is not within the Hilliard patent, or, if within it, and also within an exception from the Ewart deed, the plaintiff cannot recover, for the defendant is in possession under a perfect title, in the case first supposed, and under a bona fide claim and color of title in the other. He is not an intruder, wherefore his possession alone avails him as against persons unable to show good title, or failing to do so. Hence a vital inquiry is whether the plaintiff was bound to prove the land in controversy was within the 9,000-acre survey and also outside of the exceptions from the Ewart deed, agreeably to the general rule as to the burden of proof. Acquiescing in the rule, declared in Stockton v. Morris, 39 W. Va. 432, 19 S. E. 531, Patrick v. Dryden, 10 W. Va. 387, and later cases, the plaintiff in error denies its application upon the theory of invalidity of the exceptions for indefiniteness and uncertainty of the terms used for creation thereof. They are described as "some small tracts quitclaimed in settlement and exchange of lands." Other terms used in immediate connection with this descriptive matter clearly indicate that they were "quitclaimed" by Ewart, the grantor. By them he granted all tracts deeded to him "in exchange." Obviously this means the excepted lands had been quitclaimed by him in exchange of other lands conveyed to him. Nor do we doubt that the term "small tracts quitclaimed" means lands previously conveyed by quitclaim deeds. Such deeds are well known in conveyancing, and the parties are presumed to have used the words in a deed or contract in the sense in which they are generally understood. If the clause in question had excepted lands "deeded" or "conveyed," there could be no doubt as to the meaning of the word. What we have here differs from the supposed case only in the use of a word importing previous conveyances by a particular kind of deed. This conclusion accords with the interpretation of the word "quitclaim" in Brame v. Towne, 56 Minn. 126, 57 N. W. 454. So construed, this clause furnishes means of identification of the excepted lands. They are lands conveyed by Thomas W. Ewart, out of the land generally described in the deed, to persons not named, and in exchange for other lands, some of which were so conveyed to Ewart by Alexander Lantz by certain deeds, recorded in a certain deed book at pages given by number. In Low v. Settle, 32 W. Va. 600, 9 S. E. 922, an exception, giving the quantity of land and the name of the vendee, was upheld. The name of the grantor constitutes an equally good index. The conclusion, here stated, is amply sustained by the following authorities: McCormick v. Monroe, 46 N. C. 13; Justice v. Eddings, 75 N. C. 581; Midgett v. Wharton, 102 N. C. 14, 8 S. E. 778; King v. Wells, 94 N. C. 344; Brown v. Rickard, 107 N. C. 639, 12 S. E. 570; Rockefeller v. Arlington, 91 Ill. 375; Johnson v. Lumber Co., 47 Wis. 328, 2 N. W. 552; Getchell v. Whittemore, 72 Me. 393. That the excepted land need not be described by metes and bounds or by name in the excepting clause of the deed is conclusively established by the decisions just cited and also by others. See Stockton v. Morris, 39 W. Va. 432, 19 S. E. 531, in which Judge Brannon said: "But there is reserved a quantity of nine hundred and eighty-five acres besides other claims specifically mentioned, and it may be in the bank's five thousand-acre entry," and also Patrick v. Dryden, 10 W. Va. 387, in which a similar exception was sustained. Some of the authorities here cited sustain exceptions which do not state the quantity of the land. Nor is it necessary that the excepting clause refer to records or documents for identification, as matter of description, as many of them will show. In Johnson v. Lumber Co., 47 Wis. 328, 2 N. W. 552, it was held that production of a recorded mortgage, for one made descriptive of excepted land, and found to be contradictory of other descriptive terms used, was not proof of the nonexistence of an unrecorded mortgage, accordant with the description in the deed. No particular form is essential to an exception. Plain expression of intent to except and descriptive matter by which the subject of the exception can be identified always suffice. These authorities compel us to say the exceptions are not void for uncertainty.

Impossibility of locating the excepted land is the burden of complaint against the application of the rule of practice above mentioned. This has not been shown. The record discloses no evidence of any effort to locate them. For aught that appears, the deeds may be recorded and cover the land in controversy. No witness testifies to any unsuccessful effort of any kind to locate them. Whether proof of inability to do so would vary the rule of practice we are not called upon to say, since the record discloses none.

[2] The form of the declaration, relied upon as dispensing with the application of the rule, pertains to the issue, not the proof. The count, particularly demanding the 35 acres, with the plea of not guilty, clearly, and sharply defines the issue for the purposes of trial and verdict, and was approved as good pleading in Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214. The question we have here is one of practice, pertaining to trial and evidence, not pleading.

This conclusion necessarily and admittedly justifies the giving of the peremptory instruction, affirms the judgment and renders consideration of the additional assignments of error useless.

HANNIS DISTILLING CO. v. BERKELEY COUNTY COURT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 16, 1911.)

1. TAXATION (§ 88*)—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY IN CUSTODY—EVIDENCE—ISSUANCE OF CERTIFICATE.

A warehouseman overthrows the presumption of his ownership of property in his custody by proving the issuance of certificates therefor to other persons by which he has bound himself to deliver the possession thereof to the holder on the surrender of the certificate and payment of storage and other charges on the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 178, 179; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 83*)—LISTING OF PROPERTY FOR OWNERSHIP—WAREHOUSEMAN—TAXATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—"TRUSTEE."

Under section 55 of chapter 85 of the Acts of 1905 (section 739, Code 1906), it was the duty of every agent, having the custody of personal property, to list the same for taxation in the name of the owner. A warehouseman is a trustee within the meaning of clause "d" of said section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 172, 173; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7128-7133, 7822.]

3. TAXATION (§ 83*)—LISTING OF PROPERTY FOR TAXATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Such a custodian of property is not personally chargeable therewith for the purposes of taxation, if he lists it for that purpose in the name of the owner, on the request of the assessor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 172, 173; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 86*)—LISTING FOR TAXATION—REFUSAL OF WAREHOUSEMAN TO LIST PROPERTY BELONGING TO ANOTHER—POWER OF ASSESSOR.

On the refusal of a warehouseman to list the property under his control and to disclose the name of the owner thereof, the assessor may properly assess it in the name of the custodian.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 461*)—LISTING OF PROPERTY FOR TAXATION—PENALTY FOR FAILURE TO LIST.

An agent or other person, charged, for the purposes of taxation, with personal property of another in his possession, on his refusal to list the same, as required by chapter 85 of the Acts of 1905 (Code 1906, §§ 672-821), is not entitled to relief from such assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. TAXATION (§ 493*)—VALUATION FOR TAXATION—RIGHT TO REVIEW.

In controversies involving only questions of valuation of admittedly taxable property, the right of review stops in the circuit court, but, as to controversies involving taxability of property or taxation thereof in the name of a particular person, supposedly made by the statute, the right of review extends to the Supreme Court of Appeals.

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County.

Action by the Hannis Distilling Company against the County Court of Berkeley County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Faulkner, Walker & Woods, for plaintiff in error. H. B. Glukeson and A. B. Noll, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. On this writ of error, involving an assessment of taxes against the plaintiff in error for the year 1907, our jurisdiction in cases of this class is questioned, and, after that, the correctness of the judgment of the circuit court.

The nature of the controversy is the same as that involved in Hannis Distilling Co. v. County Court, reported in 62 W. Va. 442, 59 S. E. 1051, which was an assessment of the same company for the year 1905. Taxed with several thousand barrels of whisky found in its bonded warehouse, and claiming not to be the owner thereof, the plaintiff in error tested the assessment unsuccessfully in the county court, appealed from its order to the circuit court, and obtained a writ of error from this court to the judgment of the circuit court. The appellate jurisdiction of this court was not then denied. Here the objection of want of such jurisdiction is interposed.

[8] A distinction between controversies involving only questions of valuation of admittedly taxable property and controversies involving the taxability of property or taxation thereof in the name of a particular person supposedly made by the statute has been often adverted, and it has been generally conceded that the right of review stops in the circuit court in the former class, but extends to this court in the latter.

Upon mature and laborious consideration, the jurisdiction was upheld in State v. South Penn Oil Co., 42 W. Va. 80, 24 S. E. 688. The reasoning of Judge Holt in that case is not conclusive, but the decision has never been overruled. Moreover, it harmonizes with decisions in Bank v. Mercer County, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. 78; U. S. Coal, etc., Co. v. Randolph County Court, 38 W. Va. 201, 18 S. E. 566; Bridge Co. v. Kanawha County Court, 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. 1002; Bank v. State, 58 W. Va. 559, 52 S. E. 494. The jurisdiction has been denied in several cases involving only questions of valuation. Bluefield Waterworks Co. v. State, 63 W. Va. 490, 60 S. E. 403; McLean v. State, 61 W. Va. 537, 56 S. E. 884; Bank v. County Court, 65 W. Va. 208, 63 S. E. 1098. None of the latter in any way conflict with those of the former class. Though the McLean Case may have involved taxability of oil and gas in place, it was disposed of as one pertaining only to valuation and the appellate jurisdiction denied on that ground. Whether the decision in State v. South Penn Oil Co., on the question of jurisdiction, was right or wrong, it has stood unchallenged and unaffected for many years. Though the tax laws have been frequently revised and altered by the Legislature within that period, the power and jurisdiction asserted, as aforesaid, have not been denied or divested by any statutory provision. From this we assume satisfaction with the ruling on the part of both the people and the Legislature, and the wholesomeness of such jurisdiction is manifest. But for it property might be regarded in one judicial circuit as taxable and in another untaxable, and persons as chargeable with taxes on property under certain conditions, and not under others, according to the circuit in which they happen to reside. Uniformity of decision upon questions of this kind is both desirable and necessary, and it is difficult to see how it could be attained otherwise than by the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court in some form. In view of these considerations, we are unwilling to overrule these decisions, and consider it unnecessary to enter upon any elaborate discussion of the question.

On the writ of error disposed of in 62 W. Va. 442, 59 S. E. 1051, we held that the joint custody and control of a bonded warehouse by the proprietor thereof and the federal storekeeper in charge did not constitute such a change of possession of the liquor stored therein as to destroy presumption of ownership thereof by the distiller; and that, upon an application for relief from erroneous assessment, by the distiller, upon the theory of ownership of the liquor assessed to him in the holders of warehouse receipts or certificates therefor, he must overcome this presumption by proof of title in the holders of such certificates.

Seeing the proof of such ownership did not measure up to the legal requirements, the judgment of the circuit court, refusing to disturb the assessment, was affirmed.

[1] In this case we are confronted with proof which we deem sufficient to overcome the presumption. Insufficiency of the evidence to prove it has been argued at great length in the brief, but we think the position of the attorneys for the defendant in error is untenable. They have also insisted that the plaintiff in error is a trustee in possession or a pledgee in possession against whom the tax on the property may be lawfully assessed. We are not convinced by this argument either. The distilling company has no title to the property or beneficial interest therein. It is a mere bailee for hire. It is therefore clearly not a trustee within the meaning of that provision of the statute. Neither is it a pledgee. The property is not held for any independent, collateral, or antecedent indebtedness of any kind. It is merely stored in the warehouse and subject to a lien by contract, as well as by the common law, for storage charges, for the enforcement of which no power of sale is given either by the contract or the law.

If the record disclosed nothing more, the applicant would have been entitled to relief. In its return to the assessor it charged itself with 8,305 barrels of whisky, claiming that to be all it owned, although there were 22,000 barrels more in the warehouse. This it disclaimed ownership of and failed to list as the property of any other person. Thereupon the assessor charged it with $176,000 as the value of the omitted property. Assuming failure of duty on the part of the applicant, respecting the listing of this property, an inquiry arises as to which the briefs are silent, namely, whether such failure denied the applicant any remedy for the assessment of this property against it. In the case between these same parties, reported in 62 W. Va. 442, 59 S. E. 1051, we held that, for the purposes of taxation, the title to personal property was presumed to be with the possession thereof, and that an assessment against this applicant of property in its possession, but not owned by it, on its refusal to disclose the name of the owner, was a proper assessment. If, therefore, it refused in 1907 to disclose the name of the owner of the property, then in its custody, the same principle will sustain this assessment, if the statute denied it all remedy for correction of the error by way of punishment for its refusal to list the property.

[2] The assessment was made under an act passed by the Legislature on February 24, 1905, and in effect from its passage. That act made it the duty of the owners of property to furnish the assessor, on his application, all necessary information concerning the same, and also provided that lists, according to a prescribed form, should be made and furnished—in the case of the property of a minor, by his guardian, if any, and, if none, by his father, if living, or if not, by his mother, if living, and, if neither was living or resided in the state, by the person having charge of the property; in the case of property of a married woman, by herself or her husband, in her name; in the case of the property of a husband, out of the state or incapable of listing the property, by his wife; in the case of property held in trust, by the trustee, if in possession thereof, otherwise by the party for whose benefit it was held; in the case of property of a deceased person, by the personal representative; in the case of the property of an insane person, or a person confined in the penitentiary, by his committee; in the case of the property of a company, incorporated or not, whose assets were in the hands of an agent, factor or receiver, by such agent, factor or receiver, or the president, proper accounting officer, partner, or agent within the state. Other provisions were made for listing property held under other peculiar circumstances. In all these cases, the person required to list the property was directed to list it separately from his own, designating the person, company, estate, or trust to which it belonged. The plain object of this provision was to secure a full and complete return of all personal property for the purposes of taxation. It is less general in its terms than the corresponding provision found in the previous statute. Section 41 of chapter 29 of the Code of 1899 (Code 1906, § 821—44). The first clause of that section required every person of full age and sound mind to list for taxation the property belonging to him, subject to certain exceptions, and the persons and property under his charge and control subject to taxation, and furnish to the assessor, on his application, all necessary information respecting the same. These two provisions are in pari materia. Presumptively the new statute was intended to be as broad as the old one. It would have been anomalous and manifestly contrary to the presumed legislative intent to leave an avenue of escape for any taxable property. We must assume, therefore, that somewhere in section 55 of chapter 35 of the Acts of 1905 the Legislature intended to provide for the return of any taxable property belonging to one person and in the possession of another. It is plain that it did not intend to charge property against any person simply and only because he had it in his possession, for he was authorized and directed to list it in the name of the owner.

[3] But manifestly it did not intend to permit property to escape taxation by reason of the custody thereof by persons other than the owners. As has already been stated, this new section is not as broad in its terms as the old one. Nowhere does it say every person shall list his own property and the property under his charge and control. Instead of saying this and then proceeding to give directions for listing in certain cases of such custody, it gives directions in those cases, but omits the general provision covering all other similar cases. However, the two provisions are acts in pari materia, and the old one may be looked to for purposes of the new one. In the case of a minor, his property must be listed by the person having it in charge, if there is no other person in the state to do it. In the case of property owned by companies having their assets in the hands of an agent, factor, or receiver, such agent, factor, or receiver must list it. Neither of these two provisions, found in clauses "a" and "g" of said section 55, covers the case we have here in express terms, but they disclose the spirit and purpose of the section. Clause "d" of that section says property held in trust must be listed by the trustee if in possession thereof, otherwise by the party for whose benefit it is held. Giving effect to the presumed intention of the Legislature, we must give the word "trustee" its broadest and fullest meaning. While the applicant was a bailee, and not technically a trustee, a bailment involves a trust in the broad sense of the term. The bailee is a custodian of property which clearly embraces a trust. If the statute contained no word, expressive of intent, to require custodians of property, other than those specifically mentioned, and we regarded "trustee" as having been used in its technical sense, we might hold the statute insufficient to cover a case like this (White v. County Court, 63 W. Va. 230, 59 S. E. 884, 981), but we have a word here, which, taken in its broad, nontechnical sense, expresses the intent of the old statute, and makes the new one accord with it as well as the mandate of the Constitution requiring taxation of all property. We think, therefore, it was the duty of the applicant to list the property in question.

Assuming its refusal to do so, after a proper demand, we must ascertain the consequences of such failure. Sections 71 and 72 of said chapter 35 of the Acts of 1905 (sections 755, 756, Code 1906) require persons listing property for taxation to append to the lists certificates of a prescribed form, and then provided as follows: "Any person whose duty it is by law to list property for taxation and who shall refuse to verify such list, being called upon to do so, shall, in addition to any other penalty provided for such refusal, be denied the right to apply to any court to have the assessment and valuation of his property, which the assessor may make, changed in any manner." Section 73 (section 757) provided as follows: "If any person whose duty it is by law to list any real or personal property, being called upon by the assessor to do so, refuse to furnish a proper list thereof, or to make such oath as is required by this chapter; or if any person refuse to answer, or answer untruly, any question lawfully asked by the assessor, or fail or refuse to deliver any statement required by law, * * * he shall be denied all remedy provided by law for the correction of any assessment made by the assessor." In the case of the failure of any person to furnish a proper list or the furnishing of an incomplete or erroneous list, the assessor was authorized by section 74 (section 758) to list the property and fix its value, or to supply the omission and correct the errors, upon the best information he could obtain from other sources.

[4, 5] Thus the law provided a remedy in case of refusal to furnish a list or the rendition of an incomplete or erroneous list. It authorized the assessor to charge the delinquent person with such property as in his opinion based upon the information obtainable he ought to be charged with. It also inflicted upon the obdurate citizen a penalty for his misconduct by denial of any relief from the error, if any, in the assessor's list and valuation. Section 129 (section 815) of the same chapter gave a right to apply to the county court for relief from erroneous assessments, but that section must be read in connection with sections 72, 73, and 74 denying relief in certain cases and for stated causes. Effect must be given to all these sections. We are not to assume the Legislature intended by implication to give back in section 129 what it had taken away by sections 72 and 73; and effect may be given to said sections without destroying the effect of section 129. The Legislature may well have contemplated numerous cases of errors and mistakes on the part of citizens and officers in the listing and valuation of property, who were in no sense guilty of any disobedience of law. All such are allowed the benefit of that section. Nothing in the statute says a list for valuation made, as required by sections 55, 72, and 73, shall be binding upon the person who makes it. The plain purpose of these provisions is to compel a full and complete disclosure of taxable property with its value. If, by some mischance, a person erroneously charged himself with more property than he owned, or valued it beyond its worth, he also could obtain the benefit of the provision in section 129 of the same chapter. Hence, there is no rule of construction which forbids reasonable operation to all of these provisions. They were all in effect in the year 1907, when this assessment was made.

Obviously, then, the remaining and conclusive inquiry is whether a demand was made upon the applicant to list the property and it refused to do so. That a blank list was delivered to it is beyond question. It filled out that list, charging itself with all of its own property, but omitting the 22,000 barrels of whisky in question. As to that property it made no list, and the assessor testified that its agent in charge refused to do so. In response to the question whether he had any conversation with the agent about the assessment of this property, he says, "Well, as well as I can recollect, when Mr. Parks handed me that blank, it was filled up by the Hannis Distilling Company. I don't know whether I could go over the exact words that he said. He said I would have to get it like I got it before, and I got it." He then testifies that for the year 1905 he went to the officials of the company, and they told him they could not give him any information about the whisky in the warehouse, and he then reported the matter to the State Tax Commissioner, who directed him to assess it to the company arbitrarily. He did so and that assessment was the one formerly disposed of in this court. Several letters from the Tax Commissioner to the assessor, dated in the month of July, 1905, relating to the subject and giving such directions, were put in evidence in this proceeding. Mr. Parks, the agent, denies the conversation about the ownership of the property to which the assessor testified, saying he was positive no such inquiry was made of him for the year 1907, but he thinks it was made in the year 1905. He also admits having told the assessor he did not know who the owners of the property were, and that, if he had inquired of him in 1907, he could not have told him the names of the owners, but would have submitted the matter to the Philadelphia office. We think it plain from all this evidence that the information would not have been given, if it had been asked, that the list would not have been made, and also that a sufficient demand was made by the assessor, when he mailed or delivered to the applicant a blank on which this property should have been listed. The demand and refusal of 1905 would not suffice for the year 1907, of course, but the transactions of that year show a deliberate purpose on the part of the company to prevent the taxation of the property stored in its warehouse in its own name or in the names of the owners. It maintained this position in 1906. It received an assessment blank in 1907, knowing the assessor desired it to list this property, and used it for its own property. It must have known additional blanks would have been furnished on request. These circumstances all go into the scale on the conflict in testimony between its agent and the assessor which both the county court and the circuit court have passed upon. We cannot disturb their finding.

Seeing no error in the judgment, we affirm it.

COPP et al. v. STATE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 16, 1911.)

1. TAXATION (§§ 456, 493*)—ILLEGAL ASSESSMENT—REMEDIES OF OWNER.

If an assessor assesses land which is not liable for taxes, the party aggrieved has a right to appear before the board of review and equalization and have such erroneous assessment corrected by said board, in the manner provided by section 18 of chapter 29, Code 1906, as amended by chapter 80, Acts 1907 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 29, § 18). If said board should refuse to make the correction, he can appeal to the circuit court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 813, 876-883; Dec. Dig. §§ 456, 493.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 493*)—REVIEW—APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT.

In the matter of such appeal, the circuit court acts judicially when it decides the question of the liability, or nonliability, of the property to taxation, and the judgment of the circuit court is subject to review, upon writ of error, by this court, when the taxes levied on such property amount to $100 or more.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 876-883; Dec. Dig. § 493.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 5*)—ASSESSMENT—EXEMPTIONS—GOVERNMENT LANDS.

If land once owned and used by the United States for governmental purposes be sold to private persons, pursuant to an act of Congress, and the legal title retained to secure the future payment of any part of the purchase money, it is not liable to taxation by the state or by any of the state's governmental agencies, so long as the lien in favor of the United States remains unsatisfied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 17, 31-45; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by C. H. Copp and others against the State and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

T. C. Townsend, J. B. Handlan, and W. G. Conley, Atty. Gen., for plaintiffs in error. Hubbard & Hubbard, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, P. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Ohio county, rendered January 15, 1910, exonerating the old customs house and post office lot and building in the city of Wheeling from taxes assessed thereon for the year 1909. The case presents for decision two questions: (1) Jurisdiction in this court; (2) the right of a state to levy taxes upon real estate to which the United States had the legal title, and upon which it holds a lien for the purchase money. The judgment complained of was rendered by the circuit court upon an appeal awarded by it to C. H. Copp and others, the purchasers of the property, from a judgment of the board of review and equalization. Said board held that the property was liable for taxes assessed thereon for state, county, and district purposes for the year 1909, and the circuit court reversed this action of the board, and held that the property was not, at that time, liable for such taxes.

As to the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the writ of error. This depends upon two questions: (1) Whether or not the circuit court had jurisdiction to review the action of the board of review and equalization; and (2), having jurisdiction, whether it acted ministerially or judicially. The capacity in which the court acts in matters of appeals from erroneous assessments depends upon the nature of the question to be decided. In controversies concerning the valuation of property only, there is no appeal from the circuit court to this court, because the action of the court is ministerial, rather than judicial. Mackin v. Taylor County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. 632; McLean v. State, 61 W. Va. 537, 56 S. E. 884; Bluefield Waterworks Co. v. State, 63 W. Va. 480, 60 S. E. 403. But, if the controversy is concerning the right of the state to tax the property, or concerning the constitutionality of the act providing the method of ascertaining the value of property, then the question is a judicial one, and this court can review the judgment of the circuit court. Bank of Bramwell v. County Court, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. 78; South Side Bridge Co.

v. County Court, 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. 1002; State v. South Penn Oil Co., 42 W. Va. 80, 24 S. E. 688; Clark v. County Court, 55 W. Va. 278, 47 S. E. 162. These cases were decided when the county court was the tribunal for correcting errors in the assessment of property. But the principle decided in those cases is the same that is involved in the present one, because Acts 1907, c. 80, amending the assessment laws, and substituting the board of review and equalization for the county court, in the matter of correcting errors in the assessment, gives the same right of appeal to the circuit court from the judgment of said board as was formally allowed from the judgment of the county court. Section 18, c. 29, of the Code, as amended by chapter 80, Acts 1907, empowers the board of review and equalization "to examine and review the land and personal property books, and of its own motion or on sufficient cause being shown by any person (It) shall add to said land and personal property books the names of persons, the value of personal property and the description and value of real estate liable to assessment in said county, omitted from said assessment books, by the assessor; they shall correct all errors in the names of persons, in the description of property upon such books and in the assessment and valuation of property thereon, and they shall cause to be done whatever else may be necessary to make said assessment as returned by the personal property assessor comply with the provisions of this chapter, and to the end that all property shall be assessed at its true and actual value. * * * " Section 129 of chapter 29 of the Code, as amended by chapter 80, Acts 1907, gives the right of appeal from said board to the circuit court, and reads as follows: "Any person claiming to be aggrieved by any assessment in any land or personal property book in any county who shall have appeared and contested the same as provided in section eighteen of this chapter, may, within thirty days from the adjournment of the board of equalization and review, apply for relief to the circuit court of the county in which such books are made out." This section gives the right of appeal to the state also. Section 18 of chapter 29, as amended, gives the board of equalization and review the power to pass on the question of the taxability, as well as upon the valuation, of property, and property not liable to taxation, which has been assessed by the assessor, should be stricken from the land book. The language of the statute is: "They shall correct all errors in the names of persons, in the description of property upon such books and in the assessment and valuation of property thereon," etc. There is no question of the right of appeal by Copp and others in this case from the judgment of the board of review and equalization to the circuit court.

The circuit court reviewed and reversed the action of said board, and by order entered January 15, 1910, held that the property in question was not liable to taxation. As we have before said, this action by the circuit court was judicial, and, the amount of taxes involved being more than $100, the judgment of the circuit court may be reviewed by this court. This brings us to the main issue in the case.

Pursuant to an act of Congress approved May 30, 1908 (Act May 30, 1908, c. 228, 35 Stat. 523), the Secretary of the Treasury sold the lot and building thereon at public auction on the 24th day of July, 1908, to O. H. Copp, Joseph Speldel, and W. B. Peterson, for $118,500, one-fourth of which was paid in cash and the balance to be paid in one, two, and three years, with interest. By the terms of sale the government retains title until all the purchase money is paid, and, upon payment in full, is to make a quitclaim deed to the purchasers. The contract of sale binds the purchasers to keep the property insured against loss by fire, for the benefit of the government, until all the purchase money is paid, and gave them immediate possession. The contract further provided that, in the event of default for 30 days in the payment of any installment of the purchase money, the government may resell the property, and pay the net proceeds, after deducting all expenses of resale, to the purchasers. It also binds the purchasers personally for any deficiency that may result from a resale, and gives them the right to make such repairs and minor alterations and improvements upon the building as they may deem necessary.

The legal question which the record presents is: Has the United States government such an interest in the property as entitles it to be exempt from taxation by the state for the year 1909? It has the legal title and a vendor's lien upon it for three-fourths of the purchase price. None of the deferred payments were due when the taxes for that year were assessed. Do these facts not show that the government has such an interest in, or claim upon, the property as will exempt it from state taxes? Section 3, c. 1, Code 1906, expressly exempts the property in question from all taxes "so long as the United States shall be the owner thereof." But the question must be decided independent of the statute, for the reason that no state has the power to tax any of the agencies of the United States government without its consent. We must be governed by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, because the rule announced by it is the supreme law of the land on this question. Chief Justice Marshall, who delivered the opinion of that court in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, at pages 429-430 (4 U. S. Ed. 579), says: "All subjects over which the sovereign power of a state extends are objects of taxation, but those over which it does not extend are upon the soundest principles exempt from taxation. This proposition may almost be pronounced self-evident. The sovereignty of a state extends to everything which exists by its own authority, or is introduced by its permission; but does it extend to those means which are employed by Congress to carry into execution powers conferred on that body by the people of the United States? We think it demonstrable that it does not. Those powers are not given by the people of a single state. They are given by the people of the United States to a government whose laws, made in pursuance of the Constitution, are declared to be supreme. Consequently the people of a single state cannot confer a sovereignty which will extend over them. * * * We are not driven to the perplexing inquiry, so unfit for the judicial department, what degree of taxation is the legitimate use, and what degree may amount to the abuse of the power. The attempt to use it on the means employed by the government of the Union, in pursuance of the Constitution, is itself an abuse, because it is the usurpation of a power which the people of a single state cannot give. We find, then, on just theory, a total failure of this original right to tax the means employed by the government of the Union, for the execution of its powers." This principle was again announced in Van Brocklin v. State of Tennessee, 117 U. S. 151, 6 Sup. Ct. 670, 29 L. Ed. 845; and was recognized and followed by this court in Old National Bank of Martinsburg v. County Court of Berkeley County, 58 W. Va. 559, 52 S. E. 494, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 584.

But it is insisted by counsel for plaintiffs in error that the government has parted with its interests in the property, that it is simply the holder of the legal title, and the purchasers are the equitable owners. It is true they are the purchasers and have an equitable right in the property, and under the terms of their contract are at present occupying it and receiving the rents and profits. But, notwithstanding, must they not be complete equitable owners; that is, must they not have paid all the purchase money, and must they not be in a position to demand of the government a deed for the land, before they can be regarded, in law, as such equitable owners as will make the property liable for taxes? From a careful consideration of the following decisions such seems to be the requirement of the law. Railway Company v. Prescott, 16 Wall. 603, 21 L. Ed. 373, was a case in which it appears that Congress had in 1862 passed an act (Act July 1, 1862, c. 120, 12 Stat. 489) to aid the Kansas-Pacific Railway Company. The act provided that upon the construction of each section of 40 miles in length of its road and upon inspection and acceptance of the same by the President grants should be issued to said company for alternate sections of land on each side of the road within certain limits. It also provided that any lands not sold by the company within three years after the final completion of the road should be liable to be sold to actual settlers under the pre-emption law at $1.25 per acre, and the money paid to said railroad company. In 1864 the act was amended (Act July 2, 1864, c. 216, 13 Stat. 356) so as to require the railway company to pay into the treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands to the company, or party in interest, as the titles should be required by the said company. Certain persons had acquired tax titles to these lands, by virtue of sales for delinquent taxes, which had been assessed under the laws of the state of Kansas while the legal title thereto still remained in the United States. The railway company filed its bill in the state court of Kansas against Prescott, a claimant by tax title, to quiet its title. From a judgment of the state court adverse to the railway company an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. The primary question presented was whether the land was liable for state tax, and this depended upon the question whether or not the railway company was the complete owner of the land at the time it was taxed. At the time of the assessment, and sale of the land for taxes, the expenses for surveying and selecting the land had not been paid by the railway company into the treasury of the United States. This charge for said expenses, against the land, was all the interest the government had in it, still the court held it not taxable by the state. The court in its opinion, at page 608 of 16 Wall. (21 L. Ed. 373), says: "While we recognize the doctrine heretofore laid down by this court that lands sold by the United States may be taxed before they have parted with the legal title by issuing a patent, it is to be understood as applicable to cases where the right to the patent is complete, and the equitable title is fully vested in the party without anything more to be paid or any act to be done going to the foundation of his right. The present case does not fall within that principle. Two important acts remain to be done, the failure to do which may wholly defeat the right of the company to a patent for these lands. The first is the payment of the costs of surveying. It is admitted that this has never been done in the present case. If the company have such an interest in these lands that they can be sold by the state under her power of taxation, then the title is divested out of the government without its consent, and the right to recover the money expended in the surveys is defeated. As the government retains the legal title until the company or some one interested in the same grant or title shall pay these expenses, the state cannot levy taxes on the land, and under such levy sell and make title which might in any event defeat this right of the federal government reserved in the act by which the inchoate grant was made." The same question was again presented to that court in a later case of Railway Company v. McShane, 22 Wall. 444, 22 L. Ed. 747, and was again decided against the right of a state to tax land to which the government has legal title and on which it has a claim for expenses of making surveys. The court there again held that "lands on which the costs of survey have not been paid, and for which the United States have not issued a patent to the company, are exempt from state taxation." In the opinion at page 462 of 22 Wall. (22 L. Ed. 747) the court says: "That the payment of these costs of surveying the land is a condition precedent to the right to receive the title from the government can admit of no doubt. Until this is done, the equitable title of the company is incomplete. There remains a payment to be made to perfect it. There is something to be done without which the company is not entitled to a patent. The case clearly is not within the rule which authorizes state taxation of lands, the title of which is in the United States." The same point again arose in Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Traill County, 115 U. S. 600, 6 Sup. Ct. 201, 29 L. Ed. 477, and the court followed its previous decisions made in Railway Co. v. Prescott, supra, and Railway Co. v. McShane, supra.

The principle was also made clear in Tucker v. Ferguson, 22 Wall. 527, 22 L. Ed. 805. That was a case involving the right of the state of Michigan to levy taxes upon land which had been granted to said state by Congress to be disposed of by it according to the provisions of said act, to aid in the construction of certain railroads. The court in discussing the right of the state to levy taxes upon the land, after having disposed of it in accordance with the act of Congress, at page 572 of 22 Wall. (22 L. Ed. 805), says: "Upon general principles she could not tax the land while the title remained in the United States, nor while she held them as the trustee of the United States, which, in the view of the law, was the same thing. But when the state proceeding in the execution of the trust had transferred her entire title to the company, and they had perfected their title and acquired the right to sell, the case assumed a very different aspect. * * * Nothing remained to the state but the performance of the remaining duties of the trust, without any title, present or potential, to the lands." This quotation from the opinion clearly shows that the reason for holding the lands taxable by the state in that case was that the railway company had perfected its title, and the government no longer had any claim upon the land. Colorado Company v. Commissioners, 95 U. S. 259, 24 L. Ed. 495, is also a case in point. In that case Gov. Armijo, of New Mexico, had in 1843 granted about 500,000 acres of land to Gervacio Nolan. After the United States acquired the territory, embracing this grant, from Mexico, a report of the grant to Nolan was made to Congress. That body was of opinion that the grant was good only to the extent of 11 square leagues; the governor having power under the laws of Mexico to grant no more than that quantity to one person, and passed an act (Act July 1, 1870, c. 202, 16 Stat. 646) confirming this grant to the heirs of Nolan to the extent of 11 square leagues, but provided in the act for the locating and surveying thereof to be made under the Commissioner of the Land Office. The act further provided that, upon the perfecting of the surveys and plats, the title should vest in the confirmees, who were to bear the expenses of making same. Congress reserved the power to enforce payment of said expenses by sale of the lands, or by any other appropriate method. The court held that the lands were not liable to be taxed by the territorial government of Colorado, within whose bounds they lay, until the expenses of surveys and plats had been paid into the treasury of the United States by the confirmees. The act provided that: "Before the confirmation provided for by this act shall become legally effective, the heirs of said Gervacio Nolan, or their legal representatives, shall pay the costs of such surveys as inure to their benefit respectively." The court says: "We are of opinion that the clause above quoted suspends the vesting of title in the claimants, or of any perfect equitable right to the title until the expenses of surveys are paid; and that this was done intentionally to secure that payment. If not paid after a reasonable time subsequent to the perfection of the surveys and plats, there remains in Congress the power to enforce that payment by a sale of the lands, a resumption of the grant, or any other appropriate mode." To the same effect are the following cases: Wisconsin Cent. R. R. Co. v. Price Co., 133 U. S. 496, 10 Sup. Ct. 341, 33 L. Ed. 687; Hessman v. Durham, 165 U. S. 144, 17 Sup. Ct. 253, 41 L. Ed. 664. See, also, 1 Cooley on Taxation, p. 137. An examination of these cases shows that the reason for holding the lands not liable to taxes imposed under state and territorial law is that the grantees were not at the time of the assessment of taxes the complete equitable owners, and that the government still had a pecuniary interest to be protected by holding the legal title. In view of these decisions, we are bound to hold that the land purchased of the United States by C. H. Copp and his associates is not liable for state, county, or district taxes, so long as the United States has any claim upon it for any portion of the purchase money. If it were subject to taxation, it would also be liable under our statute law to be sold for their nonpayment, and in such case, if not redeemed, complete title to the entire interest in the land would pass to the tax purchaser. Under the West Virginia statute, it is not alone the interest of Copp and his associates in the land that is taxed, but it is the entire interest and estate therein on which taxes are assessed, and to suffer it to be taxed, so long as any portion of the purchase price remains unpaid, might operate as a serious embarrassment to the government in the enforcement of its claim for the purchase money.

Counsel for plaintiffs in error rely upon the case of Baltimore Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. v. Baltimore, 195 U. S. 375, 25 Sup. Ct. 50, 49 L. Ed. 242, as authority to support their contention that the purchasers are the equitable owners of the land, and that it is liable to be taxed, notwithstanding the legal title is in the government. But that case is not in conflict with the decisions above cited. It is clearly distinguishable from them, and presents a different state of facts from the case now before us. In that case the land in question was a part of Ft. McHenry, which belonged to the government. Under an act of Congress passed in 1878 (Act June 19, 1878, c. 310, 20 Stat. 167), it was conveyed to the plaintiff, on condition that plaintiff should construct a dry dock, and should "accord to the United States the right to the use forever of the said dry dock at any time for the prompt examination and repair of vessels belonging to the United States free from charge for docking and that if at any time the property hereby conveyed shall be diverted to any other use than herein named or if the said dry dock shall be at any time unfit for use for a period of six months or more, the property hereby conveyed with all its privileges and appurtenances shall revert to and become the absolute property of the United States." In that case the court treated only the interest of the dry dock company in the property as taxed, or as being liable for taxes. The opinion of the court at page 381 of 195 U. S., at page 51 of 25 Sup. Ct. (49 L. Ed. 242), says: "It is true commonly taxes on land create a lien paramount to all interests, and that a tax sale often has been said to extinguish all titles and to start a new one. Hefner v. Northwestern Life Ins. Co., 123 U. S. 747, 751 [8 Sup. Ct. 337, 31 L. Ed. 309]; Textor v. Shipley, 86 Md. 424, 438 [38 Atl. 932]; Emery v. Boston Terminal Co., 178 Mass. 172, 184 [59 N. E. 763, 86 Am. St. Rep. 473]. Perhaps it was assumed that this always was the effect of tax sales in Northern Pacific Railroad v. Traill Co., 115 U. S. 600 [6 Sup. Ct. 201, 29 L. Ed. 477]. But it needs no argument to show that a state may do less. It may tax a life estate to one and a remainder to another, and sell only the interest of the party making default. With regard to what the state of Maryland has done and what are the purport and attempted effect of the tax in this case, we follow the Court of Appeals. That court treated the tax and the lien as going only to the dock company's interest in the land, although probably by an oversight it neglected to modify the judgment according to its own suggestion so as to show the fact. That only the company's interest was taxed is shown by the reduction of the assessment on account of the condition. Of course, it does not matter what form of words the judgment employs, when its meaning is thus declared by the court having the matter under its control."

We do not think the fact that Copp and others have not the legal title to the land would affect the question of its taxability by the state, provided they were the complete equitable owners and were in a position to demand a conveyance, but we are clearly of the opinion that, according to the decisions herein cited, the state has no right to tax the land, while the United States government has any claim upon it for any portion of the purchase money. The judgment of the lower court will be affirmed.

HUNT v. DI BACCO et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 24*)—ACTIONS—PLEADING—ALLEGATIONS OF TIME.

A declaration in trespass for assault and battery need not allege the exact time when the trespass was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 25, 26; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 24*)—PLEADING—GENERAL ISSUE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—MATTERS IN EXCUSE OR JUSTIFICATION.

In an action for damages for assault and battery, matters in excuse or justification are not admissible under the general issue, but must be specially pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 173*)—GENERAL REPLICATION.

A general replication traverses all the matters of defense alleged in a plea of confession and avoidance. Plaintiff need not reply specially unless he cannot deny all the averments of the plea, and wishes to admit the truth of some of them, and to avoid the effect of his admission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 339, 340, 385; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 99*)—DUPLICITY—ABOLISHMENT.

By virtue of statute in this state, a defendant can plead several matters of defense, whether of law or fact, in the same plea. The common-law objection for duplicity is thereby abolished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 202; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

5. TRESPASS (§ 31*)—ACTIONS—PERSONS LIABLE—JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY.

Joint trespassers may be sued either jointly or severally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Cent. Dig. § 70; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

6. TRESPASS (§§ 30, 46*)—PERSONS LIABLE—"AIDER AND ABETTOR."

Any person who is present at the commission of a trespass, encouraging or exciting the same by words, gestures, looks, or signs, or who in any way or by any means countenances and approves the same, is in law deemed to be an aider and abettor, and liable as principal, and proof that a person is present at the commission of a trespass without disapproving or opposing it is evidence from which, in connection with other circumstances, it is competent for the jury to infer that he assented thereto, lent to it his countenance, and approved it, and was thereby aiding and abetting the same.

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Action by Daniel Hunt against Joe Di Bacco and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Chas. D. Smith and D. E. Cuppett, for plaintiffs in error. Cunningham & Stallings and J. P. Scott, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. Joe Di Bacco and Vincent Di Bacco were granted a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Tucker county against them for $1,579 in favor of plaintiff in an action of trespass for an assault and battery. A demurrer to the declaration was overruled, and the defendants pleaded the general issue, and also filed two special pleas. Plaintiff replied generally to all of said pleas. Issue was thereon joined, and the jury found for the plaintiff the above-named sum.

The first error assigned relates to the overruling of the demurrer. The demurrer was in writing, and the grounds assigned are: (1) That the place of plaintiff's injury is not set out; (2) that the time of the injury is not sufficiently averred; and (3) that the declaration charges a joint tort in one count.

The demurrer was properly overruled. The declaration sufficiently alleges that the trespass was committed in Tucker county. In the caption of the declaration the court is styled as follows: "State of West Virginia, County of Tucker, to wit: In the Circuit Court of said County." And in the body of the declaration it is alleged "that the defendants did, on the ——— day of October, 1903, with force and arms, assault the plaintiff at the county aforesaid," etc. The words "the county aforesaid" refer to Tucker county, the county named in the caption. But we do not mean to intimate that such an averment is essential to show jurisdiction. We are inclined to think it is not. The action is transitory, and may be brought in the county of defendant's residence. Payne v. Britton's Ex'r, 6 Rand. (Va.) 101; Shaver v. White, 6 Munf. (Va.) 110, 8 Am. Dec. 730. Moreover, no want of jurisdiction appearing upon the face of the declaration, it could not be raised by demurrer. There was no plea in abatement.

[1] It was not necessary to allege the day on which the trespass occurred. Its nature was such that defendants could not have been surprised by failure to allege the time; nor is the exact time an indispensable allegation. Tabb v. Gregory, 4 Call. (Va.) 225; Shaver v. White, 6 Munf. (Va.) 110; Brown v. Point Pleasant, 36 W. Va. 290, 15 S. E. 209.

[5] As to the third ground of demurrer: It is universal law that joint tort-feasors may be sued either jointly or severally. Day v. Coal Co., 60 W. Va. 27, 53 S. E. 776, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 167; Shaver v. Edgell, 48 W. Va. 503, 37 S. E. 664; Riverside Cotton Mills Co. v. Lanier, 102 Va. 148, 45 S. E. 875.

Defendants moved for judgment of non prosecution, and the motion was overruled; and this action of the court is assigned as error.

A judgment by non prosecution can be had only where plaintiff, at some stage of the action, after his appearance and before judgment, abandons and fails to prosecute his suit. 4 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) 957; Buena Vista Limestone Co. v. Parrish, 34 W. Va. 652, 12 S. E. 817.

[3] Counsel insist that plaintiff's failure to reply specially to defendants' two special pleas was an admission of the truth of the allegations therein contained, and amounted to an abandonment of his action. But special replications were not necessary in order to put the matters in issue. They were replied to generally. This was a general traverse, and it put in issue all the facts alleged in the pleas. Plaintiff need reply specially only in case he cannot traverse all the allegations of the plea, as, for example, if plaintiff had, in fact, assaulted and beat Vincent Di Bacco, and had wished to justify his act, he should have replied specially. 1 Chitty (11th Ed.) 592. But plaintiff does not admit having struck the first blow, and therefore it was proper to reply generally. Hogg's Pl. & Forms, § 283.

[2] Plaintiff's counsel insist that the special pleas were improperly admitted, because, as they claim, the matters therein alleged are properly provable under the general issue. This is not correct. Matters in justification of or given in excuse for, an assault and battery, are not provable under the general issue. They must be specially pleaded. 1 Chitty (11th Ed.) 501; Shires v. Boggess, 69 S. E. 469.

The first of said pleas is objected to because it sets up two distinct matters of defense. It alleges, in substance: (1) That Vincent Di Bacco was the proprietor of a licensed saloon in the town of Thomas, Tucker county, W. Va., and that Joe Di Bacco was employed as his clerk; that it was the duty of Vincent Di Bacco to preserve order and to protect his guests from trespass therein; that plaintiff entered the saloon and assaulted and beat a certain guest named William Jacobs; that in his attempt to preserve order Vincent Di Bacco gently laid hands on plaintiff and evicted him from the saloon, doing no more than was necessary for that purpose; and (2) that immediately thereafter plaintiff again entered the saloon and assaulted and beat the defendant Vincent Di Bacco, and thereupon the defendants, in attempting to preserve the peace and prevent plaintiff from so acting, laid hands upon him and again evicted him from the saloon, using no more force than was necessary for that purpose; and that these are the acts of trespass of which plaintiff complains.

[4] It is no valid objection to the plea that it seeks to justify on two several grounds. A defendant is permitted by statute in this state to plead as many several matters, whether of law or fact, as he shall think necessary. At the common law this plea would have been bad, and subject to special demurrer for duplicity, but not so under our statute which permits more than one issue to be presented for trial. Section 20, c. 125, Code 1906. "Duplicity in a plea is no longer ground of demurrer or objection to it." Poling v. Maddox, 41 W. Va. 779, 24 S. E. 999.

The second plea is purely one of son assault demesne, or self-defense. It alleges that the injury of which plaintiff complains was wholly caused by the assault and battery first committed by him upon defendants, and that defendants did no more than was necessary to protect themselves from injury by plaintiff. We find no fault with this plea.

The evidence shows that the assault and battery upon plaintiff was committed in a saloon conducted by Vincent Di Bacco, and in which Joe Di Bacco was employed as bartender; that it occurred in the nighttime on October 24, 1908. There had been a Republican rally in the town that day, and a large number of people from the country and the nearby coal mines had come to the rally. Plaintiff and a number of other young men went into Di Bacco's saloon, bought some beer, and went into a back room and drank it. Returning from the back room to the bar, they found a number of others at the bar, drinking. Among the number standing at the bar was a colored man by the name of William Jacobs. It appears that plaintiff and Jacobs had some unpleasant words, and plaintiff struck Jacobs in the face, and immediately walked out of the saloon. Later plaintiff and some other companions again went into the saloon, and some of the parties bought some more beer, and they went into the back room and drank it. Plaintiff testifies that, on returning from the back room to the barroom, a white man by the name of John Lucier and a colored man were engaged in an argument or dispute; that he was standing listening to them; that Vincent Di Bacco took hold of him, and started to put him out; and that he was then struck on the head and shoulder with a stick, and was knocked unconscious. The fact that he was struck with a pick handle by Joe Di Bacco, the bartender, and his collarbone broken, and a gash cut in his scalp about $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 inches long, is not denied. Joe Di Bacco himself admits striking plaintiff as many as two licks with a pick handle. He says he did it to defend himself against the attack which he claims plaintiff had made upon the "boss" (meaning Vincent Di Bacco). He says that plaintiff had struck Vincent Di Bacco and knocked him over against the corner by the door, as he was trying to take him out. This fact, however, is denied by plaintiff and by a number of other witnesses. In another part of his testimony Joe Di Bacco, in answer to the question why he struck plaintiff, says: "For hitting the boss." He also says that he had to protect the place and the "boss." Joe Di Bacco is a young Italian, weighing about 230 pounds. The plaintiff is a young man who weighed something over 130 pounds, and had but one arm. Vincent Di Bacco says the bartender told him to take plaintiff out; that he took hold of him and put him out, and tried to shut the front door; and, as he attempted to shut the door, plaintiff struck him in the face. But the fact that plaintiff struck him is denied by plaintiff, and also by a number of other witnesses. Plaintiff's testimony, and that of some of his witnesses, tends to prove that, when Vincent Di Bacco had hold of plaintiff by the only arm which he had, Joe Di Bacco struck him over the head and shoulder with a pick handle. Some witnesses say that he struck him as many as four or five times. Defendant Joe Di Bacco admits striking him at least twice. Just prior to the time plaintiff was struck he and two or three others, not those who were with him the first time, had gone into the back room, and had drunk their beer, and were returning to the outside, and had halted in the main barroom. The evidence is conflicting as to whether plaintiff then began a quarrel with one of defendant's guests. But, whether he did or not, he was clearly not a trespasser. He was in defendant's barroom by virtue of the general invitation which, in the character of defendant's business, he extends to the public. Of course, it was plaintiff's duty to demean himself in a decent, orderly, and peaceable manner. But even admitting that he was quarrelsome, and manifested a disposition and purpose to strike some other guest in the barroom, still the defendant owed him the duty not to do him unlawful or unnecessary injury. He had no right to use any more force than was necessary to eject him. There is evidence to support the theory, and the jury must have so found, that the beating and wounding was wholly unnecessary to accomplish plaintiff's eviction, and also that it was done willfully, wantonly, and even viciously.

It is not seriously contended that Joe Di Bacco is not liable; but it is earnestly insisted that the evidence fails to make a case of liability against Vincent Di Bacco. But there are two well-settled rules of law applicable to the facts and circumstances of this case as the jury could find them, either of which determines the liability of Vincent Di Bacco: First, if he aided and abetted Joe Di Bacco in the commission of the unlawful act, he is liable as a principal in the commission of the trespass; and, second, if the trespass was committed by Joe Di Bacco alone within the scope of his employment, while engaged in the line of his duty therein, Vincent Di Bacco is liable, because the defendants occupy the relation to each other of master and servant, and the law makes the master liable for such a trespass committed by the servant.

[6] Concerning the first proposition: The jury had the right to infer, from the testimony herein referred to, and from the additional facts, that Vincent Di Bacco did nothing to restrain Joe Di Bacco from committing the wrong, and retained him in his services after the wrong was committed, that he encouraged Joe Di Bacco, and approved his act. This would make him equally liable with Joe Di Bacco as his aider and abettor. 3 Greenleaf on Evl. § 40; 3 Cyc. 1069. The principle of law which may properly be applied to this case was correctly stated by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Brown v. Perkins and Wife, 1 Allen, 89, as follows: "Any person who is present at the commission of a trespass, encouraging or exciting the same by words, gestures, looks, or signs, or who in any way or by any means countenances and approves the same, is in the law deemed to be an aider and abettor, and liable as principal; and proof that a person is present at the commission of a trespass without disapproving or opposing it is evidence from which in connection with other circumstances it is competent for the jury to infer that he assented thereto, lent to it his countenance, and approved it, and was thereby aiding and abetting the same." The same rule was announced by the Supreme Court of Missouri in McMannus v. Lee et al., 43 Mo. 206, 97 Am. Dec. 386. The following authorities are also in point: Daingerfield v. Thompson, 33 Grat. 136, 36 Am. Rep. 783; Gillon v. Wilson, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 216; Bishop v. Ely, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 294; State

v. Noeninger, 108 Mo. 166, 18 S. W. 990; 3 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 41.

As to the second proposition: Joe Di Bacco was the bartender. He was serving guests at the bar at the time he committed the assault and battery on plaintiff. He says it was his duty to protect the place and the "boss," and the master does not deny this. He also says that he struck plaintiff because plaintiff had struck the "boss." This is certainly sufficient evidence to prove that the unlawful act was committed by Joe Di Bacco in the line of his employment, and while he was discharging his duties to his master. For such an unlawful act of the servant the law holds the master liable. 26 Cyc. 1518.

Complaint is made that the verdict is excessive; but, in view of the nature of the trespass, we are unable to say that it is so large as to evince passion, prejudice, partiality, or corruption.

[7] The jury may have found, which they had the right to do, that the trespass was committed willfully and wantonly. In such case they can award exemplary damages. Where damages do not admit of definite estimate, and there is no legal measure, the law leaves the measure to the sound discretion of the jury. 4 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 183.

We have carefully examined the instructions given for the plaintiff, to which the defendants objected, and also those asked for by the defendants which the court refused, and we find no error in the court's ruling in relation thereto. The court gave, at the request of defendants, a number of instructions. Their No. 2 correctly states the law, but was properly refused because the principle involved was stated in other instructions which were given at their request. The others not given were not applicable.

No error appears, and the judgment will be affirmed.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where the fact of guilt depends entirely upon circumstantial evidence, it is obligatory upon the trial judge, even in the absence of a timely written request, to charge the jury upon the law as to the force and effect of circumstantial evidence in criminal cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1999; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

Error from City Court of Sparta; R. W. Moore, Judge.

Thomas L. Twilley was convicted of gaming, and brings error. Reversed.

T. M. Hunt and R. H. Lewis, for plaintiff in error. R. L. Merritt, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The accused was indicted with three others for the offense of gaming; the indictment charging that they "did play and bet for money and drinks of liquor, a thing of value, at a game played with cards, contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof." Following his conviction the defendant filed his motion for a new trial, based on the general grounds and on the special assignment that the court failed to charge the jury upon the law as to the effect of circumstantial evidence.

[1] The evidence, substantially stated, is as follows: The accused, with three others named in the indictment, were caught by the marshal of the town of Sparta while playing a game of cards on the "headboard of a grave in the Catholic cemetery." Neither money nor whisky was seen, but the marshal testified that he "smelt whisky strong," and an empty bottle was lying on the ground, and two of the players were apparently under the influence of whisky. After they had been caught and arrested, two of the players, not the accused, stated that they were "just playing for drinks," and the marshal and another witness testified that "a drink of whisky was a thing of great value in Hancock county." This statement of the other defendants, made after the arrest and after the completion of the offense (if any offense was committed), had no probative value as against the accused. The only evidence against the accused, except the circumstance that he was playing with the others, was the statement made by him, some time after his arrest, to the mayor, that he would like the mayor, as his friend, to have the thing "squashed," and that on the day when they were caught playing one of the players came by his shop, stated to him that he had a bottle of whisky, and proposed that they go to the Catholic cemetery and play cards for drinks. This statement, while not amounting to a confession, was incriminatory, and, considered in connection with the other strongly suspicious circumstances, may be regarded as of sufficient probative weight to show the corpus delicti, and that the accused was a particeps criminis.

We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the circumstances were not sufficient for that purpose. For four men to leave their business in the daytime and go to a cemetery and play cards on the headboard of a grave would seem to indicate that there was something more in the way of temptation than the mere pleasure of playing an innocent game of cards, and in view of the indicia of the presence of intoxicants, and the evidence that a beverage of this character was hard to get in Hancock county and was very valuable, it would seem to be not unreasonable to infer that the "drinks" furnished the inducement for the playing of the game, and it is difficult to believe, in view of the evidence as to the great value of whisky in Hancock county, that the generosity of one of the players would have furnished without price the tempting stake. It is so natural for men who play cards, and for those who drink, to play for drinks, that this court is constrained to the conclusion that the verdict of the jury was not wholly unauthorized. Apparently the law against gaming, as well as against the sale of liquor, is most vigorously enforced in Hancock county, and in the town of Sparta, when the citizens of the town are compelled to resort to the cemetery to play cards for drinks, and when, even in that secluded spot, they don't have a ghost of a chance.

[2] The evidence, however, was entirely circumstantial. Even the incriminatory statement only inferentially indicates guilt. In such case it is well settled by the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court that it is the duty of the trial judge, even in the absence of a request, to charge the jury the law defining the probative value of circumstantial evidence, as laid down in section 1010 of the Penal Code of 1910. The writer confesses his inability to see any practical difference between the universal rule of "reasonable doubt," applicable in all criminal cases, and the special rule of "reasonable hypothesis," applicable to cases of circumstantial evidence. Whether dependent upon direct or circumstantial evidence, a conviction is unauthorized unless the jury believe the evidence of guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt; and, so long as there is a reasonable hypothesis of innocence, a reasonable doubt of guilt exists. And where a jury is instructed that a verdict of guilty cannot be legally found unless the evidence proves guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, this would seem to be tantamount to telling the jury that they could not legally convict unless the evidence excluded "every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused." But the law has made a difference between "reasonable doubt" and "reasonable hypothesis," and the Supreme Court has many times declared that, when a conviction is based alone on circumstantial evidence, it is reversible error for the trial judge to fail to instruct the jury that the evidence must exclude every reasonable hypothesis save that of guilt, although he has clearly charged that a conviction would be unauthorized unless the evidence proved the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt.

Judgment reversed.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 763, 803*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—DILIGENCE REQUIRED.

In a suit against a city by a traveler injured by a defect in one of the public streets, it was not error for the court to instruct the jury as follows: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that ordinary care or diligence upon the part of a person passing along a public street or sidewalk of a municipal corporation, and ordinary diligence upon the part of the municipal corporation in constructing, repairing, and maintaining its streets and sidewalks, do not imply a like degree of vigilance in foreseeing danger and guarding against it."

POWELL, J. [2] Only the proposition stated in the second headnote will be amplified. The instruction complained of is taken almost literally from the opinions of the Supreme Court in Wilson v. City of Atlanta, 63 Ga. 291, and Idlett v. City of Atlanta, 123 Ga. 821, 51 S. E. 709. While it is true, as contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error, that there are many expressions of the Supreme Court and of this court, appearing in the opinions, which it would not be proper for a trial judge to quote in his charge to the jury, still we think that the present instruction was not only abstractly correct, but was pertinent to the issues involved. It was proper for the court to tell the jury that the plaintiff (the user of the street) and the defendant (the city) were both held to the same degree of diligence, though not necessarily to the same quantum of diligence, and that this degree was ordinary care and diligence, but that less vigilance (a thing going to the quantum, and not to the degree, of the diligence) might fulfill this legal standard so far as the one was concerned than would be required to fulfill it so far as the other was concerned. To state it somewhat differently, it was proper for the court to tell the jury that, while a traveler upon the highway must use ordinary care and diligence, still this duty upon him might not in all cases require him to be actively alert to see whether the city had left the highway in a dangerous condition, especially where the danger was not patent; but the duty of exercising this same degree of diligence might require the city to be actively alert to discover and remedy such a defect.

[1] The charge as a whole was very fair, full, and lucid, and the evidence, though conflicting, fully authorizes the verdict; so there is no ground for interference by this court.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 741)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFESSION.

The evidence in this case being in conflict as to whether in fact the accused had made any confession of guilt, the court did not err in submitting that issue to the jury, and in charging generally on the law of confession as laid down in Pen. Code 1910, §§ 1031, 1032.

C. attempted to set up as a defense that, while he and F. were in company with a party of ladies, the attorney of R. made a demand upon F. for payment of a sum of money which he claimed was due by F. to R., and threatened to have F. arrested unless the sum was paid; that the transaction out of which the alleged indebtedness grew was more than 13 years old; that R. finally agreed to take $500 in settlement of his claim; that C., seeing the plight of his guest, gave him this check that he might pay the $500; that the check was without consideration, and that, if it represented any debt at all, even as between F. and R., it represented a debt which was barred by the statute of limitations. Held, that no valid defense was asserted. As between F. and R., the settlement of the disputed claim was a sufficient consideration. F.'s privilege of pleading the statute of limitations, even if the plea would have been good, was personal to him, and could not be exercised by C.; the fact that C. was dunned for the debt while in the presence of ladies, and was threatened with arrest if the debt was not paid, was not (at least in the absence of other allegations) adequate to show fraud; and, even if duress existed as against F., C. cannot plead it.

Action by J. O. Arnall against M. V. Roberts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. H. Freeman, for plaintiff in error. W. G. Post and W. C. Wright, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Arnall sued Roberts to recover damages for the latter's failure to deliver the cotton specified in the following written contract:

"Senola, Ga., 6/29/1909.

"For and in consideration of the sum of $1.00 to M. V. Roberts in hand paid by J. Claude Arnall, as part payment of the cotton herein purchased, the receipt whereof is acknowledged, I hereby agree to sell to J. Claude Arnall 25 bales of cotton, delivered at Haralson, Ga., between the first and 25th of October next. The delivery to be made at such times, at seller's option, in lots of not less than 50 bales. Cotton to average not less than 500 pounds per bale. If the cotton does not average 500 pounds per bale, I will deliver a sufficient number of bales to bring up the average to 500 pounds. The cotton to be of any grade between strict ordinary and fair, inclusive, at a price of 10½ f. o. b. cents per pound for 25 bales of 4's, said grade being good middling, American standard classification. With deductions and additions for other grades according to grade and such differences in effect on the day of delivery. It is fully understood and expressly agreed by the parties to this contract that same cannot be settled by payment of money, but only by delivery of the actual cotton, in square merchantable bales weighing 500 pounds, as aforesaid. [Signed] M. V. Roberts.

"We accept the above contract, with its conditions and obligations.

"[Signed] J. O. Arnall."

The defendant tendered a plea alleging that the contract sued upon was illegal and void, because it was a wagering or gambling contract; "that at the date of the execution and delivery of the same it was understood by both of the parties to the same that there was to be no actual delivery of the cotton, but that on the date fixed for the delivery of the same there was to be a settlement between said parties of the difference based upon the market value of the cotton on that day. Defendant says that he was not a producer of cotton, and had no cotton on hand, nor had he contracted to purchase cotton to fulfill said contract, at the date of the said contract, and that the said contract was entered into by said parties purely as a speculation on chances; that said contract is unilateral, and not mutually binding between the parties." The court struck this defense. We may say, in passing, that the plea, so far as it alleged that the contract was unilateral, is not well taken.

On its face the contract between the parties appears to relate to a valid, legal, enforceable transaction. Forsyth Mfg. Co. v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 199, 37 S. E. 485, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28. In that case, the general rule as to contracts for the future delivery of commodities is very well stated in the first three headnotes, as follows: "An executory agreement for the sale of goods to be delivered at a future day is valid, though at the time the seller has not the goods in his possession, has not contracted to purchase them, and has no expectation of acquiring them, otherwise than by producing, manufacturing, or purchasing them at some time before the day of delivery. Such a transaction is not rendered invalid by the provisions of section 3537 of the Civil Code (Civil Code 1910, § 4117), unless it is made to appear that neither of the parties contemplated an actual delivery of the goods, and that it was the intention of both that there should be no actual delivery, but that on the day fixed for delivery there should be a settlement of their differences, based on the market value of the goods on that day. In that event the transaction would be a pure speculation upon chances, but not otherwise. When a contract is valid upon its face, or, when taken in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time it was entered into, appears to be valid, it is incumbent on him who attacks the contract to show its invalidity." Counsel for both sides in this case seem to recognize that this is the rule. The point involved in the present case is whether the illegality of the contract can be shown by extrinsic evidence which contradicts the recitals appearing on the face of the written contract itself. It is well settled, as a general rule, that "when a contract appears to have been reduced to writing, before parol evidence can be admitted to show a collateral agreement, it must appear, either from the contract itself or from the attendant circumstances, that the contract is incomplete, and that what is sought to be shown as a collateral agreement does not in any way conflict with or contradict what is contained in the writing." This quotation is taken from the sixth headnote in the case just cited.

[1] While this is the general rule, there are certain exceptions. In Williston's Wald's Pollock on Contracts (3d Ed.) 492, one of the exceptions is stated thus: "Extrinsic evidence is always admissible to show that the object or consideration of an agreement is in fact illegal. This is an elementary rule, established by decisions both at law and in equity." Before we proceed further, let us notice the suggestion that since the general rule on this subject is laid down as one of the propositions in the Forsyth Manufacturing Company Case, cited above, and since in that case the contention was made that the contract was void because speculative, the conclusion follows that the court intended to hold that, where a contract for the sale of cotton was apparently valid on its face, parol evidence would be inadmissible to show that the actual agreement between the parties was one of a gaming nature; but an inspection of the decision in that case discloses that this rule of law was invoked, not in resistance to any effort to set up the illegality of the contract, but in an effort to engraft upon it as a legal contract another term in no wise affecting it with immorality or illegality, namely, that the cotton which was to be delivered should be procured from a certain specified source.

[2] Our reports are full of cases laying down and enforcing the general rule that unambiguous written contracts must speak for themselves, and that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict, vary, or add to them. Still the exception which allows the admission of extrinsic and even parol evidence to show that the object or consideration of the agreement was in fact illegal has been as uniformly recognized. For instance, in Henderson v. Thompson, 52 Ga. 149, 152, the court laid down and most vigorously enforced the general rule; but it is also said in that case: "The exception to the rule is where the real contract is forbidden by law, and the parties have reduced to writing a contract legal on its face. In such cases public policy suspends the rule and allows the truth to be proven, in spite of and in con-tradition to the writing." Of. Faircloth v. De Leon, 81 Ga. 158, 7 S. E. 640; Baggett v. Trulock, 77 Ga. 369 (2) 3 S. E. 162; Lytle v. Scottish Am. Co., 122 Ga. 458, (1), (7), 467, 50 S. E. 402. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Irwin v. Willmar, 110 U. S. 499, 4 Sup. Ct. 160, 28 L. Ed. 225, 229, in which there was a similar plea as to an apparently legal contract for the delivery of grain, said: "If, however, at the time of entering into a contract for the sale of personal property for future delivery, it be contemplated by both parties that at the time fixed for delivery the purchaser shall merely receive or pay the difference between the contract and the market price, the transaction is a wager, and nothing more. It makes no difference that a bet or wager is made to assume the form of a contract. Gambling is none the less such because it is carried on in the form or guise of legitimate trade." In Stewart v. Schall, 65 Md. 299, 4 Atl. 399, 57 Am. Rep. 327 a similar ruling was made, and the admissibility of extrinsic evidence to show the illegality of a contract which was lawful in form was recognized. Cf. Pearce v. Foote, 113 Ill. 228, 55 Am. Rep. 414. This court, in Luke v. Livingston, 9 Ga. App. —, 70 S. E. 596, recognized the right to introduce parol evidence to show the invalidity of a similar contract which we held to be valid on its face.

It is easy to see that if two persons desired to speculate upon the cotton market, and to put their transaction in such shape that the winner could enforce his contract by suit against the loser, all they would have to do, if any other rule than the one here announced were followed, would be to draw a written contract similar in form to the one here involved; for, unless the illegal purpose of the apparently legal contract could be shown by parol, the result would be that the aid of court could be successfully invoked to effectuate the unlawful purpose, as the only judgment which the court then could render would have the effect of causing the loser to pay to the winner just what it was contemplated he should pay under the very plan and purpose of the illegal transaction. Now, formalism and technicality are very important to the successful and orderly administration of justice in any juridic system; but there is too much plain common sense stored away in the substructure upon which our whole system is based to allow of any such result as that parties may take advantage of formal or technical rules designed for the carrying out of the law, and divert them into instrumentalities by which they may violate the very cardinals of the law itself. In nearly every case where ingenuity seeks to evade the law under cover of the law itself, it finds itself flanked by some rule or exception by which the major purpose of the law protects itself. It is a good thing that the wisdom of the ages, which has thus become crystallized and expressed in our law, is capable of proving superior to the transient ingenuity of such individuals as from time to time rise up to proclaim that they have found a way to get around the law.

Of course, these strictures are not intended as comment upon the facts of the particular case. The present transaction may be perfectly legal. That question has not yet come under investigation, as the court struck the plea and admitted no testimony in support of it. As Chief Justice Bleckley said in Faircloth v. De Leon, 81 Ga. 158, 161, 7 S. E. 640, as to a stricken plea which sought to set up the illegality of a somewhat similar attempt to evade one of the criminal laws of this state: "The plea may not be true; but, if true, it is quite sufficient."

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 224*)—ILLEGAL SALE—DEFENSES.

On the trial of one charged with the violation of a city ordinance in having on hand intoxicating liquor for the purpose of illegal sale, evidence that he received money from another person, accompanied with a request to secure whiskey for the latter, and that shortly thereafter the accused delivered a bottle of whiskey to that person, would cast upon him the burden of showing where, how, and from whom he got the whiskey; and this burden is not successfully carried simply by the statement of the accused that he had no interest in the whiskey, but had secured it from another person. *Bray v. When a petition sets forth specific allegations of negligence, but also includes a general allegation of negligence, the specific will be considered as amplification of the general, and the plaintiff's right of recovery depends upon the establishment of negligence on one or more of the specific particulars alleged. Palmer Brick Co. v. DISORDERLY CONDUCT (§§ 1, 11)—PROVOCATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code 1910, § 387, for using opprobrious words and abusive language, the sufficiency of the provocation which will justify the use of such words is a matter exclusively for the jury. The jury cannot be instructed as a matter of law that, if one simply said "howdy" to the defendant this would not be sufficient justification for the defendant to use opprobrious words and abusive language. Whether this would be sufficient provocation would depend on the manner of the salutation and the surrounding circumstances. There may be justifiable provocation where no words have been spoken. The sufficiency of the provocation depends, not only upon the language employed, but upon the relationship of the parties, the state of feeling existing between them, the tone, manner, and spirit in which the language is used, and other circumstances from which the jury may in some instances determine that words apparently or ordinarily innocent afforded reasonable cause for provocation under the circumstances or in the manner in which they were used. The question is so exclusively one of fact that any intimation or direction to the jury as to the weight or effect of any portion of the testimony illustrative of the subject of provocation is error.

A "squatter" may be defined to be a person who settles or locates on land, inclosed or uninclosed, with no bona fide claim or color of title and without the consent of the owner. Pen. Code 1910, § 216, subd. 4; Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, vol. 7, p. 6619.

2. TRESPASS (§ 79*)—CRIMINAL TRESPASS—EVIDENCE.

An indictment charged that the accused "did then and there unlawfully and with force and arms squat and settle and remain on the inclosed lands" of a person named, describing the same, with no bona fide claim of title therein and without the consent of the owner therein named. The undisputed evidence in support of this allegation shows that the accused walked up to a window of a dwelling house on the land in question, looked in the window for a second, and then crawled under the house, where he remained for a few minutes. When he came from under the house, he was pursued and caught by the owner. Held, that the evidence is insufficient to support the allegation that the accused was guilty of an act of trespass in squatting or settling upon the land, and a conviction was unauthorized.

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 47*)—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

A petition which shows that the defendant swore out against the plaintiff a criminal warrant charging him with an offense against the laws of this state, though the offense was described only by giving one of the constituent elements by which it is commonly designated, and that the defendant followed up this prosecution by going before the grand jury of the county and preferring an indictment for the same offense, in which the alleged crime was fully and distinctly set forth, and that the grand jury returned a "no bill," and that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause, sets forth a valid cause of action for malicious prosecution.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 102*)—JURISDICTION—SUPERIOR COURTS—CITY COURTS.

The fact that the act creating a city court provides that all persons charged before magistrates of the county with misdemeanors shall be bound over to the city court for trial does not divest the superior court of jurisdiction in such cases, or deprive the grand jury impaneled at the superior court of the right to investigate an indictment preferred for a misdemeanor, for which a warrant had previously been sworn out before one of the magistrates in the county.

Error from City Court of Sylvester; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

Action by Louis Pye against W. D. Gillis and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Claude Payton, for plaintiff in error. Tip-ton & Passmore, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. Pye sued Mr. and Mrs. Gillis for malicious prosecution. The petition alleged that for an improper purpose, set forth, Mr. Gillis procured his wife to go before a magistrate and without probable cause and maliciously to swear out a warrant charging him with the offense of being drunk at her (Mrs. Gillis') residence, and that a warrant was issued charging him with this, as a misdemeanor, and that he was arrested; that no commitment trial took place, but that shortly subsequently Mrs. Gillis, accompanied by her husband, went before the grand jury, impaneled in the superior court, and preferred an indictment charging him with the same offense, upon which the grand jury returned a "no bill." This sets out enough of the petition for an understanding of the points we are called upon to decide in the case. The court below sustained general demurrer to the petition, and the plaintiff has excepted.

[1] The ground on which the action of the trial court in sustaining the general demurrer was based (so we are informed in the argument) was that the affidavit sworn out by Mrs. Gillis and the warrant based thereon charged no offense against the laws of this state, and was therefore void, and that the acts set forth did not constitute a prosecution. The rule is well settled that an action for malicious prosecution cannot be based upon proceedings which show upon their face that they are void. If the prosecution is by affidavit and warrant, these papers should charge some offense. In the present case the affidavit under which the warrant issued charges that "Louis Pye did commit the offense of drunkenness at the residence of Elizabeth Gillis, in the town of Sylvester, in the county of Worth," on a named day. The warrant commanding the arrest of the defendant recited that the affidavit had been made by Mrs. Gillis, charging Louis Pye with "the offense of a misdemeanor—drunkenness at her residence in Sylvester, Georgia." For a criminal warrant to be valid as process, it is not necessary that the offense charged therein should be stated with that definiteness or certainty which is required in an indictment or accusation. Except in prosecutions for larceny, where certain additional facts are to be stated, the offense may be charged in the affidavit and in the warrant in general terms. See Penal Code 1910, §§ 904-906. It has been held that even a failure to allege these additional particulars in an affidavit to secure a warrant for larceny is not fatal. "It seems to be the settled law of this state that an affidavit need do no more than name the offense, without describing the way in which it was committed, or its character, with any degree of particularity." Brown v. State, 109 Ga. 570, 572, 34 S. E. 1031, 1032. For affidavits in which very meager or general descriptions of the offenses charged were given, but which were held to be valid, see Dickson v. State, 62 Ga. 583; Brown v. State, 109 Ga. 570, 34 S. E. 1031; Glass v. State, 119 Ga. 299, 46 S. E. 435; Murphy v. State, 119 Ga. 300, 46 S. E. 450; Howell v. State, 5 Ga. App. 186, 62 S. E. 1000. In Williams v. State, 107 Ga. 693, 33 S. E. 641, an affidavit which charged the accused only with "the offense of committing a misdemeanor" at a certain time and in a certain county was held to be sufficient. It is true that if the accusation and warrant go into details in describing the offense, and disclose that the thing charged was not an offense at all, or fail to name some constituent element of an offense, the warrant does not constitute valid process, nor authorize an arrest thereunder. Alexander v. West, 6 Ga. App. 72, 64 S. E. 288; Satilla Mfg. Co. v. Cason, 98 Ga. 14, 25 S. E. 909, 58 Am. St. Rep. 287.

The affidavit in the present case did name a constituent element of the offense set forth in Penal Code 1910, § 442, and described that offense in language by which it is commonly known. That section of the penal Code provides that "if any person shall be and appear in an intoxicated condition on any public street or highway, or within the curtilage of any private residence not in the exclusive possession of the person or persons so intoxicated," etc., he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. It is true that this section provides, also, that the drunkenness must be made manifest by boisterousness, or by indecent conduct, or by vulgar language, or by loud and violent discourse; but these things are made evidentiary characteristics of the offense, rather than constituent elements of it, within the meaning of that term as it is employed in the case of Satilla Mfg. Co. v. Cason, supra. Considering the fact that it is alleged in the petition that the plaintiff in the present case had been charged in the affidavit and in the warrant with one of the constituent elements by which the offense is commonly known, and that the defendants followed this up by going before the grand jury of the county and preferring an indictment which fully complied with the law as to specifcness and definiteness, we think that a criminal prosecution was abundantly shown; and as malice and lack of probable cause are asserted, as well as the fact that the prosecution had terminated by the return of a "no bill" by the grand jury, we have no hesitancy in holding that the petition set forth a valid cause of action.

[2] 2. It was necessary for the plaintiff to show in his petition that the prosecution had terminated, and for this purpose he alleged the return of the "no bill" by the grand jury of the county. Defendant's contention is that, while the allegation of the return of a "no bill" would ordinarily be sufficient, it is not so in the present instance, because under the act creating the city court of Sylvester, the magistrates by whom criminal warrants are issued for misdemeanors are required to bind the offenders over to the city court for trial, and not to the superior court. This makes no difference. The superior court has concurrent jurisdiction with all other courts as to the trial of misdemeanors, and no direction given in a special law requiring that magistrates shall commit solely to another court can affect its jurisdiction. Until some other court has tried the case and disposed of it, the grand jury sitting in the superior court has full authority to take up the matter, and to dispose of it by return of a true bill or a "no bill," as the case may be. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 103*)—VALIDITY—FRAUD.

Where one has been induced to sign a written contract by false and fraudulent representations as to its contents, made by the opposite party with intent to deceive and which did deceive him, he may set up this fraud as a defense to a suit on notes based upon the contract thus obtained; and this is especially true where, in addition to the false and fraudulent representations as to the contents of the contract, the conduct and representations of the party who made them relieve the opposite party from the imputation of negligence in signing the contract without first reading it. *Wood v. The ruling above announced does not contravene the well-established rule that parol evidence will not be admitted to add to, take from, or vary the terms of a valid written agreement; for the purpose of the parol evidence admissible under the ruling is to disprove the existence of the contract, and not to contradict it.

Action by C. M. Leitner against S. F. Cooper. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

White & Lovett, for plaintiff in error. M. K. Overstreet, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Leitner sued Cooper for the price of a dog. The state of facts appearing in the record is about as follows: Cooper ran a hotel at Sylvania, and on January 30, 1910, mailed to Leitner, at Egypt, a letter in the following language: "I understand you have a good bird dog for sale. I want to buy one. I have been sick several months, and my physician says I must get in the woods and stay there, so thought I would hunt awhile, as I am an old bird hunter and like the sport. Please write me what you will take for the dog. Send him to me by baggage master on Central of Georgia at my expense. Let me try him a day or two, and if he is all right I will send you check for him by return mail; if he is not all right, I will return him to you in good order. We have more scraps to throw away around the hotel than 20 dogs can eat." When Leitner received the letter he had a dog, which he priced at $35, and after a few days (about five days would seem to be about what the time probably was from certain correspondence appearing in the record) he shipped the dog to Cooper's address by express, over the Brinson Railroad, stating that he did not think it was safe to trust the dog to the baggage master on the Central of Georgia, as he had been directed. Before the dog arrived, Cooper, not hearing from Leitner, decided to go to North Georgia to visit his parents, but in the meantime left word with the conductor of the Sylvania & Girard Railroad, if the baggage master of the Central brought the dog in, to look after him and to take charge of him. When the dog came by express, in the absence of Cooper, his wife receipted for the shipment, and, to quote literally from Cooper's testimony in the record, "she tied him up at the hotel, which we ran, and he howled so much that she took him out for a walk for some exercise, and he got away." The wife telephoned about to various places trying to find the dog, and also advertised for him in the official gazette of the county; but the dog was never heard of again, unless a dog of somewhat similar appearance, which was killed some distance away a few days later was the same dog. Cooper conceded that his wife had authority to sign for express packages, and that he was bound by her act in that respect. The jury found for the defendant.

The plaintiff concedes that he violated the defendant's instructions in sending the dog by express, instead of sending it by the baggage master, but says that inasmuch as the defendant's wife receipted for the dog from the express company, and had authority as his agent to receipt for packages from the express company, the defendant waived this violation of instruction, and became bound, according to the terms of the letter, either to return the dog or to pay its value. We cannot concede the correctness of this proposition. The defendant had made arrangements with another agent (his friend, who was a conductor on the Sylvania & Girard Railroad) to take care of the dog if it arrived during his absence. He had not, so far as the record shows, constituted his wife his agent to take care of the dog. He had the right to select his agent for this purpose, and when the plaintiff, by his disregard of instructions, placed the custody of the dog in the hands of the wife, she held it as a mere gratuitous bailee, and the defendant was not bound, under his original contract, either to pay for the dog or to return it, but, if bound at all, was bound only to exercise that degree of care which is imposed by law upon gratuitous bailees. The jury was amply authorized to find that the plaintiff's disregard of the defendant's instructions was so material an element in the case as to relieve the defendant from liability for the loss of the dog, under the circumstances. There is no complaint that the judge did not fairly submit all these issues to the jury. There is an exception in the record as to the refusal of the court to sustain certain special demurrers to a portion of the defendant's plea; but, in view of the shape that the case finally took upon the proof, the points there made are not material or important, and, if decided favorably to the plaintiff in error, would not justify a reversal.

Judgment affirmed.

DEAN v. STATE. (No. 3,298.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 24, 1911.
Rehearing Denied June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 110*)—REQUISITES OF ACCUSATION—FOLLOWING LANGUAGE OF STATUTES.

The indictment described the offense in the language of the Code, and with sufficient additional particularity to fully identify the transaction wherein the accused was alleged to have violated the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 289-294; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

2. EXTORTION (§ 13*)—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment for extortion is sufficient, when it designates the office held by the accused, and states that, by color of his office and in his official capacity, he unlawfully took from a named person a specified sum of money, which was not due him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extortion, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. EXECUTION (§ 127*)—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY—"LEVY."

To constitute a "levy," there must be an actual or constructive seizure of property. The property must be so far brought under the subsection of the officer that he can exercise control, and does assume to exercise dominion, of it by virtue of his writ. The mere declaration by an officer of an intent to seize property does not constitute a levy. The officer must do some act for which he could be successfully prosecuted as a trespasser, if it were not for protection afforded him by the writ.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4101-4106; vol. 8, p. 7705.]

4. EXTORTION (§ 15*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence authorized the conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extortion, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. EXTORTION (§ 7*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—EXECUTION OF LEGAL PAPER.

Under Pen. Code 1910, § 302, providing that "extortion" shall consist of any public officer unlawfully taking by color of his office from any person any money or thing of value that is not due him, or more than is due, an officer who uses his office to exact money not due him may be guilty of extortion, though he does not pretend to be executing any process, nor does he extort money upon promise not to execute.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

J. W. Dean was convicted of extortion. From a judgment overruling a petition for certiorari, he excepts. Affirmed.

Thos. B. Brown, for plaintiff in error.
Lowry Arnold, Sol., H. M. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., and Eb. T. Williams, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of extortion. A petition for certiorari, sued out to review the judgment of guilty, was overruled, and he excepts to the latter judgment.

[1] 1. The defendant demurred to the indictment upon the grounds: (1) It set out no particular act or conduct of the defendant. (2) It does not set forth whether the defendant was executing, or pretended to execute, some legal or purported legal paper under the color of his office. (3) It does not describe the offense of extortion with sufficient certainty to put the defendant on notice as to what he must defend. (4) It does not allege any particular act on the part of the defendant in the discharge of his duty under color of his office, in which he demanded, exacted, or took more than was due him, or before it was due him, or whether it was taken as costs, or any other pretended legal purpose coupled with the discharge of his duties as constable. We think this demurrer was properly overruled. Extortion, as defined by the Code, "shall consist of any public officer unlawfully taking by color of his office from any person any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or more than is due." Penal Code 1910, § 302. Under Penal Code 1910, § 954, "every indictment or accusation of the grand jury shall be deemed sufficiently technical and correct which states the offense in the terms and language of this Code, or so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury." Under our system of criminal pleading, in order that the nature of the offense may be plainly understood by the jury, it is generally sufficient if the offense is stated in the language of the Code; but there are exceptions to this rule, as we pointed out in Soell v. State, 4 Ga. App. 337, 61 S. E. 514. At least so far as the rights of the defendant are concerned, the real requisite of a valid indictment, so far as its form is concerned, is that the offense with which the accused is charged shall be so stated as to give him ample opportunity to prepare for his defense. The definition of extortion, as contained in the Code, is extremely simple, and in passing upon the demurrer it is only necessary to inquire whether the case is one which falls under the general rule, where the language of the Code is sufficient to inform the defendant of the nature of the charge against him, and of the transaction in which he is alleged to have violated the law, or whether it comes within the exception, where there must be an amplified statement of details of the transaction, so as not to deprive the defendant of the substantial right of being informed of the nature of the charge against him, and of having an opportunity to defend against it. The indictment described the offense in the language of the Code, and with sufficient additional particularity to fully identify the transaction wherein the accused was alleged to have violated the law.

[5] It is alleged that "the said J. W. Dean, in the county aforesaid, on the 23d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1910, with force and arms, being then and there a lawful constable in and for the 1,422d district, G. M., of Fulton county, Ga., did, by color of his office as such constable, unlawfully take $3.80 in money from Mrs. W. G. Overby, which was not due him, said money of the value of $3.80, and the property of Mrs. W. G. Overby." The sum and substance of the objections contained in all the grounds of the demurrer, except the second, comes to the point that the defendant was not told in what particular respect, or what particular transaction, he was violating the law. The second ground alleges the indictment to be defective, because it is not alleged whether the defendant was executing, or pretending to execute, some legal or pretendedly legal paper under color of his office. Under the Code definition of extortion, if an officer by color of his office (which means using his office as a means to effect his object) obtains money or other thing of value which is not due him, the offense is committed, whether he was executing a legal paper, or even if he was not pretending to execute any paper at all. Under the Code section, one who is an officer and clothed with authority, who uses his office to exact money that is not due him, or more than is due him, may be guilty of extortion, although he may not pretend to be executing any process, and he may be guilty if he extorts such money upon promise not to execute. As to the first, third, and fourth grounds of the demurrer, the office the defendant held is alleged in the indictment, and it is alleged that by color of his office he collected from Mrs. W. G. Overby, upon a given date, a certain sum of money specified in the indictment. The indictment is in the language of the Code, and in this particular instance that language is sufficient to make clear to the jury the nature of the offense charged and the transaction involved.

[2] 2. The definition of extortion is such that the language of the Code is sufficient as the basis of the indictment, provided the facts of the particular transaction are set out, so as to protect the accused from being again put in jeopardy for the same transaction. An indictment for extortion is sufficient when it designates the office held by the accused and states that by color of his office and in his official capacity he unlawfully took a specified sum of money, which was not due him, from a named person.

[3] 3. It is insisted that the conviction of the defendant was unauthorized, because the evidence is undisputed that a levy of the laborer's lien was made upon the property of Mrs. Overby, and that the overplus of the amount actually due by her was returned as soon as the amount could be ascertained. According to the evidence of the prosecuting witness, there was no levy, but merely a threat to levy; and upon the verdict as rendered the testimony of the state upon this subject must be accepted as the truth. According to the testimony of Mrs. Overby, no levy was made; but she was threatened with a levy in pursuance of a laborer's lien, and was informed that she could not give bond. To constitute a levy there must be an actual or constructive seizure of property. The property must have been so far brought under the subjection of the officer that he can exercise control, and does assume to exercise dominion, of it by virtue of his writ. The mere declaration by an officer of an intent to seize property does not constitute a levy. The officer must do some act for which he could be successfully prosecuted as a trespasser, if it were not for the protection afforded him by the writ.

[4] 4. The evidence authorized the verdict of guilty. It is true there was evidence on the part of the defendant that he did not collect the money, that he did not say anything to Mrs. Overby at all, and that he was merely present with one Hopkins, who was the officer in charge of the fl. fa.; but, on the other hand, as disclosed by the answer, Mrs. Overby swore that the defendant was the person who made the threat of the levy and insisted upon the demand of the money, and the person to whom she paid the money. This raises a distinct issue of fact. The credibility of witnesses is so exclusively within the province of the jury that this court has no jurisdiction to set aside the finding in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

HOLTON v. STATE. (No. 3,329.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The numerous exceptions to excerpts from the charge of the court are without merit. The charge is a fair, full, clear, and correct presentation of the law applicable to the issues made by the evidence, and is not justly subject to adverse criticism.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 938*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial should have been granted on the ground of newly discovered testimony. The statutory requirements in support of his ground were fully complied with. The proposed evidence is not merely cumulative and impeaching in character, and is vitally material to the defense, and, if believed by the jury, would probably lead to a different result.

Powell, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; Frank Park, Judge.

Howard Holton was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Reversed.

Davis & Merry, Spence & Bennet, Roscoe Luke, and E. E. Cox, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., F. A. Hooper, J. H. Tipton, and H. C. Dasher, Jr., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Howard Holton was indicted for murder, and was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter. His motion for a new trial being overruled, the case is here for review.

[1] The amended motion for a new trial contains exceptions to numerous excerpts from the charge of the court. It is unnecessary to discuss each one of these exceptions, for we have made a careful examination of them in connection with the evidence and the entire charge, and we find no error in any of them. We have rarely read instructions that more clearly, fairly, and fully presented all the issues, and have read none less vulnerable to attack. The exceptions to the rulings relating to testimony are also without merit, and a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter was demanded, under several viewpoints of the evidence. The complaint made in the motion that, after the jury had been charged with the case, three of them separated from their fellows, who continued a consideration of the case while they were absent, in the light of the counter showing made by the state, is unsupported, and clearly not entitled to serious consideration. Indeed, from a very careful consideration of the very voluminous record, we are satisfied that the trial was conducted in all respects without error, and the verdict, under the evidence presented and the law applicable thereto, is fully authorized.

[2] We have concluded, however, that the plaintiff in error is entitled to another trial on the ground of alleged newly discovered evidence. A brief statement of the evidence adduced at the trial, in connection with that which is alleged to be newly discovered, will, we think, clearly show the correctness of this conclusion. The evidence preceding the homicide and up to its actual occurrence is not in conflict. The decedent and the accused, who had been friends, were together at the barber shop of the former. Both men were under the influence of intoxicants. While in this condition they began to throw nickels in the game of crack-a-loo. The decedent won repeatedly, whereupon the accused made some insinuations against the fairness of his play. This was resented by the decedent, who denounced the implication as a "damned lie." The accused thereupon threw his hand in the direction of his hip pocket, and the decedent met this motion by taking a pistol from behind the mirror near his barber chair. The accused relieved the tension of the situation thus produced by an invitation to drink, which invitation was declined by the decedent on the ground that the accused had insulted him by the accusation made as to the fairness of his play. The decedent replaced his pistol behind the mirror, and the accused left the shop, and was absent for about 35 or 40 minutes. He returned to the shop, and, on entering, immediately referred to the differences between the decedent and himself, and intimated to the decedent that he would not repeat outside of the shop what he had said, and invited him to go out into the rear of the shop. The decedent accepted the invitation. The accused held the back door open for him to pass out, and they both went outside.

The evidence as to what occurred on the outside is in conflict. The witnesses for the state testified that the decedent went out with his hands in his pocket, apparently making no demonstration to draw a weapon of any sort; that immediately after the door was closed they heard the voices of the two men angrily recurring to the incident of the game of crack-a-loo, the accused repeating the insinuation of unfairness in the play by the decedent, and the decedent denouncing the insinuation as a "damned lie," and that this verbal dispute was followed immediately by five shots in rapid succession. The decedent, upon being shot, turned and endeavored to retrace his steps, and in a few seconds fell to the ground. The accused ran away from the scene. Several persons rushed to the scene of the shooting, and found the decedent lying on the ground in the article of death. Near his left hand was found a medium size unopened pocket knife. It may be stated here that there is some contention in the evidence as to whether this pocket knife belonged to the decedent, and as to whether it was in his possession when he was shot; it being claimed by the prosecution that he had no knife in his possession, except a little pearl-handled knife which was found by the undertaker in his vest pocket, and that the knife found had been placed on the ground by friends of the accused, several of them testifying that they made an unsuccessful search for a knife immediately after the killing. The theory set up by the accused is that the knife was the property of the decedent, and they endeavored to account for the fact of its being closed by the insistence that the decedent, after he was shot, either himself closed the knife, voluntarily or involuntarily, or that some of his friends closed it after he had been shot.

There is evidence on both sides of this contention, and the jury were authorized to believe, even from the state's evidence, that the knife was in fact the knife of the decedent. There is no evidence to authorize the inference that it was either closed by the decedent after he was shot, or had been found open and closed by one of his friends; the only rational theory on this point being that the decedent had succeeded in taking his knife from his pocket, and before he had opened the blade one of the shots from the pistol of the accused struck the bone of his right arm near the elbow, and the shock thereby produced caused the fingers to unclasp and the knife to fall to the ground. The testimony for the state fails to disclose the attitude of either man at the exact moment of the homicide. The last seen of the two men by these witnesses was when they were going outside and the decedent then had his hands in his pockets, and the accused had not then drawn his pistol, and the last words heard by them was the angry conversation between the two, followed immediately by a rapid succession of shots, five in number. The decedent was hit three times, twice in the breast, the balls going through his body, one through his heart, and once in the elbow of his right arm. The other two bullets are not accounted for.

The accused introduced two witnesses to the conduct of the two men at the exact time of the homicide. These two witnesses concur in the testimony that the decedent was advancing on the accused with an open knife; that the accused was backing from him, and warning him not to come on him with the knife, but that he continued to advance, when the accused drew his pistol and shot him. One of these witnesses was a servant of the accused, and had been in his employment for over three years, and ran away with the accused from the scene of the homicide. The other witness was a negro boy related to the first witness, who gave literally the same account. This latter witness was impeached by proof of contradictory statements. The accused, in his statement to the jury, after giving an account of the preliminary incidents, substantially as related in the testimony in reference to the crack-a-loo game and the angry discussion that arose relating thereto, stated that he returned to the barber shop after this dispute for the purpose of getting a half pint of whisky to carry home with him; that he asked the decedent for the whisky, and the decedent went to the rear end of his store and got the half pint, and he paid him for it, and the decedent then asked him to take a drink out of a quart bottle he got out of his desk; that after taking the drink he went to the rear of the shop to get a drink of water; that when he went to the rear end of the shop the decedent came back and renewed the dispute in reference to the crack-a-loo game, referring to the insinuation the accused had made against him that he had taken his money away from him; that the decedent, while talking to him, was standing near the door with his open knife cutting on the side of the door; that the decedent then said to him: "Howard, you are a God damn littler man than I thought you were, to get mad about a nickel," and I said, 'I ain't mad, Jim Bob, but you know you got all the money,' and he said, 'You are a God damn lie,' and I said, 'Jim Bob, don't call me a God damn lie,' and he repeated the epithet, and I said, 'You are another one,' and he then started to me with his knife open in a drawn position and said, 'Take it back.' He was nearly in reaching distance of me, and I began to back off as fast as I could, and I said, 'Jim Bob, don't come on me with that knife,' and he kept coming, and I shot twice to stop him, and stumbled over something, and he continued to rush at me, trying to cut me, when I shot two or three more times as fast as I could, trying to stop him, and when the pistol quit firing, I ran off."

The statement of the accused and the testimony of his two witnesses are in accord, and, if true, would make a case of self-defense. The jury, however, disregarded both the statement and the corroborative evidence, and accepted the theory of mutual combat as one of the theories arising from a consideration of the state's evidence. This is, in substance, the material evidence both for the state and the defense. While the evidence for the state authorized the verdict, it did not demand it. It was shown that the decedent had his hand in his pocket when he left the shop and went into the rear yard, and it is also shown that he did in fact have a knife. The evidence for the state is silent as to what he was endeavoring to do with the knife, or was apparently endeavoring to do with it, when he was shot; but the direction of the shots show that he was facing the accused, and the rapidity with which he was shot would warrant the inference that the accused felt the pressure of some emergency. As before intimated, it is clear that the shot which struck the arm of the decedent produced a shock which caused the hand to open spasmodically and the knife to drop. This is the theory of the physician, and it is the most rational theory. The shot evidently struck the arm before the decedent had time to open the knife. It does not appear what was the number of this shot. The writer of this opinion is not prepared to hold as a matter of law that a person who sees another advancing on him with a knife in his hand is compelled to wait until the blade is open before he would be authorized to defend himself. It would depend entirely upon the circumstances that appeared to the person at the time he acted—the distance between the two, whether there was an apparent effort to open the blade, the size of the knife, and the character of the assailant. In other words, even from the evidence in behalf of the prosecution the theory of self-defense is not entirely excluded as a rational hypothesis.

Now, in this situation let us briefly set out the testimony alleged to be newly discovered, in order that we may determine whether it is material, and, if credited on a second trial, would probably lead to a different result. It may be stated that the statutory requirements as to preliminary proof in support of this ground of the motion are fully complied with. Ignorance on the part of the accused and his counsel of the existence of this evidence alleged to be newly discovered and inability with reasonable diligence to have discovered and to have produced it at the trial, and the credible character of the witnesses who are relied upon to give the evidence, are all set out in support of this ground of the motion. The affidavits of two white men, farmers living near the town, are presented. The affiants swear that, just shortly before the homicide, they went to the shop of Jim Bob Cochran, the decedent, for the purpose of buying some whisky from him; that on reaching the shop they saw him standing in the door with a pistol in his hand; that they asked him what he was doing with the pistol, and he replied, "I came near killing Howard Holton a minute ago, and am sorry that I did not do it;" that they asked him what was the matter and he said, "I won a few nickels from him in a crack-a-loo game, and he got mad." One of the affiants then admonished him that that would not do, and he said: "If Howard is so God damn little as to get mad about a few nickels, somebody ought to kill him, and if he ever says anything else to me about it I will cut his throat." One of the affiants then expressed the hope that there would not be any trouble, and Cochran said: "I am not going to have any trouble. I will just cut his throat and pay for it."

The persons who make this affidavit are accredited by 16 citizens of the county as men of good character and worthy of belief, who frequently visit the town of Camilla and are well known to them. It will be seen that this testimony is in no sense cumulative. It certainly would be competent and admissible for the purpose of showing the quo animo of the decedent just before the homicide, and would be material, and would strengthen the defense relied upon. It would also strongly corroborate, not only the testimony of the two negro witnesses, who were not believed by the jury on the trial (because they were impeached both by contradictory statements and by the fact that one of them was the servant of the accused and the other related to that servant), but would also strongly corroborate the statement of the accused as to what did occur at the time of the shooting.

Another affidavit produced in support of this ground of the motion was made by one who stated therein that he witnessed the shooting; that he was in a grocery store near the barber shop of the decedent, and heard some one say, "Don't come on me with that knife;" and that, looking to his left, he saw, about 20 feet away, Jim Bob Cochran advancing on Howard Holton with an open knife in his hand, and saw Holton back off some distance, and Cochran going on him with his arm drawn as if attempting to cut him, and then saw Holton shoot Cochran and run off, and then saw Cochran turn and walk back towards his barber shop and fall on his face.

This testimony would be of vital importance to the defense, and, if the jury believed it to be the truth of the transaction, it would probably cause a different result on a retrial, especially when considered in connection with the other alleged newly discovered testimony just considered, and also in connection with the testimony of the two witnesses for the defense and with the defendant's statement, being strongly corroborative of both. It is in a sense cumulative; that is, it is additional evidence to support the same facts which were set out on the trial. The rule is well established—indeed, it is the language of the statute of this state—that new trials should not be granted for evidence merely cumulative in character. The adverb "merely," in the statute and in the decisions, as qualifying the character of the evidence, is significant. We apprehend that, if the newly discovered testimony as to some facts was that of a witness who was entitled to credit as against the testimony to the same point given by witnesses on the trial who were not entitled to credit, or who had been impeached, the testimony would not be merely cumulative; for the additional fact of the character of the newly discovered witness would take it out of that category, at least to some extent, and it is easy to imagine cases in which a fact, although testified to by many witnesses on the previous trial, while not believed because of the character of the witnesses who testified to its existence, yet might be believed without hesitation, if, on a second trial, it was testified to by only one witness of unquestioned and unimpeached veracity.

The state made a counter showing as to the alleged testimony of this proposed witness. Affidavits are produced which attack the general character of the proposed witness, and affidavits are produced tending to show that he was not present and did not witness the difficulty, as he swears. But this affiant's character is sustained by a half dozen citizens of the county, who swear that his character is good and that he is worthy of belief, and that he worked in the store near the barber shop of Jim Bob Cochran, the decedent. The weight of the testimony of this proposed witness would therefore be an issue to be determined by the jury. They would be authorized to believe him worthy of credit. And in view of the character of the defendant's witnesses who testified to what occurred at the time of the killing, and the very reasonable hypothesis that they were not worthy of credit because of their relationship to the accused, we think he is entitled to have the question of this proposed witness' veracity passed upon by a jury, because the proposed testimony is so vital to his rights under the law.

We are perfectly aware that courts are very reluctant to grant a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, and of the well-settled rule that applications of this kind are necessarily directed largely to the discretion of the trial court, and great weight should be given to the judgment of that court with reference to them, and we thoroughly concur in the opinion universally expressed by courts as to the suspicious and unreliable character of applications for new trial on this ground. Public policy demands that when a case has once been fairly and fully tried, and a reasonable opportunity afforded both parties to present all their evidence, it should remain forever at repose. There are cases, however, in which great injustice might result if a party should be denied the benefit of newly discovered evidence. No fixed standard can be established for the measurement of every case, and no iron-bound, inflexible rule supplied; but each case must be governed by the circumstances surrounding it. After all has been said and written on the subject, it seems to us that the true rule is this: If the evidence is in fact newly discovered; if it is material to the rights of the party making the application, and not merely cumulative; if he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced it at the trial—justice and the law demand another trial; for, if the newly discovered testimony is in fact material, it can only be material because it would tend to strengthen the defense relied upon, and would therefore probably lead to a different result.

After giving this ground in the present case a most careful consideration we are satisfied that it measures fully up to these essentials, and that the accused is entitled under the law, as well as in furtherance of justice, to have an opportunity of presenting this new evidence which is of vital materiality to his defense; and we are strengthened in this view by the fact that, although justifiable homicide in self-defense was relied upon at the former trial, it was supported by witnesses whom the jury were fully authorized to discredit, because of their character and relationship to the accused. Solely for the reasons above discussed, we are constrained to reverse the judgment of the lower court in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

POWELL, J. (dissenting). I regret that I cannot agree with my colleagues as to a reversal because of the newly discovered evidence. Personally my sympathies nearly always go out to the defendants in criminal cases, and they go out to this defendant; but as a judge I do not believe that I can honestly say that the trial judge misjudged the importance of the alleged newly discovered testimony and abused his discretion in refusing a new trial. I am very reluctant to grant new trials for newly discovered evidence, unless it be of considerable importance.

DAVIS v. STATE (No. 3,862.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEDICATION (§ 5*)—HIGHWAYS (§§ 21, 18, 1*)—ESTABLISHMENT OF HIGHWAY—LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENT—STATUTORY PROCEEDINGS—PRESCRIPTION—ACCEPTANCE OF DEDICATION.

The fact that a road is a public highway may be proved (1) by showing that it was made such by legislative enactment; (2) that it was regularly laid out and established as such by the proper authorities; (3) by showing dedication by the owner of the soil and acceptance by the public for the purpose of a highway; (4) by prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. § 5;* Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 37, 25, 1; Dec. Dig. §§ 21, 18, 1.*]

2. DEDICATION (§ 37*)—ACCEPTANCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the fact of dedication and acceptance is relied on to show that land used as a road is a public highway, the dedication as well as the acceptance may be either express or implied. If the owner of the soil, either by direct language or by express conduct (such conduct as opening up the property as a public street), offers to dedicate it, the element of acceptance is supplied whenever the property is used for such a length of time that the public accommodation or private rights would be materially affected by an interruption of the enjoyment. Where the dedication is implied only, or where it rests upon mere acquiescence of such a nature as to indicate consent, the public use and keeping up of the road as a highway must continue for as long as seven years before the road becomes a legally established public highway.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 73-74; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

3. HIGHWAYS (§ 6*)—ESTABLISHMENT—PRESCRIPTION.

A prescription may be gained as to a public highway, against the consent of the owner, by the public use and working of the same as such for the period of 20 years, or, if the public use and occupancy be under color of written title, within 7 years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

4. HIGHWAYS (§ 6*)—ESTABLISHMENT—PRESCRIPTION—CONTINUITY OF OCCUPATION.

Where prescription is relied on to establish a highway, alleged to have been acquired contrary to the consent of the owner, the element of continuity is involved, and the public use of the highway must exist continuously throughout the period specified in the preceding headnote. However, there is such privity between the municipal authorities of an incorporated town and the county authorities of the county in which the town is situated as that the public occupancy of the one may be tacked to the public occupancy of the other, in order to make out a prescription, where the continuity is not otherwise broken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

5. DRUNKARDS (§ 11*)—EVIDENCE—PLACE OF OFFENSE.

Where drunkenness on a highway is charged, it is permissible for the state to show that the accused was acting disorderly, and in a manner indicative of insobriety upon places adjacent to the highway, at or about the same time it is alleged that he was drunk upon the highway.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. DRUNKARDS (§ 11*)—CRIMINAL DRUNKENNESS—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—EXISTENCE OF HIGHWAY.

The offense of being drunk on a public highway being strictly statutory, it is necessary for the state to show, not merely that the accused was drunk on some road or passageway over which the public might more or less pass, but that the road was at the time a public highway within the legal meaning of the term.

Error from City Court of Sparta; R. W. Moore, Judge.

Newsome Davis was convicted of being drunk on a public highway, and brings error. Affirmed.

Burwell & Fleming and R. H. Lewis, for plaintiff in error. R. L. Merritt, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. [8] The accused was convicted of being drunk on a public highway. The offense is strictly statutory, and it is necessary in the prosecution thereof for the state to show, not merely that the accused was drunk upon some road or passageway over which the public might more or less frequently pass, but that the road was, at the time of the offense, a public highway, within the legal meaning of the term. Johnson v. State, 1 Ga. App. 195, 58 S. E. 265.

[1] A public highway may be created in either of four ways: (1) By legislative enactment; (2) by its being regularly laid and established as such by the proper authorities; (3) by dedication; (4) by prescription. In the present case it was conceded that there was no proof that the road in question had been established as a public highway by legislative enactment, or through its having been laid out by proper authorities. Dedication and prescription were relied upon. A witness who had lived in the community about 35 years testified that the road had been there practically as long as he had; that it had been publicly used for more than 20 years; that when the town of Culverton was incorporated, the municipal authorities worked it; and that when Culverton was not incorporated and after its charter had been repealed, the county worked it and kept it up. The point is made that the road was not registered as a public road under Civil Code 1910, § 636 et seq.; but as will be seen by reference to section 639, these provisions are not applicable, except in certain counties, upon recommendation of the grand jury.

[2] 2. Where dedication is relied on, both dedication and acceptance must be shown. Healey v. Atlanta, 125 Ga. 736, 54 S. E. 749. The dedication or the acceptance may be either express or implied. If the dedication is express, as where the owner of the soil grants the property to the public use, or where he himself lays it out as a street and devotes it to public use, and the same is so used for such a length of time that the public accommodation or private rights would be materially affected by an interruption of the enjoyment, dedication and acceptance become complete, even though the period be less than seven years. Civil Code 1910, § 4171. If the dedication is implicit only, as where the consent of the owner to the use of his land as a highway is implied from his conscious acquiescence, the public use and enjoyment must exist for as long as seven years before dedication and acceptance become complete. Johnson v. State, supra, citing Healey v. Atlanta, supra. The title of the public, so to speak, to the use and occupation of the road in cases of this character, is based on a form of prescription, as that word is used at common law, but not as it is used in the Code of this state. Through our Code we have adopted acquisitive prescription to lands from the civil law, and in such cases adverseness of possession is a requisite and permissive possession cannot be the foundation thereof; but we have still retained the common-law notion of prescription as to easements and incorporeal rights, and as to this form of prescription the implied consent of the landowner is an essential element. Cf. Whelchel v. Gainesville Ry. Co., 116 Ga. 431 (5), 42 S. E. 776.

[3] 3. Through the use and occupancy of a road as a highway, in the nature of adverse possession, the public can convert the road into a public highway, without the consent, actual or implied, of the owner. "Where there is no intention to dedicate, but the public has taken possession of the property of an individual, and used and maintained it as a highway for a period of 20 years or more, a highway by prescription becomes complete." Healey v. Atlanta, supra. By analogy to our Code provisions relating to the acquisition of prescriptive title to land, the rule would seem to be that it takes 20 years of continuous use and occupancy of a public road as a highway in order to extinguish the title of the landowner and to perfect the title of the public, in cases where the use and occupancy has not been under color of title; and by the same analogy, it would seem that if some one, not the true owner, should in writing attempt to convey or to dedicate the property, continuous, bona fide, adverse use and occupation of the property under this writing for a period of 7 years would be sufficient. See Civil Code 1910, §§ 4168, 4169.

[4] 4. Continuity of use and occupancy is always an essential element of adverse possession and where an attempt is made to show that the public has acquired highway rights over land by the use, occupation, and working of it as a public road, and no consent actual or implied, of the owner is shown it is necessary to show that the use and occupancy and other acts by which the public have appropriated the property as a highway have been continuous throughout the one or the other of the periods of time (as the case may be) mentioned in the preceding division of this opinion. In this case the point is made that this continuity was broken by reason of the fact that within the period of 20 years relied on this highway had been included within the corporate limits of the town of Culverton, whereupon the county authorities ceased to work it as a public road and the municipal authorities worked it as a public street, and that thereafter, the charter of Culverton having been repealed, the county authorities again began to work it as a public road. Counsel for the plaintiff in error say, therefore, that inasmuch as the county authorities had never acquired a prescriptive title prior to the time of the incorporation of the town of Culverton, and inasmuch as 20 years has not elapsed since the charter of Culverton was repealed, 20 years' continuous possession has not been shown.

While continuity of possession is an element of adverse possession, still this element of continuity need not exist as to any one person or corporation, public or private; but all such periods of possession as are in community of interest and are not adverse to each other may be tacked. There is such a community of interest, such a privity, so to speak, between the municipal authorities of an incorporated town and the county authorities of the county in which the town is located as to such county roads as by reason of the incorporation of the town become city streets and as to such streets as, upon the repeal of the charter of the town, cease to be city streets and become county roads, as that the use and maintenance and working of the highway by the two may be tacked where the element of continuity is not otherwise lacking. It must be remembered that the duty of opening and maintaining highways is a function of the state itself, and that, when the Legislature authorizes this function to be performed by counties or municipalities, it is still the state indirectly performing a duty which it would have the right to perform directly, so that there is some analogy between the successive acts of use and occupation performed as to a highway by a county and a municipality and the successive occupancies of tenants of the same landlord; and, of course, as to the ordinary acquiring of title by adverse possession no break of continuity ensues when one tenant moves out and another tenant of the same landlord moves in. We think that in the present case there was ample evidence to show that the road in question was a public highway in the legal sense of the word.

[5] 5. The court permitted the state's counsel to show that on the day in question the accused was cursing, fighting, and otherwise acting disorderly upon private premises adjacent to the highway, and counsel for the accused moved to exclude this testimony on the ground that the charge was drunkenness upon the highway, and that these acts elsewhere committed were not relevant. We cannot concede the correctness of this contention. One of the issues was whether the defendant was drunk or not. Indeed he admitted that he had been drinking somewhat, but contended that he was not drunk. We think that the light shed upon the transaction by this testimony as to what he did at other places about the time when he appeared on the highway showed, not only that he was drinking somewhat, but that he was "gloriously and hilariously" drunk, and, what is more important that he was "cussingly and fightingly drunk." He acted as no sober man would have been at all likely to have acted.

Judgment affirmed.

GRAY v. OGLESBY. (No. 2,970.)

BILLS AND NOTES (§§ 489, 475, 473, 497*)—ACTION ON NOTE—INDORSEMENT—PLEA OF NON EST FACTUM—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the plaintiff sues as the transferee of a note, and then shows in evidence the note with the transfer regularly written thereon, he does not have the burden of proving the execution of the indorsement, unless the defendant has filed a plea of non est factum as to the indorsement. A plea that the transfer was fraudulently made is not equivalent to a plea of non est factum. The title of the holder of the note cannot be inquired into, except for the purpose of letting in defenses. It is permissible for the defendant to plead defenses to the note, and to plead in addition thereto that the title of the holder of the note was not taken in good faith. But in such cases, where the holder appears to have taken the note by regular transfer before its maturity, the burden is upon the defendant to establish not only his defense, but also the bad faith attendant upon the plaintiff's taking the title.

Error from City Court of Nashville; W. D. Buile, Judge.

Action by Z. W. Oglesby against J. P. Gray. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. P. Knight, for plaintiff in error. Branch & Snow, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Oglesby sued Gray upon a promissory note. The note was originally payable to Oglesby & Cozine, alleged to be a partnership composed of Z. W. Oglesby, Jr., and John W. Cozine; but on the back was an indorsement in their name transferring the note to Z. W. Oglesby, the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed to be a bona fide holder for value. The defendant set up that there had been a failure of consideration, and that the note had been fraudulently transferred for the purpose of cutting off his defense, and that, while Z. W. Oglesby was nominally the holder, it was really owned by Oglesby & Cozine, or by Z. W. Oglesby, Jr. Upon the trial of the case, the plaintiff introduced the note in evidence, and the transfer referred to was on the back of it. The defendant attempted to prove that Z. W. Oglesby, Jr., had acted as if he were the owner of the note, after the date of the alleged transfer, by reason of his having undertaken certain negotiations in reference thereto, as if he were the owner. The court excluded this testimony, and no further evidence was introduced by either party. The court then directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the principal and interest.

The plaintiff in error, the defendant in the court below, insists that the judge should not have directed the verdict, but should have submitted to the jury the question as to whether Oglesby, Sr., was the owner of the note, or whether it belonged to the firm of Oglesby & Cozine; that, as the plaintiff alleged that he was the transferee of the note in good faith and for a valuable consideration, he did not make out his case, in the absence of affirmative evidence on this subject. In the brief of counsel it was also contended that the court should not have directed the verdict, because there was an issue as to the liability of the defendant for attorney's fees; but, as the court eliminated the attorney's fees in his direction of the verdict, this point is not well taken. "The title of the holder of a note cannot be inquired into, unless it is necessary for the protection of the defendant, or to let in the defense which he seeks to make." Civil Code 1910, § 4290. "An indorsement or assignment of any bill, bond, or note, when the same is sued on by the indorsee, need not be proved unless denied on oath." Civil Code 1910, § 4299.

In this case the defendant did not deny the execution of the indorsement or transfer on the back of the note, but set up that it was an invalid indorsement, because fraudulently made. Section 4299, quoted above, has reference to cases where a formal plea of non est factum is filed as to an indorsement; hence the plea in the present case was inadequate to put the plaintiff to proof of the execution of the transfer. When the note containing the indorsement or transfer was introduced in evidence, its factum appeared with legal sufficiency. The defendant's plea, however, was not without legal purport. It set up a defense good against the original payee, and then set up the fact that the plaintiff's title to the note was infected with bad faith. Hence to take the plea as setting up the truth of the case would make section 4290, supra, applicable. But under such a plea the burden is on the defendant, not merely to impeach the bona fides of the plaintiff's title to the note, but also to establish his defense. In this case, even if we concede that the evidence which was excluded would have tended to affect the bona fides of the plaintiff's title to the note, there was no evidence offered as to the other essential thing, namely, that the defendant had a defense to the note. With the evidence in this shape, there was nothing left for the court to do but to direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. STATE. (No. 3,236.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 255*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

The evidence, though conflicting, authorized the verdict rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§§ 218, 221*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS—DETERMINATION AS TO ADMISSIBILITY—EFFECT.

The admissibility of dying declarations is only prima facie a question for the court. After testimony as to the statements of the deceased is admitted, it is for the jury to determine whether they were in fact made by him when he was in the article of death and when conscious of his condition, so as to make them dying declarations. Even when the jury is satisfied that the statements attributed to the deceased were made by him, and that he was at that time in a dying condition and conscious of that fact, they should still be received with great care and weighed with caution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 458, 459, 463, 464; Dec. Dig. §§ 218, 221.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§§ 205, 207, 203*)—EVIDENCE—"DYING DECLARATIONS"—SENSE OF IMPENDING DEATH.

The admissibility of dying statements attributed to a deceased person is not affected by the fact that the statements may have been elicited in response to questions put to him by a bystander; nor does it matter how or by what means the deceased becomes conscious that he is dying, provided he is really conscious of that fact and impressed with the solemnity of his situation. The circumstances under which one mortally wounded might be apprised of his dying condition, as well as the fact that he made his statements in response to questions, or under other circumstances, may affect the credibility of the alleged statements; and the jury, in the light of the facts and in the exercise of the caution required by law, would have the right to accept them as true, or to reject them as unworthy of credit, because they might be considered due to outside influence, or because made in a spirit of revenge, or because made under such circumstances that the declarant was either unable to state the facts or unwilling to do so.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1092*)—NEW TRIAL—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—STRIKING OUT GROUND OF MOTION.

Error from Superior Court, Oglethorpe County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

John Smith was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

E. P. Shull and Joel Cloud, for plaintiff in error. Thos. J. Brown, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. [1] 1. The plaintiff in error was indicted for the offense of murder and found guilty of voluntary manslaughter. The evidence in his behalf would have fully justified the jury in acquitting him; but, on the other hand, the evidence on the part of the state, if it was more credible to the jury, fully authorized the result which was reached. A very large number of witnesses testified on each side of the issue; but the testimony of each witness accorded in the main with that of all of his fellows on the same side, and was in conflict with the testimony of all the witnesses in behalf of the opposite party. The case is that of a killing where a large gathering was assembled, and where one set of witnesses saw the transaction in one light, and another testified to an entirely different state of facts. It was for the jury to resolve the conflict.

[2] 2. The only assignment of error which really presents anything for our consideration is that which relates to the admissibility of certain statements of the deceased admitted as dying declarations. It appears that Jim Morris, the deceased, was an employé of the prosecuting witness, Lee Calloway. It is argued that in consequence of this relationship Calloway exercised a great, if not a controlling, influence over the deceased, and that, as Calloway told the deceased that he was going to die before the latter made the alleged dying declarations, and as they were elicited by Calloway's questions, they should have been excluded from the consideration of the jury. An additional objection to the testimony was that a proper foundation for its admission was not laid prior to its introduction. Calloway's testimony was very brief. He said: "I knew Jim Morris. I saw him after he was dead. He lived on my place. I saw him about 9 o'clock at night. He died some time during the night. He told about the difficulty between him and John Smith, when he got shot. I think he knew he was going to die. I told him I thought he was going to die. He said he thought so too. I told him I would like for him to tell me exactly what occurred there. I went down there as soon as I got my supper. He was not in pain then. He was lying on the bed, breathing very hard. He didn't discuss his death. He said he was dancing on the head, and John Smith came on and took his place, and that July asked him if he was shooting at him. He said, 'No,' and Jim asked him if he was shooting at him, and he took out his pistol and shot him. He told me that from the first. He was very thin then. I suppose he was about 5 feet 11. I suppose he would weigh about 145 pounds. I first told him I thought he was going to die, and told him to tell me what occurred."

Under this testimony we think the statements attributed to the deceased were prima facie admissible as dying declarations. "Dying declarations, made by any person in the article of death, who is conscious of his condition, as to the cause of his death and the person who killed him, are admissible in evidence in a prosecution for the homicide." Penal Code 1910, § 1028. The admissibility of dying declarations is only prima facie a question for the court. After the testimony as to the statements of the deceased is admitted, it is for the jury to determine whether they were in fact made by him when he was in the article of death and when conscious of his condition, so as to make them dying declarations. Even when the jury is satisfied that the statements attributed to the deceased were made by him, and that he was at that time in a dying condition and conscious of that fact, they should still be received with great care and weighed with caution.

In the present case the objection to the testimony, if any, should have been addressed to the jury, instead of to the court, and placed upon the ground that the circumstances under which the statements were made were such as to rob them of that sanctity which is equivalent to the administration of an oath. Three things must be shown to render statements admissible as dying declarations within the meaning of the law: (1) That the deceased made the statements; (2) that he was in a dying condition; and (3) that he was conscious of that fact. The existence of the two latter requisites should be ascertained and determined before any inquiry is made into the nature of the statements themselves; but in this case the witness was permitted to testify, and then a motion was made to exclude the testimony as a whole. Addressing ourselves as the trial judge had to do, to the question as to whether Jim Morris was in a dying condition and conscious of that fact, it must be remembered that both of these facts are susceptible of proof by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence. That he was in a dying condition might be determined in the first instance by the court, and subsequently by the jury, from the fact that Calloway talked with him about 9 o'clock at night, and that he was dead before daylight; and likewise it was inferable from the statements of the deceased that he, too, thought that he was going to die and that he was conscious of his condition. We do not say that the fact that the deceased stated he thought he was going to die necessarily compelled a conclusion on the part of the jury that he really believed he was going to die, but certainly the judge, in determining as to the admissibility of the testimony, could not adjudge that the deceased falsely stated this opinion.

[3] 3. So far as the admissibility of this testimony is concerned, the fact that Calloway told Jim Morris that it was his opinion that Morris was going to die, before Morris expressed any opinion upon that subject, is without any legal significance, though this circumstance might detract from the weight the jury might give to the statement attributed to Morris. If the jury thought that the declarant's statement that he, too, thought he was going to die was for any reason untrue, they would, of course, reject all statements made by him upon the ground that, it not being shown that the deceased was really conscious that he was going to die, the sanctity of an oath could not be dispensed with. On the other hand, if satisfied that the witness really thought and believed that he was soon to die, the jury could consider the statements as being in the nature of a dying declaration, but could still test the credibility of the statements by other circumstances, similar to those which might affect the credibility of any witness. Were the statements of the deceased, even though he was dying and conscious of that fact, influenced by the controlling mind of another, or colored by the character of the questions put to him, or actuated by revenge, or unreliable because of physical or mental weakness, or because of ignorance as to facts which he purported to relate? The admissibility of a dying declaration is one thing; the weight to be attached to it another and entirely different thing. The admissibility of such evidence is an exception to the general rule. Its admissibility is to be twice tested—first by the court, and finally by the jury. Ordinarily the court alone tests the admissibility of testimony, and the jury is only to say whether it believes or disbelieves such testimony as the court submits to it. Dying declarations, however, belong to that class of testimony which, even after the court has held it to be prima facie admissible, it is still within the power of the jury to disregard. The reason lies in the fact that, if there is any evidence that the deceased was at the time of his statement in a dying condition and conscious of that fact, not only should the credibility of the statement be submitted to the jury, but also the issue as to whether it was in fact a dying declaration; and not only is it within the power of the jury to discredit the statements attributed to the deceased, even if convinced that they were made under circumstances which the law holds to be equivalent to the sanctity of an oath, but the jury may find, upon a review of all the facts and circumstances, that at the time the statements were made the deceased was not in a dying condition, and that, even if he was in a dying condition, he was not conscious of that fact. So much as to the admissibility of dying declarations.

Even, however, if the jury in any case should find it to be its duty to consider the dying declarations as a part of the testimony in the case, they should be received with the utmost caution. It is to be borne in mind that the author of this testimony is not subject to cross-examination; that, like all other human beings, he is subject to the influence of passion and revenge; that his physical condition may militate against a clear statement of what actually occurred; or that he may be giving expression rather to his opinion as to what occurred than to facts actually resting in his knowledge. The only point made in the assignment of error of which we are now treating is as to the admissibility of the testimony, and as to this we think the views we have expressed are amply supported by previous rulings in this state. In Dumas v. State, 62 Ga. 59, it was held: "That declarations, offered in evidence as dying declarations, were made under the belief that the wound was mortal and death impending, may be inferred from the nature of the wound and other circumstances, though nothing direct was said respecting death or danger. The court must judge of the preliminary evidence in the first instance, and, deeming it prima facie sufficient, should admit the declarations to the jury, instructing the jury afterwards to pass finally for themselves on the question whether or not the declarations were conscious utterances in the apprehension and immediate prospect of death." To the same effect are the rulings in Young v. State, 114 Ga. 849, 40 S. E. 1000, and Bush v. State, 109 Ga. 126, 34 S. E. 298, as well as in numerous other cases which might be cited. The ruling in Robinson v. State, 180 Ga. 362, 60 S. E. 1005, which is cited by learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, has no application to the point raised in the present record. In that case the error of the trial judge consisted in charging that, when a man is conscious that he is dying or about to die, and has received a mortal wound from which of necessity he must die, the law presumes that statements made by him in view of approaching death are true. Of course, this charge was disapproved, and it is manifest error for the reason, to which we have already adverted, that the jury must determine, with great caution, whether the statements of the deceased are true, even after they have found that they are dying declarations.

[4] 4. It is stated by counsel for plaintiff in error in their brief that there was incorporated in the motion for a new trial a ground in which it was alleged that the judge erred in failing to instruct the jury as to the law governing the consideration of dying declarations. It is stated that this ground of the motion was stricken by the presiding judge, and we are referred to the charge of the court as embodied in the record as evidence of the fact that this objection to the charge is well sustained. Nothing is better settled than that this court cannot consider an exception which is not approved by the trial judge.

[5] If there was in fact such a ground of the motion for a new trial, it should not have been stricken by the judge. It should either have been approved and certified to be true, or disapproved as untrue. This is the proper practice, for the reason that the motion for new trial is the handiwork and property of the movant, and, though its value may be entirely dependent upon the approval of the trial judge, his only duty is to disapprove statements of fact which are untrue, and approve those which are true, either unqualifiedly or with such qualifications as will make the truth apparent. We have said this much in regard to the matter only because we know that the upright judge who presided at this trial is incapable of doing any one an injustice, and yet, as our attention has been several times directed to similar instances in other cases, we have thought it best to use this occasion to call the attention of our brethren of the trial bench to a practice more proper than that which has sometimes prevailed even without criticism. As was held in Denton v. State, 6 Ga. App. 3, 63 S. E. 1182, it is the duty of the judge to point out distinctly to the jury that they should observe caution in the use of dying declarations, and failure to do this is ground for a new trial. However, the exception that the verdict is contrary to law is not sufficient to present the point.

Judgment affirmed.

POFFENBARGER, J. Melvin Harris, convicted of unlawful shooting, complains of the verdict principally on the ground of the disqualification of one of the jurors, by reason of his relationship to the wife of the prosecuting witness. The juror was examined as to his qualification and denied relationship, but it was ascertained, after verdict and before judgment, that it existed. Numerous affidavits were taken in support of the motion for a new trial, tending strongly to prove that he was not ignorant of the disqualifying fact. His affidavit, still protesting his ignorance thereof, was filed in resistance of the motion. Rulings of the court on certain instructions are also complained of.

The general rule applicable to motions for new trials, based upon disqualification of jurors, is stated by Judge Snyder in Flesher v. Hale, 22 W. Va. 44, as follows: "The verdict will not be set aside for objections to jurors on grounds which existed before they were sworn, unless it is made to appear that, by reason of the existence of such grounds, the party objecting has suffered wrong or injustice." This has been applied in cases in which jurors would have been excluded because of their having made up and expressed opinions as to the guilt or innocence of prisoners had they admitted the fact on their voir dire examinations. State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 456; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158, 31 Am. Rep. 757; State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 800; State v. Howes, 28 W. Va. 110; State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 15 S. E. 982, 18 L. R. A. 224. It was also applied in one case in which a juror was disqualified by relationship, a fact not known to the prisoner before the trial, denied by the juror on his examination, and afterwards discovered. State v. Williams, 14 W. Va. 851. A like application of the general rule has been made by some courts of other states. State v. Congdon, 14 R. I. 458; Traviss v. Commonwealth, 106 Pa. 597.

Relationship is a common-law disqualification, and the principle upon which it stands is very similar to that under which persons interested on one side or the other of a controversy are excluded. Its natural tendency and effect is to create bias and partiality in favor of the related party, and it is a maxim of the law that triers of questions of fact must be impartial and unbiased. For this reason, relatives to parties to trials are not permitted to act as jurors. On the same principle, the Constitutions and statutes of some states prohibit them from sitting as judges to ascertain and apply the law to the facts, a matter as to which errors are correctible by appeal. It is a personal disqualification, based upon the most harmful and insidious element conceivable. "Blood is thicker than water;" and it is utterly impossible for any person to determine how far the judgment or action of a person affected by it may be swayed or controlled. It operates upon the mind and heart of the individual secretly and silently. Its operation is not disclosed by any outward manifestation other than the result. It is utterly impossible to look into a man's mind and see its operation. Its effect is not general, like many other disqualifications. It is purely personal, operating between the related parties and to the prejudice of all others. In this respect it is wholly unlike many other disqualifications, relating to the character and standing of the juror, such as age, lack of citizenship, residence, or property qualifications. A man disqualified in any of these particulars may nevertheless be intellectually and morally as suitable and desirable as any other man not so affected. But one who has an interest in the subject-matter of the litigation or is related to one of the parties is palpably and wholly unfit for service as a juror. His disqualification is particular, not general, and extends into the litigation itself. For these reasons, it seems to me it ought to be excepted from the general rule, and in some states it is sufficient to set aside a verdict, if unknown to a prisoner who has not waived it by lack of diligence. Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 574, 59 S. E. 311; State v. Williams, 9 Houst. (Del.) 508, 18 Atl. 949; Hudspeth v. Herston, 64 Ind. 133; Pearcy v. Ins. Co., 111 Ind. 59, 12 N. E. 98, 60 Am. Rep. 673; Coal Co. v. Persons, 11 Ind. App. 264, 39 N. E. 214; Gardner v. Arnett (Ky.) 50 S. W. 840; Tarpey v. Madsen, 28 Utah, 294, 73 Pac. 411; Bailey v. McCauley, 13 A. & E. 815; Jewell

v. Jewell, 84 Me. 304, 24 Atl. 858, 18 L. R. A. 473; Cameron v. Railway Co., 32 Ont. 24. In State v. Williams, 9 Houst. (Del.) 508, 18 Atl. 949, the court said: "By the common law (and we have no statute on the subject) any one related by blood or marriage, as remotely as the ninth degree even, to a party in a trial, is subject to challenge propter affectum—that is, on account of the likelihood or suspicion of bias or prejudice—and no evidence to the contrary will be heard. The fact constitutes disqualification. It is evident, therefore, that an impartial trial, in contemplation of law in civil cases, cannot be had where such kinship exists, nor by the Constitution in criminal cases, treating the victim as in the light of a party." A valuable note to Jewell v. Jewell, 18 L. R. A. 473, shows the distinction here insisted upon has been made in many courts. The annotator says: "The want of purely statutory qualifications, such as citizenship, age, property, etc., which do not go to make up the necessary qualities to enable a juror to perform his duty with intelligence and impartiality, have never been treated with the same strictness as objections for bias, criminality, and like causes." He then cites a long list of cases to sustain this obviously reasonable and just proposition.

In classing disqualification on account of relationship and interest with others, this court has never at any time discussed their peculiarity in respect to nature and character. In State v. Williams, 14 W. Va. 851, the court followed State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 456, involving a disqualification of an entirely different kind, without any inquiry whatever as to whether the rule ought to be the same in the two classes of cases. Moreover, the assignment of error based upon it in that case was disposed of in a single short paragraph. Its summary disposition may be due to the fact that a new trial was granted upon other grounds; wherefore it was unnecessary to give the assignment extensive and careful consideration. In Traviss v. Commonwealth, 106 Pa. 597, in which relief was denied on account of relationship of a juror, the facts were peculiar and entirely different from those disclosed by this record. It was made clear that the juror did not know of the relationship for several days after the verdict, and had never seen the murdered woman or heard of her. That made it extremely improbable that the relationship had in any way influenced his conduct on the jury. The burden was recognized as having rested on the state to show no injury and as having been discharged by the facts disclosed. In State v. Congdon, 14 R. I. 458, the court said: "We do not think we ought to grant a new trial simply on account of the relationship, in view of the fact that the relationship was so remote, and that the juror himself swears that he was ignorant of it and is corroborated in so swearing, without some more counter evidence than we have, and without some better reason than we have for thinking that the prisoner suffered an actual injury from the presence of the juror on the panel." Here also the court rested its decision upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, and treated the state as being subject to the burden of proof. There are very few instances of the denial of relief on this ground that are not disposed of in a similar manner. I think, therefore, that the great weight of authority marks and recognizes the distinction I have mentioned.

Under the general rule, relief is denied unless the applicant for a new trial can show injury or injustice resulting from the irregularity. What amounts to injustice or injury in such a case, and how can it be shown? Under general principles of law, an undue advantage of one of the parties over the other in a trial, acquired in any way, other than by the negligence, waiver, agreement, or fault of the complaining party, has always been regarded as an intolerable injustice, and as constituting sufficient ground for the vacation of judgments and setting aside of verdicts. Disqualification in a juror from lack of citizenship, statutory age, ownership of property, and the like does not naturally give such an advantage, and there is therefore good reason for requiring something more of the applicant in such cases. Until more is shown, no injustice appears. But, when the disqualification arises from interest or relationship, the injustice is apparent on the face of the record, and nothing more should be required. This is a disqualification that obviously goes into the very trial of the case and in nature and reason operates prejudicially. When that appears, the burden should be upon the opposite party to show, as in the cases of Traviss v. Commonwealth and State v. Congdon, circumstances which negative the probability of injury. That is the rule applied by this court in cases of misconduct on the part of a jury, a thing naturally calculated to work prejudice and injury. Misconduct on the part of a jury presumptively vitiates the verdict. State v. Cotts, 49 W. Va. 615, 39 S. E. 605, 55 L. R. A. 176; State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 15 S. E. 982, 18 L. R. A. 224; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799; State v. Cartright, 20 W. Va. 32. It does not seem to me that there can be the shadow of a doubt that misconduct of a jury in the trial of a case and disqualification by reason of interest or relationship naturally stand upon the same ground, and ought to be governed by the same rule. Prima facie, each amounts to injustice in the trial, and, if there is any difference, the rule ought to be the more strict in cases of such disqualification. Irregular conduct on the part of a juror does not on its face naturally import advantage to either party. It is entirely consistent with an altogether different hypothesis, but disqualification of the kind here considered naturally imports an advantage to the related party. To require any further evidence of injury is to ask that which universal law makes impossible. No court will permit jurors by their own testimony to impeach their verdict. Their testimony will be received as to facts and circumstances, bearing upon the inquiry as to the effect of misconduct, but not as to whether the inculpat- ing facts had any influence or effect upon their conclusion. To this rule there is scarcely any exception. Pickens v. Boom Co., 58 W. Va. 11, 50 S. E. 872; Graham v. Bank, 45 W. Va. 701, 32 S. E. 245; State v. Cobbs, 40 W. Va. 718, 22 S. E. 310; State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 15 S. E. 982, 18 L. R. A. 224; Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. 21, 5 L. R. A. 523; Probst v. Braeunlich, 24 W. Va. 856; State v. Cartright, 20 W. Va. 32; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799. It is sometimes said a verdict will not be set aside for disqualification of a juror, if, upon an examination of the record, no erroneous ruling of the court or insufficiency of the evidence can be discovered. I do not know that this court has ever assigned such a reason for refusing a new trial for such cause. Injustice or injury from erroneous rulings of the trial court stands upon an entirely different basis. It has no connection in law or reason with injury resulting from a biased juror. This alone condemns the application of any such a test, but a still better reason can be given for not applying it. The question submitted to the jury is one of fact, and the verdict cannot be disturbed in the absence of errors of law. It is unalterable and irrevocable. In this respect it differs vitally from findings as to law. Errors of the latter kind are always correctible by appeal. To give a litigant an unfair jury is therefore ruinous to him. The jury may find either way in a case of conflicting evidence, and there is no possible relief from its decision, if the trial court has not erred as to the law. Hence it is clear that mere sufficiency of evidence to sustain a verdict constitutes no reason for saying injustice or injury has not been done. An unbiased juror might have found the other way and his verdict become unalterable and conclusive. The litigant has a legal right in such cases to the deliberation and determination of an impartial and unbiased juror, and not only of one such juror, nor 11, but 12 men of that class. To deprive him of the legal right to an unbiased and impartial finding on the evidence, which may be in his favor, is to inflict upon him injustice of the rankest kind, if he has not in some manner waived the departure from the legal course of procedure. Some courts say the question of a new trial for such cause is addressed to the discretion of the trial court. So we say of every application for a new trial, but never that it is made to an arbitrary discretion. That discretion is a sound reviewable discretion, and the exercise thereof is set aside, when it conflicts with law.

For these reasons, I would reverse the judgment and grant a new trial. The evidence submitted upon the motion makes it almost certain that the juror in question knew he was related by affinity to the prosecuting witness. There was no lack of diligence on the part of the prisoner. This juror was tested upon his voir dire as to his qualification, and denied the relationship. Not a thing in the evidence indicates that the prisoner knew or had any reason to suspect the disqualifying fact until after the verdict had been rendered against him. A majority of the court, however, are unwilling to grant a new trial. They say the case falls under the general rule, and are unwilling to distinguish between disqualification by relationship and the ordinary statutory disqualifications. This puts on the prisoner the burden of showing that he was injured, and they are of the opinion that he has not shown it.

Though nothing is said in the argument for the prisoner about the rulings upon instructions, we have examined them, and find no error therein. They are in perfect harmony with principles often declared by this court. The conclusion of defendant's instruction No. 5, saying, "If the jury from the evidence have any doubt as to the guilt of the accused, then evidence of his good reputation for peace and good order may be allowed to resolve the doubt in his favor and work his acquittal." The court modified this by striking out the words "and work his acquittal." This modification did not materially alter the instruction nor deprive it of any of its force or effect. "To resolve the doubt in his favor" means the same thing as "work his acquittal." We cannot reverse a trial court for a mere change of the phraseology of an instruction, which does not alter its meaning.

For these reasons, the judgment will be affirmed.

POFFENBARGER, J., dissents.

BRANNON, J. Four of the five judges of this court decline to set aside the verdict because of the relationship of a juror to a witness for the state. The juror was a second cousin to the wife of the witness. It is against public policy to frustrate criminal trials, unless substantial harm to the accused appears. It brings criminal proceedings into derision. I would justify our action by a rule long established in Virginia and this state. It is given in State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 15 S. E. 982, 18 L. R. A. 224. Older cases there cited will show how far back the rule runs. "A new trial will not be granted in a criminal case for matter that is a principal cause of challenge to a juror, which existed before he was elected and sworn as a juror, but which was unknown to the prisoner until after the verdict, and which could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence, unless it appear from the whole case that the prisoner suffered injustice from the fact that such juror served in the case. In determining this the court should look only to the evidence touching such cause of challenge; not to the evidence on the trial as to the prisoner's guilt." We cannot ignore this rule so long followed, and so essential to the efficacy of criminal procedure. It is not made to appear that the accused suffered from the presence of the juror on the jury, unless we can deduce it from the fact of such relationship, and we cannot. If in any case the accused cannot prove harm, it is his misfortune. There stand the verdict and judgment, and error must be made to appear.

JESSIE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

June 13, 1911.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 414*)—CORROBORATION.

Where, on cross-examination of a witness who had identified accused as the guilty party, the defense offered the stenographic report of his testimony given before the coroner on the day after the killing, in which he was alleged to have stated that the man who killed deceased did not show his face and that the witness could not identify him, the state was entitled to introduce in corroboration declarations of the witness to the police immediately after the murder that defendant killed deceased, which statement was corroborated by four policemen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1287, 1288; Dec. Dig. § 414.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

An instruction that a statement coming from any witness that the jury believe to be true is reliable testimony was not prejudicial to accused, when read in connection with other instructions requiring that every material fact bearing on accused's guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1992-1995; Dec. Dig. § 823.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, there was no evidence to implicate any other person than accused in the crime, the court properly refused an abstractly correct instruction that the failure of the evidence to disclose any other criminal agent than accused was not a circumstance to be considered in determining whether he was guilty of the crime charged, but that he was presumed to be innocent until his guilt was established, and he was not to be prejudiced by the inability of the commonwealth to point any other criminal agency, nor was he called on to vindicate his own innocence by naming the guilty party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1979-1987; Dec. Dig. § 814.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 721½*)—TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF ATTORNEY.

In a prosecution for murder, argument of the commonwealth's attorney, from the fact that accused's housekeeper, who had testified before the coroner, was absent from the state during the trial and had been induced to leave the state by accused, and that it was a fair inference that her evidence would have been detrimental to him, in the absence of any evidence on which to base such imputation, was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1673; Dec. Dig. § 721½.*]

Error to Corporation Court of City of Roanoke.

John H. Jessie was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Reversed.

Price & Kyle, P. H. Dillard, and E. S. Kines, for plaintiff in error. Samuel W. Williams, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, J. Plaintiff in error, John H. Jessie, was indicted in the corporation court of the city of Roanoke for the murder of David F. Marshall, and upon his trial was found guilty of murder in the second degree and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for the term of 12 years. The case is before us upon a writ of error to that judgment.

The accused was the proprietor of a lodging house in Roanoke, known as the "Tip Top Hotel," on the ground floor of which building Tate's barroom was located. On the night of October 11, 1910, Marshall Angell and David F. Marshall, the deceased, both of whom had been drinking heavily, met in Tate's barroom, and were engaged in conversation, when Jessie, the accused, came in and joined in the conversation. Marshall invited his companions to drink with him, which they did, and on demand by the bartender of pay for the liquor, after searching his pockets he remarked that he had no money, and the bartender took possession of his eyeglasses. Jessie paid for his own drink.

Angell had lodged in the Tip Top Hotel the night before, and had engaged a room for the night in question. About 15 minutes to 10 o'clock, he left the barroom to go to his lodging room, and was followed by Marshall. He was assigned to a room on the second floor, which contained a bed and sofa and was lighted by a small electric light. Angell was an old man and a cripple, and walked with a crutch and cane. He was the only eyewitness to the homicide, his version of which is as follows:

He says that, when he and the deceased went into his room, he put his crutch under the bed, and was sitting on the side of the bed untying his shoes, preparatory to retiring, when a man entered the room and said to Marshall, "You are in here bothering these women (alluding to a white woman and a negro woman employed by Jessie about the establishment); you have no money, and you are fixing to rob this old man." Angell remarked, "No; I haven't a cent." But the man nevertheless set upon Marshall and commenced "striking him, knocking him down on the floor, and, while down, kicked him several times, and stamped him, and struck him with his fist. Marshall tried to get up, got about half way up, and he knocked him down and kicked him some more. He then picked him up by the leg and arm and threw him down on the sofa and marched out of the room." Thereupon Angell called in the police, who upon examination discovered that Marshall was dead.

[1] Angell identified the accused as the guilty party, and on cross-examination the stenographic report of his testimony, given before the coroner the day after the killing, was introduced, in which he is alleged to have stated that the man who killed Marshall did not let him see his face, and he could not identify him. The newspapers also published an interview with Jessie, in which he was represented as saying that Angell might have been the man who committed the murder. But on re-examination Angell testified that on the night of the homicide he told the police that Jessie killed Marshall, and his statement was corroborated by the sergeant of police and three policemen.

The refusal of the court to exclude these statements of Angell to the police, and their substantiating evidence, constitutes the first assignment of error.

It is unquestionably the general rule that declarations of a witness made out of court are not admissible evidence for the purpose of corroborating his testimony in court; the reason for the rule being that such evidence is hearsay. Oliver v. Commonwealth, 77 Va. 590; Howard v. Commonwealth, 81 Va. 488; Repass v. Richmond, 99 Va. 508, 39 S. E. 160.

In Oliver v. Commonwealth, Judge Lewis, after announcing the general rule, lays down an exception to the rule as follows: "Here the attempt by the defense was to discredit the witness by showing malice on his part, growing out of his arrest for larceny; and, to repel the attack thus made, it was competent for the prosecution to prove that, prior to his arrest, the witness gave the same account of the matter that he gave on the trial. The evidence was, therefore, not hearsay, but original; the point being, not the truth or falsity of the previous declarations out of court, but whether they had been made."

In Repass v. Richmond, Judge Buchanan, at page 515 of 99 Va., at page 163 of 39 S. E., observes: "It is a general and well-nigh universal rule that evidence of what a witness said out of court cannot be received to corroborate his testimony. * * * The only exception to this rule given by Mr. Greenleaf is that, where a design to misrepresent is charged upon the witness in consequence of his relation to the party or the cause, it may be shown that he made a similar statement before the relation existed. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 469."

So in this case it was competent for the prosecution to meet the attempt to discredit Angell by showing that he himself had been charged with the murder of Marshall, and by proving that before the assertion of that charge the witness had made the same declaration as to the guilty agent out of court that he afterwards testified to in court.

[2] The second assignment of error is to the giving of instruction No. 10, which told the jury "that the statement coming from any witness which they believe to be true, is reliable testimony."

It is not perceived how the accused could have been prejudiced by this instruction, especially when read in connection with other instructions which clearly informed the jury that every material fact bearing upon the guilt of the accused must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

[3] The third assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to give instruction No. 4, namely: "The court instructs the jury that the failure of the evidence to disclose any other criminal agent than the accused is not a circumstance which may be considered by the jury in determining whether or not he was guilty of the crime wherewith he is charged. The prisoner is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established, and he is not to be prejudiced by the inability of the commonwealth to point to any other criminal agent, nor is he called upon to vindicate his own innocence by naming the guilty person."

This instruction, as an abstract proposition, is free from objection. The rule was so declared in McBride's Case, 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. 454, and such an instruction was given by the court in McCue's Case, 103 Va. 870, 49 S. E. 623; but in both of those cases there was evidence tending to implicate some person other than the accused in the crime. In the first-named case, two other parties were indicted along with McBride. It was permissible, therefore, in those cases, to inform the jury that the accused ought not to be prejudiced by the failure of the prosecution to fix the crime on some other criminal agent. But no such element was present in this case, and the rejected instruction was, consequently, irrelevant.

[4] The fourth assignment of error takes exception to the action of the court in regard to the address of the attorney for the commonwealth to the jury. The record shows that a Mrs. Cody, who had been housekeeper for the accused and had testified before the coroner, at the time of the trial was absent from the state. The attorney for the commonwealth argued that she had been persuaded or influenced to leave the state by the accused, and hence it was a fair inference that her evidence would have been detrimental to the accused. Thereupon counsel for the defense, in reply, stated to the jury that there was no evidence before them to sustain the allegation that the accused had influenced Mrs. Cody to leave the state, and the statement of counsel that her evidence would have been detrimental to the accused was unfair, especially as she had testified before the coroner's jury, and the stenographic report of her evidence had been offered by the accused and excluded by the court. The prosecution objected to this line of argument, and requested the court to instruct the jury to disregard it, which motion the court sustained. The court, moreover, told the jury that they were to presume that its ruling in excluding the testimony of Mrs. Cody before the coroner was correct, and that they were not at liberty to consider for any purpose whatever the attempt of defendant's counsel to introduce that evidence, or to infer that it would not have been detrimental to the accused. The court also refused to instruct the jury to disregard the argument on behalf of the prosecution to the effect that Mrs. Cody "had been persuaded or influenced to leave the state by the defendant, and it was, therefore, a fair inference to infer that her evidence would have been detrimental to the defendant."

There was not a scintilla of evidence to sustain the assumption of the attorney for the commonwealth that the accused persuaded or influenced Mrs. Cody to leave the state. The accused was the only witness who testified on the subject, and on cross-examination stated that he had not seen Mrs. Cody since the coroner's inquest. Continuing, the witness said: "I had nothing whatever to do with her leaving, and, in fact, did not know she was going until several days after she left."

The argument of the commonwealth's attorney was manifestly improper in the circumstances of the case, and highly prejudicial to the accused; and the court erred in refusing his request to instruct the jury to disregard it. It is a familiar and well-settled principle of the law of evidence that, though an inference may be drawn from a fact, it cannot be drawn from a presumption. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. 54; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Heath, 103 Va. 64, 48 S. E. 508; Moore Lime Co. v. Johnson, 103 Va. 84, 48 S. E. 557; Va. Iron, Coal, etc., Co. v. Kiser, 105 Va. 705, 54 S. E. 889.

The fifth and last assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and the evidence. As the case has to be remanded for a new trial on another ground, we shall express no opinion as to the weight or sufficiency of the evidence.

The judgment must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and a new trial had, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

SEWARD v. CAMP MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. CHAMPERTY AND MAINTENANCE (§ 7*)—CHAMPERTOUS CONTRACTS—DEEDS.

A conveyance by devisees of undivided interests in real estate, previously conveyed without authority by the executor, is not champertous, where the devisees out of possession received a specified money consideration, without any agreement by the grantee to pay anything further in case he recovered the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Champerty and Maintenance, Cent. Dig. §§ 54-110; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. CHAMPERTY AND MAINTENANCE (§ 7*)—CHAMPERTOUS CONTRACTS—DEEDS.

A conveyance by devisees of undivided interests in real estate, previously conveyed without authority by the executor, is champertous, where the consideration is nominal, and the grantee, for a further consideration, agreed, in the event of his suing for and recovering the land, to pay to the devisees out of possession an additional sum, not made a charge on the land itself, but merely a personal obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Champerty and Maintenance, Cent. Dig. §§ 54-110; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. CHAMPERTY AND MAINTENANCE (§ 7*)—CHAMPERTOUS CONTRACTS—REQUISITES—"CHAMPERTY."

A contract for the purchase of real estate need not stipulate for a division in kind of the land to be recovered in order to make the contract champertous, but it is sufficient if the champertor and the party with whom he contracts are to share in the fruits of a recovery; "champerty" being a bargain with plaintiff or defendant in a suit for a portion of the land or other matters sued for, in case of a successful termination of the suit which the champertor undertakes to carry on at his own expense.

Error to Circuit Court, Brunswick County.

Ejectment by Walter M. Seward against the Camp Manufacturing Company. There was a judgment granting insufficient relief, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant assigns cross-error. Reversed and rendered.

E. R. F. Wells, for plaintiff in error. E. R. Turnbull, Jr., and E. P. Buford, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Miles B. Branch died in 1861, leaving a widow, five sons, and four daughters. In 1857 he made a will, which was admitted to probate shortly after his death, in which he bequeathed and devised to his wife, Elizabeth Branch, one-third of his estate during life, and subject to this disposition in her favor he gave to his four daughters—Ann, who married George W. Green, Rosa M. Branch, Susan E. Branch, and Mary E. Branch—all of his lands. The disposition of his personal estate is not material to this case.

The land which passed under this will contained 787½ acres, of which 286½ were set apart to his widow, and this dower tract is not involved in this litigation.

Under the will of Miles B. Branch his executor was given no power over the real estate, and had no authority to sell or dispose of it in any way; but by deed dated January 23, 1864, the executor did attempt to convey to William J. Branch, a son of Miles

B. Branch, the testator, all right and title to 521 acres which remained after setting apart the dower to the widow. This deed was admitted to record in the clerk's office of the county court of Brunswick on February 6, 1864. By deed dated October 24, 1878, William J. Branch conveyed this tract along with other parcels of land to which he had title to William J. Leake and Alexander Donnan, trustees for various purposes set forth in the deed. By deed of April 26, 1879, William J. Branch attempted to convey to Goodwyn Grain 50 acres of the above-mentioned tract, and by a subsequent deed to Sallie Penn another parcel of the said tract; and by deed of December 1, 1880, William J. Branch attempted to convey to Oscar Lewis 70 acres of the above-mentioned tract. These three last-mentioned deeds conveyed about 150 acres of the 521-acre tract, which had been devised to the four daughters of Miles B. Branch, leaving 371 acres undisposed of, except so far as affected by the deed of trust to Leake and Donnan already referred to. Grain, Penn, and Lewis entered into possession of their respective portions, and remained in adverse possession thereof thereafter, and have acquired valid title thereto by adverse possession. These three parcels of land are not involved in this litigation, which pertains solely to the residue of 371 acres.

By deed of August 26, 1882, Leake and Donnan, trustees, conveyed the 371-acre tract, along with other parcels of land, to Abel H. Bishop, administrator of Carter R. Bishop, deceased, which deed was admitted to record in the clerk's office of the county court of Brunswick county on June 25, 1883. Some time thereafter a chancery suit was instituted in the hustings court of the city of Petersburg, Va., for the settlement and partition of Bishop's estate, and in that suit R. B. Davis and Bernard Mann were appointed special commissioners to make sale of certain real estate owned by Bishop, including this tract of 371 acres in Brunswick county. On July 24, 1899, acting under a decree of that court, the special commissioners sold this tract of land at public auction to E. G. Temple, and by deed dated August 4, 1899, conveyed it to him; the deed being admitted to record August 18, 1899. Thereafter Temple conveyed this tract to the Brunswick Lumber Company, and by deed dated November 1, 1902, the Brunswick Lumber Company conveyed it to the Camp Manufacturing Company.

None of the parties who claim under William J. Branch have ever entered into possession of this 371-acre tract, and it has never been inclosed, cleared, or cultivated, but is covered with a dense growth of standing timber, and ever since the death of Miles B. Branch has been in a state of nature, and at this date is in the same condition as it was at the time of his death. William J.

Branch was never in possession of the tract. Shortly before the war he left Brunswick county, and has never since resided there.

In this state of affairs, Walter M. Seward, a grandson of Miles B. Branch, deceased, and a son of Susan E. Branch, one of his four daughters, some time during the year 1908, ascertained that the Camp Manufacturing Company made claim to this tract of land. He made inquiry in regard to it, investigated the title, and became satisfied that none of the four daughters of Miles B. Branch had ever conveyed away their right or title to this tract of land. He consulted counsel, and was advised that the executor of the will of Miles B. Branch, deceased, had no power or authority to sell or convey this real estate, and that his deed attempting to convey the land to William J. Branch was null and void, and passed no title whatever. He took the matter up with his mother, who, after the death of her first husband, Robert Merritt Seward, had married a Mr. Dunn, and with the other heirs at law of the daughters of Miles B. Branch, explained to them the situation, and told them that in his opinion they still had a valid title. The heirs did not care to enter into litigation, but were willing to convey their interest to Seward, and as the result of his efforts he obtained deeds to $\frac{175}{800}$ of the entire tract. The consideration mentioned in each of these deeds was \$1, cash in hand paid. In the case of his mother, Mrs. Dunn, there was no other consideration paid or promised. Seward was her only child, and for years had been contributing to her support. In the case of his aunt, Mrs. Rae, it appears that Seward, in consideration of her deed, paid her in cash at various times something less than \$100; but there was no agreement that he was to pay her any further consideration. She was his aunt, a childless widow, and the record shows that from time to time he had contributed something to her support.

The mother, Mrs. Dunn, and the aunt, Mrs. Rae, are the two surviving daughters of Miles B. Branch, deceased, and they each own an undivided interest of $\frac{9}{32}$ of this tract of land.

Rosa M. Branch, another daughter of Miles B. Branch, deceased, had died in Tennessee some time during the year 1865, unmarried and intestate. Her undivided fourth interest in this land passed by descent to her eight brothers and sisters, each of whom inherited from her an undivided interest in $\frac{1}{32}$ of this tract, and this $\frac{1}{32}$ added to the $\frac{9}{32}$ which they derived under the will of Miles B. Branch, gave to Mrs. Dunn and Mrs. Rae each $\frac{9}{32}$.

Ann R. Green, the other daughter of Miles B. Branch, deceased, died some years since, leaving heirs at law whose names are set forth in the record.

In addition to the deeds which Seward obtained from his mother and his aunt, he also obtained deeds from some of the heirs of Rosa M. Branch, and Ann R. Green, and these latter deeds conveyed to him, in the aggregate, an undivided interest of $\frac{271}{300}$ of the whole tract. In addition to the consideration of \$1 mentioned in each of these deeds, Seward agreed with these heirs that in the event he decided to institute suit for the recovery of the land, and succeeded in recovering it, he would pay them an additional cash consideration estimated at about \$15 an acre for their interests.

The deeds were all absolute and unconditional. Seward could bring suit or not, as he saw fit. His agreement with them was that, if he succeeded in recovering the land, he would pay them an additional consideration, which was not a charge on the land itself, but a personal obligation on his part.

Having acquired title to an undivided interest of $\frac{275}{300}$ of this land, Seward, in August, 1909, instituted an action of ejectment in the circuit court of Brunswick county against the Camp Manufacturing Company, and at the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff for the entire interest claimed in fee simple.

Under the plea of not guilty, the defense relied, first, upon adverse possession; and, secondly, and chiefly, upon the claim that the agreements whereby the plaintiff had obtained the deeds from the various heirs were illegal and void on account of champerty. These questions were submitted to the jury under instructions, and the result was, as already stated, a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the entire interest claimed by him. The defendant moved to set the verdict aside, and the circuit court, being of opinion that all of the deeds to the plaintiff, with the exception of that from his mother, Mrs. Dunn, were void on account of champerty, rendered the judgment complained of, which required him to remit all his recovery, as ascertained by the verdict of the jury, except the undivided interest of $\frac{9}{32}$, acquired from his mother, or else submit to a new trial. The plaintiff, in accordance with the statute in such cases made and provided, remitted that portion of his recovery and accepted the judgment of the court for the undivided interest of $\frac{9}{32}$, under protest, and then and there protested against and excepted to the judgment of the court, and later on presented his bill of exceptions to the judge, setting forth the evidence, the instructions, and the action of the court, which was made a part of the record.

The defendant, the Camp Manufacturing Company, also moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, upon the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion of the defendant was impliedly overruled by the court when it entered the judgment now before us.

Seward applied for and obtained a writ of error, and the Camp Manufacturing Company assigns cross-error under rule 8 of this court, so that the whole subject is before us for review.

[1, 2] Upon the facts before the jury, we agree with the circuit court that the deed from Mrs. Dunn to her son is not void upon the ground of champerty; and, after a careful consideration of the evidence, we are unable to find any satisfactory ground upon which to base a different conclusion with respect to so much of the land sued for as passed under the deed of Mrs. Rae. We are, therefore, of opinion that the court erred in requiring him to remit the $\frac{9}{32}$ which the plaintiff in error derived under the deed from his aunt, Mrs. Rae. With respect to the remaining deeds, covering the interests for which suit was brought, we are of opinion that they are champertous.

Plaintiff in error seems to rely upon the proposition that there was no express and binding contract upon Seward's part to undertake and carry on this litigation at his own risk and cost. It may be conceded that there was no such term expressed in his contract, but it was necessarily implied. It is true that it was optional with him to sue or not to sue, as he saw fit; but the deeds by which he acquired the title could not of themselves secure to him the fruits of his bargain, and a suit was a necessary condition to the realization of any benefit to be enjoyed by him from the contracts.

[3] Nor do we think it necessary, to make good the plea of champerty with respect to the purchase of real estate, that the contract shall stipulate for a division in kind of the land to be recovered. It is sufficient if the champertor and the party with whom he contracted were to share in the fruits of the recovery.

In Nickels v. Kane, 82 Va. 309, it is said that "champerty may be defined to be a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant in a suit for a portion of the land or other matters sued for, in case of a successful termination of the suit, which the champertor undertakes to carry on at his own expense; and champerty avoids the contracts into which it enters."

In Roller v. Murray, 107 Va. 527, 59 S. E. 421, the law is thus stated: "A contract by an attorney to undertake and carry on litigation at his own risk, or without costs to his client, for a share of the recovery, is contrary to public policy and void. The law of champerty as affecting civil contracts is not obsolete and inoperative in this state, nor is it affected by the repeal by implication of the statute, declaratory of the common law, making champerty a criminal offense."

In Bishop on Contracts, § 121, it is said: "If the sealed undertaking is to do a thing unlawful, or against public policy or morals, or if the unexpressed consideration for it is in fact thus tainted, or if it was obtained by fraud or duress, the seal will not serve as a screen for the wrong; but the real nature of the transaction, though it does not appear on the face of the instrument, may be shown, and a party may avail himself of this matter, the same as though there were no seal. And the general doctrine, that we may look into the real consideration of a written contract, already explained, applies as well to sealed contracts as to others. If the law were not so, the seal 'would,' in the words of Lord Ellenborough, 'be made a cover for every species of wickedness and illegality.'"

In Webb v. Armstrong, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 880, it is said: "If it satisfactorily appear to the court in proof that the suit, in its origin and progress, is affected by champerty, it is a duty of the court not to permit itself to become the organ and instrument to consummate such agreements, but to repel the plaintiff and his suit."

In Holloway v. Lowe, 7 Port. (Ala.) 490, the court said: "The agreement in writing of the plaintiff in error, which is disclosed as the foundation of this action, is impeached as illegal; and it is clearly so, if champerty is an offense known to the laws of this state. As we have no statute defining this offense, we must recur to the common law, to ascertain what it is and to what cases it extends. It is defined by Hawkins as the unlawful maintenance of a suit, in consideration of some bargain to have a part of the thing in dispute, or some profit out of it, and has been held to cover all transactions and contracts, whether by counsel or others, to have the whole or a part of the thing or damages recovered."

In Peck v. Heurich, 167 U. S. 624, 17 Sup. Ct. 927, 42 L. Ed. 302, which was an action of ejectment, it was held that "a deed to trustees to enable one of them, who is an attorney at law, to conduct litigation for the title and possession of real estate on his own account and at his own cost and expense, in consideration of one-third of the property recovered, is void for champerty. The joinder of another person as cotrustee in a champertous deed, made to enable the other trustee to conduct litigation on his own account and at his own cost and expense, for a part of land to be recovered or the proceeds thereof, does not make the deed valid. An action of trustees claiming under a champertous deed cannot be maintained, although a similar action might be maintained by the grantors in their own name."

In the course of the opinion in that case it is said: "He agreed to pay the costs of the litigation. He agreed to take as his compensation a part of the land which was the subject of the suit, or a part of the proceeds of sale of it, which amounts to the same thing, and his compensation was not a fixed sum of money, payable out of the proceeds of sale, but a contingent share of the very thing to be recovered, or of the money that might be received by way of settlement or compromise; and the character of the enterprise on the part of the attorney was so plainly a speculative one that in the deed the net results to him are mentioned as 'profits.' If this be not champerty, we fail to see wherein there can be champerty. We must regard an agreement by any attorney to undertake the conduct of litigation on his own account, to pay the costs and expenses thereof, and to receive as his compensation a portion of the proceeds of the recovery, or of the thing in dispute, as obnoxious to the law against champerty; and that this was the character of the agreement in the present case we are entirely satisfied. The very thing in dispute was conveyed, or sought to be conveyed, in advance, to the attorney and an associate, for the express purpose of enabling the attorney to conduct the litigation on his own account and at his own cost and expense; and in consideration of this he was to retain at the end of the litigation one-third of what had been conveyed to him, and was to account to his clients for the other two-thirds. This was certainly an agreement on his part to take as his compensation a part of the thing in dispute, and it does not alter the case at all that the land when recovered was to be sold. That was the only practical mode for a division of the proceeds between the parties to the enterprise."

We think it plain from the evidence that in respect to the interests now under consideration there was a champertous agreement, which was the effectual moving consideration for the deeds to those interests, though not expressed upon the face of the deeds, and from the consequences of which plaintiff in error could not have escaped except by a breach of faith.

With respect, then, to the interest derived from Mrs. Rae, we think, as we have already said, that the right of the case is plainly with the plaintiff in error; that with respect to the other interests the right of the case is plainly with the defendant in error, upon the plea of champerty.

Upon the defense of adversary possession, we are of opinion that the jury was fairly and sufficiently instructed, and that the verdict was in accordance with the evidence.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and this court will enter a judgment for the plaintiff in error for $1\frac{1}{2}\%$ of the land in controversy in fee simple, that being in our opinion the judgment which the circuit court should have rendered, and that, as to the residue of the land in the declaration mentioned, the defendant go thereof without day, and that the plaintiff in error recover his costs in this behalf expended.

Reversed.

(112 Va. 311)

COLES' HEIRS et al. v. JAMERSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

June 8, 1911.)

1. TAXATION (§ 734*)—TAX TITLES—DEEDS—STATUTE.

The owner of land, who lived in another county, died, leaving a will devising it to be sold, and the will was not probated in the county where the land was located, so the records did not furnish the information contemplated by Code 1904, §§ 459, 460, and this information was not furnished by the parties in interest, as provided by section 463. The lands were assessed in the name of the owner, instead of to his estate, as required by section 474. Code 1904, § 473, declares that land correctly charged to one person shall not afterwards be charged to another, without evidence of record that such change is proper; and section 661 provides that the holder of a tax deed has the right or title, which was vested in the party assessed with the taxes, or in one claiming under him. Held, that a sale of these lands for delinquent taxes passed title, in spite of the noncompliance with section 474.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1470-1473; Dec. Dig. § 734.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 412*)—TAX TITLES—TAX DEEDS—ASSESSMENT—STATUTE.

A noncompliance with Code 1904, § 464, requiring separate lists to be kept for white and colored taxpayers, being a statistical measure only, does not vitiate an assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 682-689; Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 761*)—TAX TITLES—TAX DEEDS—ADVERTISEMENTS.

A tax deed, which recited that the land was sold by the county treasurer, a public officer, after due advertisement, as required by law, is valid, though not reciting the fact of the adjournment of the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1510-1513; Dec. Dig. § 761.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 762*)—TAX TITLES—TAX DEEDS—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code 1904, §§ 642, 645, 662, respectively requiring that the treasurer report the sales to court, that such reports be confirmed, and that reports be made when real estate is bought in the name of the auditor, and section 655, requiring a tax deed to set out all the circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation to the deed, the treasurer's report of sale and the order of court confirming the sale are circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation to the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 129*)—REAL PROPERTY—SALE—TITLE TO STATUTE.

Code 1904, § 2663, providing that if land be devised to be sold, and no one be appointed, the executor may sell it, and if he fail to qualify, or, having qualified, dies, an administrator with the will annexed may sell, gives the executor or administrator no title independent of the will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 533-536; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 129*)—REAL PROPERTY—SALE—WILLS—TITLE.

Where a will merely provided that land should be sold, and did not devise it to the executrix, she had only a power of sale, the heirs having the title; and hence an administrator appointed after her death, without the will annexed, had no title to support ejectment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

7. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 28*)—PARTIES PLAINTIFF—MISJOINDER—STATUTE.

In an action of ejectment, where an administrator who had no title to land was erroneously made a party plaintiff, the court should, under the direct provisions of Code 1904, § 3258a, order the action to abate as to the administrator, and proceed in the names of the other plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 163-165; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Buckingham County.

Ejectment by T. H. Dickinson, as administrator, and the heirs of J. M. Coles, deceased, against J. D. Jamerson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed and remanded.

John M. Payne and Harrison & Long, for plaintiffs in error. Hubard & Gayle and A. B. Dickinson, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This action of ejectment was brought by the plaintiffs in error against the defendant in error, John D. Jamerson, to recover 342 acres of land in Buckingham county, formerly the property of J. M. Coles, deceased, who was the ancestor of the plaintiffs (except T. H. Dickinson), and was bought by the defendant's assignor at a sale for delinquent taxes, and is held by the assignee under a tax deed from the clerk bearing date February 10, 1896. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, to which judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The specific grounds of attack upon the title of the defendant are as follows: (1) Because the land was assessed for taxation in the name of J. M. Coles for several years after his death and when returned delinquent, when it should have been charged to his estate; (2) because the land was registered on the land book in the white list, when it should have been registered in the colored list, Coles being a negro; (3) because the tax deed does not recite the adjournment of the sale; and (4) because the deed also fails to show that there was a report by the county treasurer of the sale and the confirmation of such report and sale by the court. We shall consider these several contentions in the order stated.

[1] 1. It is true section 474 of the Code of 1904 provides that when the owner of land dies, having, as in this instance, devised the same to be sold, "It shall continue charged to the decedent's estate until a transfer thereof." Coles was not a resident of Buckingham county, and his will was probated in Prince Edward county, so that the records of the former county did not supply the information contemplated by sections 459 and 460; nor was such information furnished by the parties in interest, as provided by section 463. It would be an unreasonable construction of section 474 to hold that a failure after Coles' death to charge the land to his estate would invalidate the assessment.

Section 473 declares that land correctly charged to one person shall not be afterwards charged to another person without evidence of record that such charge is proper.

In construing section 13, c. 183, 2 Rev. Code 1819, which is similar to section 474, supra, in Usher's Heirs v. Pride, 15 Grat. 190, Allen, P., at page 200, observes: "I think, however, the entry in the name of the patentees (who had died) concludes the heirs and purchasers claiming under them, and they were forfeited for the delinquency in failing to pay the taxes charged thereon."

So, in Stevenson v. Henkel, 100 Va. 591, 42 S. E. 672, a mistake in the name of the owner, if not calculated to mislead, is immaterial.

Again, section 661 provides that "the right or title to such estate shall stand vested in the grantee in such deed as it was vested in the party assessed with the taxes or levies on account whereof the sale was made at the commencement of the year for which said taxes or levies were assessed, or in any person claiming under such party. * * *"

[2] 2. The requirement of section 464, with respect to separate lists for white and colored taxpayers, was intended as a basis for the apportionment of the school tax fund between the white and colored races in proportion to the amount of taxes contributed by them respectively. It was purely a statistical measure (which was never carried into effect), and its nonobservance could not affect the validity of the assessment.

[3] 3. The third assignment calls in question the validity of the tax deed because it does not recite the fact of the adjournment of the sale. The deed does state that the sale was made by the county treasurer at public auction at the front of the courthouse on February 10, 1896, "after due advertisement as required by law," and that, we think, was a sufficient recital with respect to the fact of the sale. Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Grat. 421.

[4] 4. The last assignment involves the failure of the deed to recite that the county treasurer made a report of the sale, or that the sale was confirmed by the court, or that it was recorded as required by sections 642, 645, 662.

It is provided by section 655 that the tax deed "shall set forth all the circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation to the sale."

In 2 Minor on Real Property, § 1383, the "circumstances" required to be recorded in the clerk's office are summarized as follows:

"(1) The listing and valuation of the land by the assessors and commissioners of the revenue, as contained in their returns to the court or the clerk.

"(2) The levy of the tax by the commissioner of the revenue.

"(3) The list of delinquent taxes, returned by the county or city treasurer, recorded in the clerk's office in the 'delinquent tax book.'

"(4) The treasurer's report of sales, recorded in the clerk's office in the 'delinquent land book.'

"(5) The notice or advertisement of the sale, which appears by way of recital in the treasurer's report of sales.

"(6) The order of court confirming the sale.

"(7) The surveyor's report, with plat and certificate showing the metes and bounds of the tract sold, the names of adjoining owners, and giving such further description of the land as will serve to identify it and enable the clerk to describe it properly in the tax deed."

Minor on Tax Titles, 118, 119; Delaney v. Goddin, 12 Grat. 266; Boon v. Simmons, 88 Va. 259, 13 S. E. 439.

We are of opinion that the treasurer's report of sale and the order of the court confirming the sale constitute "circumstances appearing in the clerk's office in relation to the sale," the recital of which is essential to the validity of the tax deed under section 655.

[5] The only assignment of cross-error on behalf of the defendant in error, which we deem it necessary to notice, involves the ruling of the circuit court in regard to the right of T. H. Dickinson, sheriff of Prince Edward county, and as such administrator of J. M. Coles, deceased, to maintain this action.

The supposed devolution of title to the land in controversy on Dickinson is founded upon the hypothesis that, as administrator with the will annexed of Coles, he succeeded to the title vested in the executrix, Hannah Coles, by the will of her late husband under section 2663 of the Code.

In Elys v. Wynne, 22 Grat. 224, 230, it was held that the statute does not operate as a conveyance of the estate, or any interest therein, to the executor, but merely gives him power to make any sale of real estate which the will directs to be sold, without empowering any particular person to make the sale, and that the title vested in the heirs, who were the proper parties to maintain ejectment for the land.

In this case the provision of the will is that, after six months from the death of the testator, the land shall be sold by his executrix. The will does not devise the land to the executrix to be sold, but invests her merely with a qualified power of sale.

[6] In Croswell on Executors and Administrators, § 330, the author says: "The question often arises whether, under the words of the will, the executor holds the land in trust to sell, or whether he has a mere power to sell the land. The importance of this distinction is obvious, since in the one case the title to the land vests in the executor, while in the other it vests in the heirs, subject to be divested by the execution of the power of the executor. It is said to be now settled that if the land is devised to the executor to sell, or devised subject to the debts of the testator, this passes the interest in the lands to the executor; but a direction that the executors shall sell the land gives them only a power of sale and no interest in the land." See, also, 18 Cyc. 302, 303.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 1035, lays down the same rule as in accordance with the weight of authority.

In the instant case, however, T. H. Dickinson did not succeed even to the powers of the executrix with respect to the real estate under Coles' will, by virtue of section 2663. It affirmatively appears from the record that he was not appointed administrator with the will annexed, but administrator only. The validity of such appointment for any purpose, where there is a will, may well be questioned. In Ewing v. Sneed, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 459, it was held to be void.

[7] Upon this branch of the case, we are of opinion that the legal title to the land devolved upon the heirs at law of J. W. Coles, deceased, subject to be divested only by a lawful execution of the power of sale. The circuit court ought, therefore, to have ordered the action to abate as to T. H. Dickinson, and to proceed in the name of the other plaintiffs, heirs at law of J. W. Coles, deceased, as if such misjoinder had not been made, in accordance with section 3258a of the Code.

The judgment of the circuit court, for the reasons stated, must be reversed, and the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, to be had in accordance with this opinion.

Reversed.

1. PLEADING (§ 204*)—DEMURRER TO DECLARATION CONTAINING GOOD COUNT—EFFECT.

A demurrer to the declaration as a whole, containing a count stating a cause of action, is properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 486-490; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 24*)—TERMINATION OF CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for malicious prosecution, evidence of the acquittal of plaintiff is admissible merely to show the termination of the criminal prosecution, and not to show probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

3. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 21*)—DEFENSES—RELIANCE ON ADVICE OF ATTORNEY.

The advice of a reputable attorney, sought and acted on in good faith, is probable cause as a matter of law, and is a complete defense to an

4. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 24*)—DEFENSES—JUDGMENT OF CONVICTION—REVERSAL ON APPEAL—EFFECT.

A judgment of conviction by a justice or other trial court is conclusive evidence of probable cause for instituting the prosecution, though the conviction has been reversed on appeal or writ of error, unless the conviction was procured through fraud, or by means of testimony known to be false.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

5. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 47*)—ACTIONS—DECLARATION—REQUISITES.

A declaration in an action for malicious prosecution, which alleges the conviction of plaintiff in a criminal prosecution instituted by defendant, must, to state a cause of action, aver that the conviction was procured by the defendant through fraud, or by testimony which he knew to be false.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Mecklenburg County.

Action by D. E. Baldwin against G. A. Saunders. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

E. P. Buford, for plaintiff in error. Faulkner & Faulkner, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The defendant in error, D. E. Baldwin, was arrested, tried, and found guilty of petit larceny upon a warrant issued by a justice of the peace of the county of Mecklenburg, upon the complaint of G. A. Saunders, the plaintiff in error. Upon appeal to the circuit court of that county, the judgment of the justice was reversed, and the accused acquitted. He thereupon instituted his action of trespass on the case against Saunders for malicious prosecution.

Upon the trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment against the latter. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

[1] The trial court overruled a demurrer to the declaration, and to each count thereof. This action of the court is assigned as error.

The declaration contains two counts. It is not denied here that the second count states a cause of action. The demurrer to the declaration as a whole, and to the second count, was therefore properly overruled.

The objection made to the first count is that although the want of probable cause is alleged for the complaint and proceedings mentioned therein, yet that the judgment of the justice of the peace, which is averred, although reversed, and the accused acquitted, is conclusive evidence of the existence of probable cause, in the absence of averment that such judgment was procured by evidence known by the defendant (Saunders) to be false. This objection will be considered in disposing of the exception of the defendant to the action of the trial court in refusing to give instruction No. 3 offered by the defendant.

That instruction is as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant caused the warrant mentioned in the declaration to be issued against the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff upon his trial before the justice of the peace on said warrant was convicted by the judgment of the justice, such conviction is conclusive evidence of probable cause, and the jury should find for the defendant, unless they further believe from the evidence that the defendant procured the conviction of the plaintiff before said justice by means of evidence known to said defendant to be false, or that such conviction was procured through the fraud of the defendant."

That instruction, as does the demurrer to the first count of the declaration, raises the question whether or not, in an action for malicious prosecution, the conviction of the plaintiff of the offense charged, which judgment of conviction has been reversed upon appeal and the accused acquitted, is conclusive or only prima facie evidence that probable cause existed for such prosecution, unless such conviction was procured by the defendant through fraud or by means of evidence which he knew to be false.

This question has been passed on by many of the courts of this country, and different conclusions reached. Some of the courts, as in the state of North Carolina, seem to hold that such a judgment is conclusive evidence of probable cause, even though unfairly obtained. Griffin v. Sellars, 20 N. C. 315; Price v. Stanley, 128 N. C. 33, 38 S. E. 33, 34. In the courts of some of the other states, as in Connecticut, Iowa, and Minnesota, such a judgment is deemed merely prima facie evidence of probable cause. Goodrich v. Warner, 21 Conn. 432; Moffatt v. Fisher, 47 Iowa, 473; Skeffington v. Elyward, 97 Minn. 244, 105 N. W. 638, 114 Am. St. Rep. 711. In the great majority of the jurisdictions which have passed upon the question, such a judgment is held to be conclusive evidence of probable cause, unless (as is the rule in most of the cases) such judgment was procured by fraud or undue means on the part of the defendant. See Crescent City, etc., Co. v. Butchers', etc., Co., 120 U. S. 141, 7 Sup. Ct. 472, 30 L. Ed. 614; Bacon v. Towne, 4 Oush. (Mass.) 217; *Morrow v. The precise question involved in this case and now under consideration has never been raised and passed upon by this court in any case officially reported. In the case of Blanks v. Robinson, 1 Va. Dec. 600, it was held that such a judgment was merely prima facie evidence of probable cause. That case was never officially reported and bears internal evidence, as it seems to us, that the question involved was not very carefully considered. If it had been, the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court would not, we think, have supposed that the same question was involved in that case as was passed upon in Womack v. Circle, 32 Grat. 324, or that the conclusion reached was in accord with the weight of authority on the subject. The opinion is a very short one, and relies chiefly upon the reasoning of the dissenting opinion in the case of Womack v. Circle.

The question in the last-named case was not the same as that involved in Blanks v. Robinson. The action of the justice in Womack v. Circle, held to be conclusive evidence of probable cause, was a proceeding under statutes now found in chapter 191 of Pollard's Code of 1904; by which, upon complaint made to a justice or other conservator of the peace that there is good cause to fear that a person intends to commit an offense against the person or the property of another, the justice shall issue his warrant, and when the accused is brought before him and the witnesses heard, if he be of opinion that there is good cause for the complaint, he may require of the accused a recognizance to keep the peace and be of good behavior. The accused is, however, given the right of appeal to the court having jurisdiction of appeals from such justice, which court upon the hearing may affirm, or reverse the action of the justice and dismiss the complaint. In that case the justice was of opinion that there was good cause for the complaint and bound the accused over to keep the peace, etc. Upon appeal the county court held that there was not good cause for the complaint, and discharged the accused. The only question involved before the justice and the county court was whether or not there was good cause for the complaint. The justice held that there was; the county court, that there was not. In such a case there is much to be said in favor of the view of the dissenting judges, that the opinion or judgment of the justice, that there was good cause for the complaint, ought not to be held as conclusive, but merely prima facie, evidence of probable cause, since the county court, in passing upon the identical question, had been of the opinion that there was not good cause for the complaint.

In the case of Blanks v. Robinson, where the warrant was for petit larceny, the justice was not merely of the opinion that there was probable cause for believing that the accused had committed the larceny, but was satisfied that he was guilty, and convicted him. The county court, upon appeal, although it may have been entirely satisfied that there was not only probable cause for the prosecution, but a strong probability of the guilt of the accused, was bound to reverse the judgment of conviction and acquit, unless it was satisfied that he was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

In the one case the trial court and the appellate court passed upon but one and the same question, viz., whether or not there was good cause for the complaint, and the judgment of reversal necessarily held that there was not good cause for it. But in the other case reversing the judgment of conviction did not show that the appellate court was of opinion that there was not probable cause for the prosecution. In the one case the courts differ as to the question of good cause; in the other, the reversal of the judgment of conviction shows that they differ as to the guilt of the accused, but it does not show or tend to show that there was not probable cause for the prosecution.

[2] The general rule is that the acquittal of the accused is not evidence of a want of probable cause. Such evidence is admissible merely to show that the prosecution has terminated. Singer, etc., Co. v. Bryant, 105 Va. 405, 418, 54 S. E. 320; Newell on Malicious Pros. 293, 294; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 665, 666; 26 Cyc. 40, 41; Fox v. Smith, 3 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 110, and note. One of the reasons given why an acquittal of the accused is not evidence of a want of probable cause is that the prosecution must not only prove that the accused is probably guilty, which would show that there was probable cause for the prosecution, but it must prove that he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; and it would be manifestly unreasonable to hold that the failure of the prosecution to make out such a case is evidence of the want of probable cause for instituting the prosecution. An acquittal may result from some technical error or irregularity, or other cause having no bearing upon the question of probable cause. The prosecution may be unable to produce a witness, and many other facts and circumstances may exist which, while having a bearing on the action of the trying court in acquitting, have no bearing whatever on the question of probable cause. See last case cited, and note to Lindsey v. Couch, 18 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 65, 66, and cases cited.

The conclusion reached in Blanks v. Robinson is not only contrary to the current of authority, but is, as it seems to us, untenable upon principle. The court, in giving its reasons for that conclusion, says: "The ground upon which the cases which hold the contrary doctrine are rested is that the judgment of conviction is evidence of such high character that it constitutes an estoppel, which concludes all further inquiry into the facts and circumstances of the case. It leaves entirely out of view the facts that this very judgment may have been procured by the fraud of the prosecutor, or the ignorance and incompetency of the justice, and gives to a judgment which has been reversed and vacated the same force and effect as a judgment which has never been reversed or assailed. It not only ignores one of the cardinal doctrines applicable to estoppels, namely, that all estoppels must be mutual, but it violates the principle that the records of the proceedings in a criminal trial are never to be taken as conclusive of the facts upon which it is based in a civil action. For these reasons we regard any rule which would make such a judgment conclusive evidence of probable cause * * * as too arbitrary to effect justice between the parties."

[3] The true ground upon which such a judgment is held to be conclusive evidence of probable cause is not upon the principle of estoppel, within the ordinary or technical meaning of that term, but upon the principle that, when the prosecuting witness or the person who has started the prosecution acts upon facts which are of such a character as that, when they are stated to a calm and dispassionate person capable of judging, they lead him to believe that the person charged is guilty, they are such as make out a case of probable cause upon which the prosecuting witness or prosecutor has the right to act. It is upon this principle that the doctrine recognized in most jurisdictions, and in this state, that the advice of a reputable attorney at law, properly sought and acted on in good faith, constitutes probable cause as a matter of law, and furnishes a complete defense to an action of malicious prosecution. Jones v. Morris, 97 Va. 43, 33 S. E. 377; Newell on Malicious Prosecution, p. 309 et seq. See Evans v. Atl. Coast Line Ry. Co., 105 Va. 72, 53 S. E. 3; note to King v. Apple River Power Co., 11 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 951, 954-956. "So," as has been said (Newell on Mal. Pros. at page 255), "where the judgment of conviction is appealed from, and on acquittal had, if the prosecuting witness presented the facts to one court competent to try the cause, and the court found the defendant guilty, it makes out a case of probable cause, and exonerates him from liability, though the court erred in its judgment. This is undoubtedly the true rule. It is the duty of citizens, when they are in possession of facts which, when fully and fairly presented to a calm and dispassionate lawyer, capable of determining whether such facts constitute a crime, such as should be prosecuted and punished, or sufficient, when presented to a court having jurisdiction to try the offense, to lead the court to act upon them and find the defendant guilty, to take legal steps for the punishment of such offenders; and they should, when they act in good faith upon such facts, be exonerated from any liability in an action for malicious prosecution."

The reason why such advice of counsel or such judgment of conviction by a court having jurisdiction to try is held to be a complete defense to an action of malicious prosecution is no more upon the principle of estoppel in the latter case than in the former. The true ground upon which it is held that such advice or such conviction is a complete defense is because the attorney in the one case and the court in the other are persons, by reason of their capacity or their official position, presumed to be capable of judging of the facts in their legal bearing. It may be, and no doubt is, true in some instances that justices are not highly qualified for the performance of their important duties; but this court cannot on that account adjudge as incompetent and unfit for the performance of their duties that large class of judicial officers upon whom the General Assembly, in its wisdom, has seen proper to confer, not only jurisdiction for the trial of all cases of misdemeanor, but exclusive original jurisdiction of almost all such cases.

But if the reasoning of the court in Blanks v. Robinson were sound, that the judgment of the trial court cannot be regarded as conclusive evidence of probable cause, because to do so would violate the principles applicable to the doctrine of estoppel, then the reasoning applies with equal force to a judgment of conviction rendered in a circuit or corporation court, which has been reversed upon a writ of error to this court and the accused subsequently acquitted. If it be held to be the law that a verdict of guilty by a jury and a judgment of conviction in a circuit or corporation court, where that judgment is reversed upon a writ of error and the accused subsequently acquitted, is not conclusive evidence of probable cause, few persons would dare make the effort to put in motion proceedings to enforce the criminal laws of the state; for to do so would cause such person, wherever the final result was the acquittal of the accused, to run the risk of vexatious litigation and probably subject him to heavy damages. Few men would be expected or willing to incur such hazards. Besides, it would be an anomaly, if not an absurdity, to hold that the advice of counsel properly obtained and followed in good faith before making an effort to set in motion criminal proceedings would be conclusive evidence of probable cause, and a complete defense, yet that, upon a full presentation of the facts by both the prosecution and the accused upon the trial, the verdict of guilty by a jury approved by the judgment of the trial judge is, if reversed and the accused finally acquitted, merely prima facie evidence of probable cause. By what process of reasoning or rule of logic is the judgment of the circuit or corporation court, upon a full presentation of all the facts by both sides, to be considered as of less weight as evidence of probable cause than the opinion of counsel upon an ex parte statement of the facts by the prosecutor? Yet such is the logical result of the reasoning in Blanks v. Robinson.

It would seem to follow necessarily, therefore, that either the advice of counsel, under the circumstances indicated, must be held not to be conclusive evidence of probable cause, or the judgment of the trial court must be, unless improperly procured.

Another ground relied on in Blanks v. Robinson to show that the judgment of the trial court should not be treated as conclusive evidence of probable cause is because the court in that case "left entirely out of view the fact that this very judgment may have been obtained through the fraud of the prosecutor." Neither the trial court in that case nor the opinion of the court in Womack v. Circle, which was overruled, holds that the judgment of the trial court should be considered as conclusive evidence of probable cause, if procured by the fraud of the prosecutor, but, on the contrary, the trial court in Blanks v. Robinson had instructed the jury in effect that the justice's judgment was not conclusive evidence of probable cause, if procured by the fraud of the prosecutor, and that was the view of this court in Womack v. Circle, as clearly appears from its opinion. See 32 Grat. 338, 339.

Another ground relied on in the dissenting opinion in Womack v. Circle why the judgment of the justice should not be treated as conclusive evidence of probable cause is that, in exhibiting articles of peace and in other criminal proceedings, the accused is bound over or convicted by the justice upon the testimony of the prosecutor alone, when the mouth of the accused is closed. Whatever merit there may have been in that reason at that time, it has lost much, if not all, of its force by the change in the law made since that decision was rendered, by which the accused, in all cases of felony or misdemeanor, is entitled to testify in his own behalf. Code 1904, § 3897.

[4] Upon principle, as well as upon authority, it seems to us that, if there be a conviction by a justice or other trial court having jurisdiction of the case, which is reversed upon appeal or writ of error, and the accused acquitted, such judgment of conviction in an action for malicious prosecution should be held to be conclusive evidence of probable cause, unless it be shown that it was procured by the defendant through fraud or by means of testimony which he knew to be false.

This is substantially the doctrine approved in the case of Crescent City, etc., Co. v. Butchers' Union, etc., Co., supra, by the Supreme Court of the United States, after a review of a number of the conflicting decisions on the subject. The conclusion reached by the court in that case, in our opinion, does to a great extent, as that court said, seem "to reconcile the apparent contradiction in the authorities, and states the rule which we think to be well grounded in reason, fair and just to both parties, and consistent with the principle on which the action for malicious prosecution is founded."

[5] It follows from what has been said that we are of opinion that the circuit court erred, not only in refusing to give instruction No. 3 offered by the plaintiff in error, but also erred in overruling the demurrer to the first count of the declaration. That count fails to aver that the judgment of conviction by the justice, which is alleged, was procured by the defendant through fraud or by means of testimony which he knew to be false. Having alleged such conviction in the count, an allegation which would destroy the conclusiveness of the conviction was indispensable; for, unless made, as was said in Spring v. Besore, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 551, 555, the other facts stated "establish the existence of probable cause, and the count is suicidal." See, also, Carpenter v. Sibley, 153 Cal. 215, 94 Pac. 879, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1143, 126 Am. St. Rep. 77, 15 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 484, and note on 486, and cases cited.

The other assignments of error need not be considered, as the precise questions raised by them are not likely to arise upon another trial.

The judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, the demurrer to the first count of the declaration sustained, and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his declaration, if he be so advised, and for further proceedings not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

NEWMAN v. McCOMB.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 236*)—ALIMONY—AGREEMENTS IN LIEU—REMEDY.

An action for the recovery of money payable under written agreements, in one of which defendant, during the pendency of an action for divorce brought by plaintiff, agreed to pay plaintiff $50 per week as alimony and a stated sum as counsel fees, and in the other writing plaintiff waived all marital rights in defendant's property, and released defendant from any demand for permanent alimony, and fixed a day at which the stipulated alimony should cease, is not an action of assumpsit to recover alimony, but an action on the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 236*)—ALIMONY—AGREEMENT IN LIEU—PLEADING—DECLARATION.

Code 1904, § 2852, provides that an action of debt may be maintained on a writing by which there is any promise or obligation to pay money; and section 3272 provides that on a demurrer, unless it be a plea in abatement, the court shall not regard any defect in the declaration, except the omission of something so essential to the action that judgment according to law could not be given. Plaintiff's declaration, in an action for money as to payment of which defendant was alleged to be in default, was based upon writings, one of which was an agreement between plaintiff and defendant, made during the pendency in another state of an action for divorce, whereby defendant agreed to pay plaintiff alimony, and on another writing in which plaintiff released defendant from any demand for permanent alimony and fixed a day at which the stipulated alimony should cease. Held that, under the Code provisions, the declaration sufficiently stated an action of debt for the recovery of sums payable under the terms of the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF IMMATERIAL EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover sums payable in lieu of alimony, based on writings and stipulations between the parties during the pendency of a divorce action in another state, the admission of evidence as to proceedings had in the divorce case is not prejudicial, since it was immaterial to the issues involved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 25*)—PERSONAL ACTIONS—INSTRUMENTS FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY.

Under Code 1904, § 2920, relating to limitation of personal actions, an action to recover money in lieu of alimony, based on writings and stipulations made by parties during the pendency of an action for divorce, is barred by the five-year limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 118-131; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICATION TO ISSUES.

That a plea which presents no defense is not met with objection or demurrer, but issue is taken thereto, does not require the court to instruct thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Orange County. Action by Lelia M. McComb against W. G. Newman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. O. Moon, Rixey & Hiden, and Jno. G. Williams for appellant. Grimsley & Miller, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action of assumpsit, based upon two writings, one of which is as follows:

"N. Y. Supreme Court, Kings County.

"Lelia Moore Newman, Plaintiff, v. Walter George Newman, Defendant.

"Whereas, the plaintiff has brought the above-entitled action against the defendant for an absolute divorce, and said action is now pending in the court above named: and

"Whereas, it is mutually desired that no application should at present be made in open court for an allowance of alimony and counsel fee:

"Now, therefore, it is stipulated and agreed between the plaintiff and defendant, and by and between their respective attorneys herein, that the defendant pay to the plaintiff the sum of fifty dollars ($50.00) per week, as alimony, to begin May 12, 1902, and continue during the pendency of this action, or until such time as defendant defaults or elects to discontinue such payments for one week or more; then plaintiff to have the right to make a motion for alimony in manner and form as if this stipulation had not been made, except, however, that any allowance made by the court to plaintiff shall only begin from the date that payments herein agreed upon ceased.

"It is further stipulated and agreed that the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars ($350.00) as and for her counsel fee in this action.

"It is further agreed by the parties and attorneys herein that this stipulation is made without prejudice to the rights of either party, and that the same shall not be used upon any motion, or upon the trial of the action.

"Dated New York, May 29, 1902."

The other is an agreement between the parties, entered into on the 17th of September, 1902, in reference to their family differences and property rights, and contains, among other provisions, the following:

"Seventh. In view of this contract settling all the property rights of said parties, each party hereto waives all marital rights in the property of the other, whether said property has already been acquired or may hereafter be acquired, and the said Lelia Moore Newman hereby expressly releases the said W. D. Newman from any demand for permanent alimony or support, that she may now have or may hereafter have or acquire, whether by virtue of a judgment or decree of any court or otherwise; and it is further expressly stipulated that the temporary alimony now being paid by W. G. Newman to said Lelia Moore Newman by reason of a stipulation to that effect in the above-mentioned suit for divorce in New York shall cease on October 15, 1902, whether said divorce suit be then decided or not, unless the said W. G. Newman take some step or steps to prevent the said suit being heard before that time, or take an appeal."

[1, 2] The court is of opinion that the demurrer to the amended declaration was properly overruled by the trial court. This is not an action of assumpsit to recover alimony, as argued, but is an action to recover certain sums in lieu thereof, which became due and payable under the terms of the agreements of May 29, 1902, and September 17, 1902. The declaration, though inartificially drawn, is sufficient. We think, under the provisions of sections 2852 and 3272 of the Code of 1904.

[3] The court is further of opinion that, even if the court erred in permitting the introduction of oral evidence as to the proceedings had in the divorce case between the parties in one of the courts of Kings county and state of New York, it furnishes no sufficient ground for reversing the judgment complained of, since that evidence was wholly immaterial to the decision of the issues involved, and its admission, as clearly appears, could not have prejudiced the plaintiff in error. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Birchfield, 105 Va. 809, 54 S. E. 879.

[4] The court is further of opinion that the court properly refused to instruct the jury that the claim sued for was barred by the statute of limitations, if they believed that the cause of action had accrued more than three years before the institution of this action.

Two pleas of the statute of limitations were filed—one that the demand sued for had accrued more than five years, and the other that it had accrued more than three years, before this action was instituted. The right to recover was founded upon a contract evidenced by writings, and the five-year, not the three-year, statute of limitations was applicable to the case. Code, § 2920.

[5] The court, upon motion of the plaintiff, had so instructed the jury. Since the declaration asserted a demand based upon a promise in writing, the plaintiff ought to have demurred to or objected to the plea relying upon the three-year statute of limitations, instead of taking issue upon it; but, since that plea constituted no defense to the action, the court did not err in refusing to instruct upon the issue raised by it.

It would be a strange rule of pleading and practice which would require a court to give an instruction contrary to law and in conflict with one already given upon another and a material issue in the case, because the plaintiff, instead of objecting to a plea based upon a ground which furnished no defense, took issue upon it, or, after taking issue upon it, failed to have it stricken out. See United States v. Dashiell, 4 Wall. 182, 18 L. Ed. 319; 2 Thomp. on Trials, § 2312.

The court is further of opinion that the instructions numbered 1 and 2, given upon the motion of the plaintiff, fairly submitted the case to the jury, and that there was no error in refusing any of the instructions offered by the defendant.

The court is further of opinion that the agreement of May 29, 1902, and of September 17, 1902, and the other evidence, independent of the oral evidence as to the proceedings had in the divorce case between the parties pending in Kings county, in the state of New York, fully sustain the verdict of the jury, and that the trial court did not err in refusing the motion of the defendant to set that verdict aside.

The judgment complained of must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 114*)—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—RATIFICATION.

Where the president, seeking to defraud third persons, told them that they could give the bank their note, and such note would not be enforced, and the bank, without knowledge of such promise, discounted the note, giving full value, there was no ratification of the president's acts.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 26*)—GROUNDS—RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF NOTES.

The president of a bank, in furthering certain fraudulent schemes of his own, told third persons that the bank would discount their notes secured by certain stock of a corporation which he was organizing, and that if he could not sell the stock taken by these persons the bank would not enforce payment. The bank as an ordinary commercial transaction discounted the notes, and the stock was given as collateral. It proved worthless, and the bank offered to return it, and demanded payment of the notes. Held, that an injunction to restrain collection of the notes until there was an end to the litigation between the makers and the president of the bank was properly refused, where all parties to the transaction are not put in statu quo, and where the makers of the notes may not be entitled to relief against the bank, even if they succeed against the president.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1194*)—REMAND—SUBSEQUENT PROCEEDINGS.

Complainants in a suit seeking an injunction first filed an original, then an amended, and last a supplemental, bill. The defendants demurred, and a decree sustaining the demurrer was reversed and remanded on appeal, leaving an injunction in force. Upon motion in the trial court to dissolve the injunction, complainants claimed that the motion was heard as on demurrer, because the defendant had not answered the supplemental bill and that the decree on appeal was conclusive on defendants. The defendant had answered the original and the amended bill, and before its motion to dissolve was heard had, over complainants' objection, filed an answer to the supplemental bill. The supplemental bill alleged nothing new, and the answer already in the record put in issue all the matters set up in any of the bills. Held that, under those circumstances, the motion was not heard as on demurrer, and that the decree on appeal did not conclude defendants.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Culpeper County.

Suit by K. M. Baker and others against the Berry Hill Mineral Springs Company of Virginia. From a decree dismissing an injunction, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Rixey & Hiden, John S. Barbour, and E. Hilton Jackson, for appellants. Grimsley & Miller and Waite & Perry, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This is a second appeal of this case to this court. The original and amended bills filed by appellants seek a rescission of a contract which it is alleged they were fraudulently induced to enter into by S. R. Smith and W. E. Coons, to enjoin the Culpeper National Bank, Virginia, from collecting by suit certain negotiable notes executed by the appellants as a part of the alleged fraudulent scheme, and which notes, according to the allegations of the bill, were discounted by said bank with actual notice and actual participation of the bank in the wrong and fraud perpetrated by Smith and Coons upon appellants.

The facts and circumstances alleged in the original and first amended bills, and all that had been done to the injury of appellants pursuant to the alleged fraudulent purposes of Smith and Coons, are fully and clearly set out in the opinion of this court by Whittle, J., on the former appeal (109 Va. 776, 65 S. E. 656), and need not be repeated at length here. The decree entered by this court at the former hearing of the cause reversed the decree of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer of the Culpeper National Bank to the original and first amended bills, dismissing the same as to the bank, and dissolving the injunction theretofore awarded, and remanded the cause for further proceedings therein, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this court's opinion.

The cause having been remanded, the defendant bank gave notice to appellants of a motion to dissolve the injunction which had been granted against it on the original bill, which injunction restrained the bank from collecting of complainants the notes above referred to, aggregating about $4,500, discounted by the bank, and which were then due and payable. This motion, according to the notice, was to be made before the circuit court on the 26th day of June, 1909; but by a consent decree entered on that day the motion was ordered to be docketed and the hearing thereof continued to the 4th day of September, 1909, when it was heard upon the notice, the original and two amended bills of the complainants, the answer of the defendant bank to the original and first amended bills, and its answer to the second amended bill, filed over the objection of the complainants, said answer being substantially the same as its answer to the original and first amended bills, the affidavits of complainants and others as to the value of certain lands involved in the litigation, and upon an agreed statement of facts and certain record evidence—the complainants, appellants here, relying also on the answers of S. Russell Smith, W. E. Coons, the defendant bank, and the Berry Hill Mineral Springs Company; the defendant bank, appellee here, upon the answers of Smith, Coons, and the Berry Hill Mineral Springs Company, affidavits of the present cashier of the bank and all of its directors, except T. C. Smith, and other affidavits as to value of the land, etc., tender of stock, and certain statements agreed upon. Whereupon the case was fully argued and by consent submitted to the court for decision in vacation, and at the December term, 1909, the decree from which this appeal is taken was entered, dissolving the injunction which had been theretofore awarded against the defendant bank.

Quite a number of questions have been raised and argued on this appeal; but in the view we take of the case it is only necessary for us to consider the relation of the appellee to the appellants with respect to the transaction which it is alleged the latter had with S. Russell Smith and W. E. Coons, and by which it is claimed they were defrauded, of which fraud appellee had knowledge and participated in.

The original and amended bills contain substantially the same allegations, and the affidavits read by appellants in resisting the motion to dissolve the injunctions practically reiterate the allegations of the original and amended bills. The facts charged in the bills and stated in the affidavits are that appellants were, prior to and during the year 1904, the owners of three notes, aggregating \$45,000, which were secured by a deed of trust on 169 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres of land in Culpeper county, Va., belonging to the Berry Hill Mineral Springs Company of Virginia, a corporation, and 600 shares of stock in said corporation, and that on the last-named date S. Russell Smith, who was president of the appellee bank, and treasurer of Culpeper county, and W. E. Coons, clerk of the circuit court of Culpeper county, both of whom are well known and prominent men, called upon appellants at their home in Culpeper county, Va., for the purpose of fraudulently inducing them to enter into a reorganization scheme, whereby the Berry Hill Mineral Springs Company would be reorganized upon a certain plan, which is set out in appellants' original bill; that in order to induce appellants to accept the proposed scheme, and to mark satisfied the deed of trust securing their said notes, aggregating \$4,500, and to surrender the 600 shares of stock in the company, the said Smith and Coons made the representations and promises set out in the original bill, and which are stated in the opinion on the former appeal of this case, supra; that appellants, relying and acting solely upon said representations, during the month of March, 1905, surrendered their stock and the notes, and marked the said deed of trust satisfied; that the new company, which Smith and Coons were to organize, was afterwards organized, and \$40,000 worth of its stock issued to appellants; that Smith and Coons, and each of them, expressly represented and promised that within two years all the stock to be issued to appellants in the new company would be redeemed or purchased at its par value by Smith personally, and he reserved the right to do so, none of which promises made by Smith and Coons were kept, but were all broken, and appellants were deceived and defrauded out of their property. With respect to the appellee bank's connection with and participation in the fraud charged against Smith and Coons, it is charged in the amended bills and stated in the affidavits for appellants, read on the motion to dissolve the injunction, that appellee, through the said S. Russell Smith, its president, agreed that if appellants would go into this reorganization scheme with Smith and Coons, and surrender their 600 shares of stock in the old company, and accept \$40,000 worth of stock in the new company which Smith and Coons proposed to organize, to lend them (appellants) \$4,500 and accept their notes for that amount, and to carry the said notes upon renewals of the same from time to time until Smith, in his individual capacity, sold for appellants enough of their \$40,000 worth of stock in the new company at par to pay off the loan of the \$4,500 by the bank.

Practically the claim made against the appellee bank is that it agreed, through Smith, its president, that if Smith were unsuccessful in selling a sufficient amount of appellants' stock in said new company to pay off the notes given by them to the appellee for the loan of the $4,500, payment of said notes was not to be demanded of appellants. Appellee made the loan of $4,500 to appellants, by discounting their notes for the same, which notes became due and were several times renewed; but finally appellee refused to renew the notes any longer, and demanded their payment, which being refused, a suit against appellants was instituted for the collection of the notes, and solely upon the allegation of an agreement on the part of appellee, made through Smith, its president, not to attempt to collect said notes until enough of the stock of appellants in said new company should be sold, and from the proceeds of said sale the notes could be paid off, the injunction in this cause, staying the hands of the appellee in said suit for the collection of said notes, was awarded.

The sum and substance of the relief prayed in the bills in this cause is: (1) That appellants' contract with Smith and Coons be rescinded, their deed of trust given by the old company securing them re-established, and that their stock in the old company be given back to them (i. e., that they be placed in statu quo); and (2) failing in their demand to be placed in statu quo, they ask that their contract with Smith and Coons be specifically enforced (i. e., that with respect to appellee its hands shall be stayed as to any effort on its part to collect the notes given for the loan of the $4,500 until Smith and Coons fully perform their contract with appellants).

[1] Actual notice to appellee of the alleged fraud of Smith and Coons upon appellants is not even claimed; but their sole reliance in resisting the dissolution of the injunction awarded in the case was that constructive notice to appellee is to be imputed, for the reason that Smith was, at the time of the alleged fraudulent transaction, appellee's president and its controlling and managing officer, and presumed to have had authority to act for appellee in his said transactions with appellants. The controlling question, therefore, for our determination, is whether or not constructive knowledge of the alleged fraud can be rightly and legally imputed to appellee from the fact that Smith was the president of the appellee bank and alleged to be the sole manager of its affairs, and in order to carry out the alleged fraud on the appellants it became necessary, on Smith's account, to discount the notes in question for appellants in the bank, in which latter transaction a fraud was also perpetrated on the bank.

Undoubtedly it is a well-established general rule that knowledge of the agent is knowledge of the principal, and that the principal is ordinarily chargeable with the knowledge acquired by his agent in executing his agency, and is subject to the liabilities which such knowledge imposes, and by some authorities it is maintained that this rule is especially applicable to corporations, which can deal alone with the public through their officers and agents, and could not otherwise be affected with notice; but this rule has its exceptions, one of which applies to this case. The agent here is alleged, and by the affidavits and agreed facts is proved, to have engaged in an independent fraudulent transaction on a third person for his own benefit, and, at the same time, in order to accomplish the fraud, has also perpetrated a fraud upon his own principal.

In Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. vol. 2 (3d Ed.) § 675, the author says: "It is now settled, by a series of decisions possessing the highest authority, that when an agent or attorney has, in the course of his employment, been guilty of actual fraud, contrived and carried out for his own benefit, by which he intended to defraud, and did defraud, his own principal or client, as well as perhaps the other party, and the very perpetration of such fraud involved the necessity of his concealing the facts from his own client, then, under such circumstances, the principal is not charged with constructive notice of facts known by the attorney, and thus fraudulently concealed. In other words, if in the course of the same transaction in which he is employed the agent commits an independent fraud for his own benefit, and designedly against his principal, and it is essential to the very existence or possibility of such fraud that he should conceal the real facts from his principal, then the ordinary presumption of a communication from the agent to his principal fails. On the contrary, a presumption arises that no communication was made, and consequently the principal is not affected with constructive notice. The courts have carefully confined the operation of this exception to the condition described where a presumption necessarily arises that the agent did not disclose the real facts to his principal, because he was committing such an independent fraud that concealment was essential to its perpetration."

In Santiago Innerarity v. Merchants' National Bank, 139 Mass. 332, 1 N. E. 282, 52 Am. Rep. 710, the opinion says: "While the knowledge of an agent is ordinarily to be imputed to the principal, it would appear now to be well established that there is an exception to the construction or imputation of notice from the agent to the principal in cases of such conduct by the agent as raises a clear presumption that he would not communicate the fact in controversy, as where the communication of such a fact would necessarily prevent the consummation of the fraudulent transaction which the agent was engaged in perpetrating."

There are cases which seemingly sanction the view that the exception to the general rule does not apply to directors, presidents, and other such managing officers of a corporation, through whom alone the corporation can act; but in the well-considered case of Barnes v. Trenton Gas L. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. 33, the opinion says: "The rule based on the presumption that the agent has communicated the facts to his principal does not apply where the agent's (though an officer of a corporation) interest is opposed to that of his principal, for in such a transaction the officer stands as a stranger to the company. His interest being opposed to the interest of the company, the presumption is, not that he will communicate his knowledge to the company, but that he will conceal it; that where an officer of a corporation is dealing in his own interest, opposed to theirs, he must be held not to represent them in the transaction, so as to charge them with the knowledge he may possess, but which he has not communicated to them, and which they do not otherwise possess"—citing a number of decisions by both English and American courts.

Another instructive case in point is that of Brookhouse v. Union Pub. Co., 73 N. H. 368, 62 Atl. 219, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 993, 111 Am. St. Rep. 623, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 675, to which there is an extended note, reviewing a great number of decided cases; the conclusion being that the exception to the broad proposition that notice to the agent is notice to the principal, viz., where the knowledge is acquired by an officer of a corporation, while not acting for the corporation, but while acting for himself, is not imputable to the corporation, finds support in the decisions of the highest courts of England, the United States courts, and the courts of 27 states of the Union, citing the cases.

In Gunster v. Scranton Illuminating Co., 181 Pa. 327, 37 Atl. 550, 59 Am. St. Rep. 650, the question is elaborately and ably discussed, and a number of the cases relied on by counsel for appellants to sustain their side of the question are criticised.

The opinion of this court in Martin v. South Salem L. Co., 94 Va. 58, 26 S. E. 600, is in line with the long list of cases to which the above cited belong, and says: "A corporation is not affected by the knowledge of an agent, when he himself contracts with it, or otherwise deals with it in a transaction in which his interests are opposed to the interests of the company, for in such a transaction he could not represent the company."

It is believed that no case can be found deciding that when the agent was acting for himself in a transaction, and in that same transaction defrauded his principal, and the principal received no advantage from the transaction, notice to the agent was notice to the principal.

[2] Upon the allegations of the bills in this cause, leaving out of view the denial of

Smith in his answer and his affidavit, and in the affidavits of all the officers and directors of the appellee bank, of the truth of the allegations with respect to the knowledge of appellee of the fraud charged against Smith and Coons, it is made clearly to appear that Smith, in the transaction, was dealing in his own interest, which was distinctly antagonistic to the interest of the appellee. Assuming it to be true that, in perpetrating the alleged fraud upon appellants, Smith told them, "as an inducement to get us to go into this fraudulent scheme, the bank would let us have $4,500, and not require us to pay it back until Mr. Smith sold certain stock for us and from the proceeds of the sale paid off the notes"—i.e., if the stock was never sold by Smith, then this money was never to be paid back—can the doctrine that knowledge of the agent is to be imputed to his principal be carried to the extent of holding appellee bound by such a contract, especially when it had no actual knowledge of the transaction, and received no benefits from it? Surely not.

[3] The argument that appellee has ratified Smith's alleged unauthorized agreement is unsound; for there was nothing for appellee to ratify. It has obtained no advantage over appellants; but, to the contrary, they received a quid pro quo for everything appellee has received from them.

In Swindell & Co. v. Bainbridge State Bk., 3 Ga. App. 364, 60 S. E. 13, it is said: "Before a corporation should be held as having ratified a verbal agreement of its agent to relieve the makers from the payment of notes amounting to $10,000, both knowledge and acts of ratification ought to be alleged and proved. When ratification by the bank of an unauthorized agreement, made by its president, to relieve its debtor, is relied upon, some specific acts of ratification should be alleged. If acquiescence in and benefits from such unauthorized agreement are relied upon as an estoppel, knowledge of such agreement by the directors of the bank, and the beneficial results accruing to the bank under such agreement, must be alleged and proved."

[4] The actual transaction in this case between appellee and appellants is simply this: The latter presented their notes to the former for discount, attaching thereto 60 shares of stock as security for the notes, which notes were taken by the appellee bank in the usual course of business, and appellants received therefor the face value of the notes, less the ordinary discount upon the loan of the money. It has a number of times renewed the said notes, and finally demanded their payment, tendering the return of the stock deposited as security for the notes, and appellee is claiming nothing of appellants for which it has not rendered a full and fair equivalent. On the other hand, appellants refuse to pay back the money they have received of appellee in this transaction, decline to receive back their 60 shares of stock proven to be worthless, and say that the hand of appellee should be stayed in its efforts to collect the money loaned them until appellants can litigate to an end the controversy as to whether or not appellants are entitled to the relief they are asking as against Smith and Coons and the Berry Hill Mineral Springs Company, which relief is that the alleged fraudulent contract be rescinded or reformed, when in either event a court of equity could not grant the relief asked without requiring all parties to the transaction to be put in statu quo.

Appellants cannot succeed in this litigation, unless they succeed against Smith and Coons, and, even if they make a case against Smith and Coons, it does not follow that they will succeed against appellee, as to whom the injunction awarded in the cause alone applies; on the contrary, the record, as we have seen, negatives the right of appellants to the relief they are asking as against appellee. Under these conditions and circumstances, it would be manifestly unjust and inequitable to hold that appellee shall not collect of appellants the money it lent them in an ordinary banking transaction, until they have litigated with other parties matters of which appellee had no knowledge and with which it is not concerned.

[5] There is no merit in the contention of appellants that the motion to dissolve the injunction awarded in the cause was heard as upon a demurrer to appellants' bills, and therefore the decision of this court upon the first appeal was conclusive and binding upon the lower court, and it should have overruled the motion and declined to dissolve the injunction. This contention is made upon the ground that, although appellee had answered the original and first amended bills, it had not, when the motion to dissolve the injunction was made, answered the second amended and supplemental bill. We have observed that, while appellee had not, previous to the hearing of the motion, formerly filed its answer to the second amended bill, it was presented and filed at the time the motion was heard, though over the objection of appellants; but if such were not the case, the three bills are practically the same in their averments, there being nothing new in either of the amended bills, and therefore the answer of appellee, already in the record, put in issue all the matters set up in both the original and amended bills. The motion to dissolve the injunction was made and heard in accordance with the general practice in the courts of the state, upon the pleadings and affidavits read as depositions on behalf of the respective parties.

The decree of the circuit court is right, and therefore is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CITY OF PORTSMOUTH v. LEE

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 755*)—ACCIDENT IN STREET—CARE REQUIRED OF MUNICIPALITY.

A municipal corporation is not an insurer against accidents upon its streets and sidewalks; but it is bound only to use due care to see that its streets and sidewalks are reasonably safe to persons passing on them when exercising ordinary care, and it is only liable for injuries from defects where it has negligently failed to do that which it could be reasonably required to do in the particular case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1587-1590; Dec. Dig. § 755.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 775*)—NEGLECT—CLEANSING SEWER.

Where a sewer which was clogged was being cleansed by forcing water through it from a hose pipe, which was not only the usual way, but the only way it could properly be done, the city had the right to put the hose there for that purpose, and allow it to remain there as long as necessity required, using only such precaution against injury to persons using it as required under the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1630; Dec. Dig. § 775.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 798*)—DEFECTS IN STREETS—WARNING TO TRAVELERS.

Where the city found it necessary to clean out a clogged sewer by allowing water to run all night through a fire hose from a hydrant into a catch-basin at a street corner, and the hose was laid in the gutter close to the curb, and a lighted lantern placed on the curb, and there was an arc light at the corner over the catch-basin, all the necessary precautions for the safety of travelers were taken, and it was not necessary to take extra precautions, such as stationing a watchman, to warn passers of the presence of the hose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1657, 1658; Dec. Dig. § 798.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 755*)—DUTY TO HEALTH AND WELFARE OF CITIZENS.

It is as much the duty of a municipal corporation to take proper precautions for the health and welfare of its citizens as it is to keep its streets and all parts of them in reasonably safe condition for public travel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1587-1590; Dec. Dig. § 755.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 791*)—DEFECTS IN STREETS—NOTICE TO CITY OF DEFECT.

Where it was necessary to run water all night through a fire hose into a catch-basin, and the hose was left in the gutter close to the curb at 5:07 p. m., the interval between that time and 7:45 p. m. was not sufficient to charge the city with constructive notice that the hose was not in the gutter, but two or three feet out in the street, where a traveler fell over it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1647-1651; Dec. Dig. § 791.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 819*)—DEFECTS IN STREETS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a city for injuries received by falling over a fire hose left in the street to flush a sewer, evidence held to show that plaintiff's own negligence was the proximate cause of her injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 819.*]

Error to Circuit Court of City of Portsmouth.

Action by Margaret Lee against the City of Portsmouth. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Jno. W. Hopper and Frank L. Crocker, for plaintiff in error. S. Burnell Bragg and Jeffries, Wolcott, Wolcott & Lankford, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. Mrs. Margaret Lee, a married woman, brought this action against the city of Portsmouth, and recovered a verdict and judgment for $3,000 as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by reason of the plaintiff's stumbling over a hose pipe lying in the street, against or close to the curbing, at the intersection of High and Green streets in said city.

The gravamen of the declaration in the case is the alleged negligence of the defendant city in placing or permitting to be placed the said hose pipe in the street. It appears that High street runs east and west, and is paved with asphalt. Green street runs north and south, and is 60 feet wide. The accident to the plaintiff is alleged to have occurred at the southeast intersection of High and Green streets. On the day of the accident, which was the 6th day of November, 1908, the street inspector and some of the street hands had been engaged in flushing out one of the sewers of the city, which had become stopped up, and in order to flush out this sewer it became necessary to attach one end of a piece of hose pipe about 3½ inches in diameter and about 23 or 24 feet in length to the water hydrant located at the edge of the sidewalk on Green street, a little south of the south building line of High street, and place the other end in a catch-basin situated at the southeast intersection of the sidewalks of Green and High streets, allowing the water at full pressure to run through the hose pipe into the catch-basin, thence through the sewer. This sewer was so badly clogged that it became necessary, in order to clear it out, to let the water run through it, not only during the day, but also all of the night, and the accident here complained of occurred about 15 or 20 minutes to 8 o'clock in the evening. There was an electric light pole at the southeast intersection of the sidewalks of High and Green streets, with an arm or bracket extending from the pole about 6 feet in a northwesterly direction, and attached thereto was an arc street electric light, which light burned all of that night.

The plaintiff lived on the west side of Green street, about 2½ blocks from the scene of the accident, and on the evening of the accident she left her home about 20 minutes to 8 o'clock to go to a theatrical performance about 5 blocks away, and which was to begin at a quarter to 8 o'clock. She was accompanied by her brother and a little girl. It was a cold and windy night, and she was holding her coat around her neck and was walking fast in order to get to the theater in time. She was somewhat ahead of her brother and the little girl. Her course was down the west side of Green street to High street, and thence to the east sidewalk of Green street at its intersection with the south sidewalk of High street. There, as is alleged, she came in contact with the hose pipe, and, stumbling, struck her knee against the curbing of the sidewalk, and thereby received the injuries of which she complains.

With respect to the foregoing facts there is no conflict of evidence, and the only material facts about which there is any conflict of testimony are, first, whether the hose pipe was lying up against the curbing of the sidewalk, as testified to by the defendant's witnesses, or lying two or three feet away from it, as testified to by some of the plaintiff's witnesses; and, second, whether the city's servants put a red lantern on the curbstone on Green street, as testified to by several of the defendant's witnesses, or there was no lantern there, according to the testimony of several of plaintiff's witnesses.

The questions for our determination are: (1) Was the defect in the street complained of actionable negligence on the part of the city? and (2) if the evidence be sufficient to sustain the charge of negligence, as found by the jury, was defendant in error, plaintiff below, free from contributory negligence concurring with the negligence of the city and causing her injury?

[1] It has been repeatedly held by this court, and is the well-recognized rule of law in the courts of many of the states, as well as in the federal courts, that a municipal corporation is not an insurer against accidents upon its streets and sidewalks; nor is every defect therein, though it may cause the injury sued for, actionable. It is bound only to use due and proper care to see that its streets and sidewalks are reasonably safe to persons passing on or along them, when exercising ordinary care and prudence to that end. It is only liable for injuries resulting from defects in its streets or sidewalks, where it has negligently failed to do that which it could be reasonably required to do under the circumstances of the particular case. City of Richmond v. Courtney, 32 Grat. 798; Same v. Mason, 109 Va. 546, 65 S. E. 8; Same v. Lambert, 111 Va. 174, 68 S. E. 276, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 380; Same v. Schonberger, 111 Va. 168, 68 S. E. 284, 29

[2] Conceding for the sake of the argument that there is a conflict in the evidence, and, therefore, it has to be taken as true that the hose pipe in question here was lying in the street two or three feet from the curbstone, and that there was no lighted lantern there to disclose its presence, was this hose pipe an unlawful or an unreasonable obstruction in the street? It was unquestionably being used by the city in the performance of a public duty in cleansing one of its sewers, which had become clogged, and thus protecting the health and welfare of its citizens. This sewer was being cleansed in not only the usual way, but in the only way in which it could be properly done, and unquestionably the city had the right to put the pipe there for the purpose of cleaning the sewer in the manner in which it was being done, and for that purpose to allow it to remain there as long as the necessity existed, using only such precaution against injury to persons using the street as ordinary prudence would dictate under the circumstances. When this hose pipe, 3½ inches in diameter, was from necessity left in the street for the night, not only was it under an arc electric light, which burned all night, but the hose was filled with running water, and the noise of the water as it poured into the catch-basin was such that no one not deaf could fail to hear it. Unless it could reasonably have been expected by the city's officials in charge of the work that one in the possession of his faculties would fail to see a hose pipe 3½ inches in diameter filled with water and directly under an electric arc light, clearly the failure of the city to take other precautions under the circumstances would not render it guilty of actionable negligence. Certainly ordinary prudence would not have dictated that a policeman should be put there to warn travelers of the presence of the hose pipe.

[3] It is to be borne in mind that it is as much the duty of a municipal corporation to take due and proper precautions for the health and welfare of its citizens as it is to keep its streets and all parts of them in reasonably safe condition for public travel, and the principles of law fixing the liability or nonliability of the city in damages, where an injury on the street is sued for, and where the suit is for neglect of duty in the protection of health and general welfare, are the same and apply alike in both cases.

In the case of Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 132 Ky. 657, 117 S. W. 250, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 512, the opinion says:

"Without passing upon the correctness of the rulings of the trial court in respect to the evidence offered and rejected, we will proceed to consider the question whether or not placing the stones in the street and permitting them to remain there for the time mentioned was an actionable nuisance. It is elementary doctrine that cities and towns must keep their streets, and all parts of them, in reasonably safe condition for public travel; but streets can only be kept in reasonably safe condition for public travel by improving and repairing them. And, if it becomes necessary to improve or repair streets, the municipal authorities must of necessity have the right to put in the streets the material needed to improve and repair them, as well as the implements and machinery that it is requisite or proper to use in this kind of work. It would be most unreasonable to impose upon a city the duty to improve and repair, and at the same time hold it liable for accidents happening on account of horses becoming frightened at the material or implements or machinery used. In cases of this character the doctrine of nonliability should be applied, unless there is negligence independent of merely placing material in a proper place on the street. The city should, of course, exercise care in placing the material; and, if it is of an unusual character, the additional duty might be imposed of exercising reasonable care to prevent injuries growing out of the fright of horses using the street. * * *

"There is quite a difference between the liability of a city for placing or permitting to remain in its streets material or objects not necessary for the use of the city in the construction or improvement of its streets and its liability for occupying its streets with material that is needed for construction or repair. In the first-mentioned state of the case the city would not be keeping its streets reasonably safe for public travel if by its negligence it permitted them to become incumbered with articles or objects calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness; whereas, in the other instances, no liability would attach if proper care was taken in the location of the usual material."

An extended note to that case, after a review of very many of the decided cases with respect to the liability of municipal corporations for defects or obstructions in streets, gives the writer's conclusions from them as follows: "Nor is the temporary obstruction of a street for the purposes of improvement thereof unlawful, when a reasonable necessity exists therefor; and municipal corporations are not answerable in damages for permitting it. But the duty of a municipal corporation to improve and repair its streets and keep them free from obstruction is coupled with a duty to protect the traveling public while the obstruction exists, so far as is compatible with the temporary interference of those intrusted with their care. And obstructions of this class can be made only when a matter of necessity, and can be continued only for a reasonable time commensurate with the reasonable prosecution of the work; and the municipal corporation is bound so to guard and light the obstructions as to render the street reasonably safe for use, or to entirely close the street against the public if necessary to prevent accidents."

The case of District of Columbia v. Moulton, 182 U. S. 576, 21 Sup. Ct. 840, 45 L. Ed. 1237, is instructive as to when an obstruction left in a street is lawful or reasonable and when unlawful or unreasonable. In that case a steam roller which had been used in repairing the street was left close to the south curb of Park street, from 20 to 30 feet west of Pine street, and over the roller was placed a canvas cover. The plaintiff was injured as the result of his horse taking fright at the roller, and brought his suit to recover damages therefor. The trial court ruled that the facts did not present a case of negligence and directed a verdict for the defendant. In the opinion of the Supreme Court by Mr. Justice White (now Chief Justice), affirming the judgment of the trial court, it is said: "The steam roller in question had been brought to the place where the accident occurred for a lawful purpose, viz., that of performing a duty enjoined upon the district to keep in repair the streets subject to its control. The use of an appliance such as a steam roller was a necessary means to a lawful end—a means essential to the performance of a duty imposed by law. It must therefore follow that if in the legitimate and proper use of such machine, with reasonable notice to the public of such use, an injury is occasioned to one of the public, such injury is damnum absque injuria. Lane v. Lewiston, 91 Me. 292, 294, 39 Atl. 999; Morton v. Frankfort, 55 Me. 46; Cairncross v. Pewaukee, 78 Wis. 66, 47 N. W. 13, 10 L. R. A. 473, commenting upon and explaining Hughes v. Fond du Lac, 73 Wis. 880, 41 N. W. 407. Conceding that the roller was an object calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, yet at the most the liability of the municipality for negligently permitting such objects to remain within the limits of a highway, if it exists, must primarily be dependent upon the fact that they are unlawfully upon the highway.

"We shall assume that the period when the steam roller became serviceable while in use on Park street was the forenoon of the day prior to the accident, as claimed by the plaintiff. The right, however, to use a steam roller upon a public street for the purpose of the repair of such street we think necessarily includes the right to retain the roller upon the street until a reasonable time after the necessity for the use of the machine has terminated, in the meantime exercising due care in the deposit of the machine when not in use, and giving due notice and warning to the public of the presence of such machine if travel on the street is permitted. We can perceive no difference in principle between using and keeping a steam roller on the streets until the completion of a particular work, and the maintaining of a lawful excavation, such as for the construction of a sewer, or of an underground road, and the use of an engine, derrick, etc., in connection with the hoisting of earth from an excavation. The appliances used in connection with such excavations, even though calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness not familiar with such objects, undoubtedly may be retained at the place where needed until the necessity therefor has ceased."

In the case here, there is no conflict in the testimony given by plaintiff in error's witnesses, to the effect that the hose pipe in question was left lying close to the curbstone—I. e., "hugging the curbstone of the sidewalk along Green street from near its connection with the water plug to the catch-basin"—and that the city's servants placed at nightfall a lighted lantern on the curbstone on Green street, with that of defendant in error and her witnesses, to the effect that the hose pipe, at the time of the accident to her, was two or three feet out from the curb, and that they saw no lantern on the curbstone.

J. W. Wood, the street inspector, with an experience of twenty-odd years in that position, and C. E. Porter, the policeman on the beat where and when the accident occurred, both testify that the hose pipe was placed and left right up against the curb of the sidewalk, instead of two or three feet away; while defendant in error and her witnesses only saw the pipe after the accident, and in effect say nothing more with respect to the lighted lantern in question than that they did not see it. Therefore their testimony is simply negative in its nature.

Barrow, one of the city's street hands, testified positively that he had put the lighted lantern on the curbstone just south of the crossing at sundown on the night of the accident, that he went back there twice during the night, that it was still burning, that he took it away the following morning, and that it had not then gone out. Wood, the street inspector, states also that he saw the lighted lantern soon after supper, and that he usually ate supper at that season of the year about 5:30 o'clock.

[4] With the evidence of Wood, Porter, and Barrow before the jury and not in conflict with any evidence offered by defendant in error as to where the hose pipe was left at sunset on the evening of this accident, and what light or lights had been provided to disclose its presence, the jury, in order to find plaintiff in error guilty of actionable negligence, necessarily had to regard those city officials or servants as perjurers, or totally disregard their evidence; for, if the hose pipe was where these officials say it was left at sunset, 5:07 o'clock, and where no one could stumble over it, and the light to disclose its presence was what they say it was, plaintiff in error could not be held liable for negligence by reason of the location of the hose pipe, unless there was evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion that the city's officials, or some of them, knew or ought to have known that the hose pipe had become displaced from where it was left at sunset, and should have replaced it before this accident happened, about 20 minutes to 8 o'clock. Instead of evidence even tending to sustain such a conclusion, there is none whatever, and in the absence of all evidence of actual notice, it was not an arbitrary right of the jury to say that between sunset on November 6, 1908, and 20 minutes to 8 o'clock of that evening, was a reasonable time within which the city should have known of the defect in its streets complained of in this action. Portsmouth v. Houseman, supra.

Even though it had to be taken as true that the hose pipe was lying in the street two or three feet from the curb of the sidewalk, and that there was no lighted lantern on the curbing at the time of the accident, it is not a necessary conclusion to be drawn from the evidence that the plaintiff in error not only left this obstruction in the street, but negligently failed to do, as a precaution against injury to travelers along the street, that which it could be reasonably required to do under the circumstances.

[5, 6] Practically the only excuse defendant in error gives for not seeing the hose pipe is that it was the same color as the asphalt pavement, that the pipe did not have water flowing through it, and that it was lying flat on the street; and this is claimed by her although all of her other witnesses, as well as those for the defense, testified that the water was flowing through the pipe, and according to the proof, with which there is no conflict, the noise of the water passing through the pipe into the catch-basin could be heard by any one not deaf at least 60 feet away, and, further, that the burning electric light directly over the pipe was sufficient to enable a traveler on the street to see it when 100 or more feet away. Just what the defendant in error meant by her statement that "the electric light was real low that night, in the shadow," is not clear, since there is no evidence in the case as to the light being obstructed by a shadow, and she only says that she noticed the shadow after she sat down on the steps, and all that she testified to as to the situation then is based upon what she noticed after her accident and after she sat down. It was a cold, windy night, and she admits that she was hurrying to the theater to be there on time, and holding her coat around her neck and looking straight to the front—I e., down the street beyond where she was walking; so that, even if it be true that there was no lighted lantern on the curbing of the sidewalk along Green street, and there was a shadow on the walkway along High street, reasonably fair-minded men would never draw the conclusion that the injury of which defendant in error complains was caused by either of those conditions. Indeed, the only conclusion that can be reasonably drawn from her own evidence and the undisputed facts testified to on behalf of the defense is that defendant in error, by hurrying along the street, taking no precaution for her own safety, so directly contributed to the accident which caused her injuries that a recovery therefor is precluded, even though, as a matter of law, it could be held that the presence of the hose pipe in the street was an unlawful and an unreasonable obstruction therein.

In either view of the case, we are of opinion that the circuit court erred in not setting aside the verdict of the jury and granting plaintiff in error a new trial; and this court will enter here the judgment the circuit court ought to have entered.

Reversed.

CONSOLVO & CHESHIRE v. FERRIES CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. FERRIES (§ 16*)—LEASES—CONSTRUCTION.

The city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk were jointly entitled to the use of a certain ferry landing, though the county had legal title. This property had been leased for a long time, and previous lessees had extended the landing space by filling in a certain strip of land, and those lessees had used that land for over 20 years. Both the county and city leased the ferry and other joint property to the plaintiff's assignee, which lease included all of the ferry property belonging to both. On the same day the lease was made to plaintiff's assignee, the county leased the property filled in to defendant's assignee, which lease, after describing the property as part of the Norfolk county dock property, provided that, if the use of that property became necessary for the ferries, it should be released and given up. Held, that this land was part of the ferry property, and, as the defendants' lease recognized the paramount rights of the plaintiff, plaintiff was entitled to the use of this property when it became necessary for ferry purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ferries, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-40; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

2. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 8*)—TITLE TO SUPPORT.

Under Code 1904, § 2718, providing that an action of unlawful detainer may be brought by one ousted from the possession of land to which he is entitled, no matter what his title may be, the lessees of a ferry landing demised to them by the county of Norfolk and the city of Portsmouth may maintain such an action, though their right be only a license or a privilege.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 36; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 18*)—PARTIES—NECESSARY PARTIES.

The city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk were jointly entitled to the use of a certain ferry landing, though the county had the legal title. Both united in a demise of this property, and their lessees brought an action of unlawful detainer against persons holding part of the landing adversely to them. Held, that it was unnecessary that the county of Norfolk be a party, for its title could not be affected, by judgment in favor of the lessee, to land which rightfully belonged to the lessee under the terms of the demise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 84-87; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

Error to Corporation Court of City of Norfolk.

Unlawful detainer by the Ferries Company against Consolvo & Cheshire. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Edward R. Baird, Jr., for plaintiffs in error. R. Randolph Hicks, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action of unlawful detainer was brought by the Ferries Company against Consolvo & Cheshire to gain possession of a small strip of land constituting part of the wharf or landing of the Norfolk county ferries. The disputed strip of land lies immediately east of Campbell's wharf, and has a width of 5 feet and 5 inches at its northerly extremity, and a width of 11 feet and 5 inches at its southerly extremity. That portion of the county wharf which lies immediately adjoining this narrow strip is used as a station and driveway for the wagons, trucks, carriages, etc., that are to be transported across the river.

It appears that, from an early day in the history of the country until the incorporation of the city of Portsmouth in the year 1858, the Norfolk county ferries were maintained by the county of Norfolk. By an act of the Legislature, in March, 1858 (Acts 1857-58, c. 266), the maintenance of these ferries was imposed jointly upon the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk. This act provided, among other things, as follows: "No wharf or other property belonging to the Norfolk county ferry now established by law, or purchased for its use, shall be sold or otherwise disposed of without the concurrent consent of the council of the city of Portsmouth, and the court of said county of Norfolk, but shall be held for the use of said ferry."

The creation of the city of Portsmouth gave rise to a controversy between the county and the city as to their respective rights in this county dock. Arbitrators were appointed to settle their differences, who, among other things, found as follows: "As to the fifth item of said submission, viz., the rights of the said parties in the real estate situate in the city of Norfolk, now used as a landing for the Norfolk county and Berkley ferries, we do award, adjudge, and decide that the title to the said real estate—that is to say, the title to the soil or land itself—is in the county of Norfolk only, which is the legal owner thereof, but that this title and ownership is subject to the joint right of the said county and city to the ferry landing, and right of way over the said soil or land, and that the rights and interests of the said city of Portsmouth in the said landing, as now used, or as it may be hereafter used, are commensurate and coequal with those of the said county."

These findings of the arbitrators passed into judgment as the final determination of the rights of the parties.

[1] From 1858 to 1889 the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk jointly operated these ferries; but in 1889, pursuant to an act of the Legislature (Code 1887, § 1371 [Code 1904, p. 762]), the ferries were leased by the county and city jointly to Gill & Thomas for a period of 10 years, from 1899 they were leased to T. J. Wool and others for a period of 10 years, and from 1909 they were leased for a like period to R. E. Jordan. The granting clause in these three leases, executed respectively in 1889, 1899, and 1909, is as follows: The lessors " * * * do hereby demise and lease unto * * *, subject to all and every of the terms and conditions set forth, the following property, to wit: The property owned jointly by the city of Portsmouth and Norfolk county, known as the 'Norfolk county ferries,' together with all the steamers, boats, their apparel and appurtenances, and the wharfs, docks, landings, buildings, and all other property now owned by said city and county, and now used, or subject to be used, for the uses and purposes of said ferries."

The last-named lease to R. E. Jordan, dated March 31, 1909, was for a period of 10 years from that date, in consideration of an annual rental of $135,200, which, as compared with that paid under previous leases, is very suggestive of the enormous increase of traffic over these ferries in latter years. This lease by the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk to R. E. Jordan was assigned by him on the 10th day of April, 1909, to the plaintiff in this action, the Ferries Company.

The strip in controversy was originally water, and was filled up by Gill & Thomas during their lease from 1889 to 1899, and was used by them for billboard and storage purposes. This strip, which is now a hard, substantial wharf, since it was filled up by the lessees, Gill & Thomas, was used by the respective lessees without question during the 20 years from 1889 to 1909, as part of the property passing to them under their respective leases; and no serious question can be made that it is a part of the wharf or landing of the Norfolk county ferries, which are owned, so far as their use and operation is concerned, jointly by the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk, and no part of which can be sold or otherwise disposed of without the concurrent consent of the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk, but must be held for the use of said ferry. Acts of Assembly 1857-58, p. 173.

When the city and county advertised the last lease to be sold March 30, 1909, they stated that they would lease "the property owned jointly by the city of Portsmouth and Norfolk county, known as the 'Norfolk county ferries,' together with all steamers, boats, their apparel and appurtenances, and the wharfs, docks, landings, buildings, and all other property now owned by the said city and county, and now used or subject to be used for the use and purposes of said ferries."

On the same day (March 31, 1909) that the lease under which the plaintiff claims the right to the possession of the strip of land in question was executed by the county of Norfolk and the city of Portsmouth, the county of Norfolk, acting alone and without the concurrence of the city of Portsmouth, leased the strip of land in controversy to George W. Blanchard for a term of 10 years. This lease was assigned by Blanchard to L. M. Sylvester, who assigned the same to Consolvo & Cheshire, the defendants in this action. So that the claim of the defendants to the possession of the land is under the lease mentioned from the county of Norfolk to Blanchard.

The strip of land in controversy being, as already seen, part of the Norfolk county ferries property, and owned, as to its use and enjoyment, jointly by the county and city, the county, under the express terms of the act of March 25, 1858, had no power to lease it to any one without the concurrent consent of the city of Portsmouth. If, however, the county had possessed the power to lease, without the consent of the city, any part of the property, subject to use for ferry purposes, the conditions have arisen under which, by the terms of the lease made by it, the defendants must surrender to the Ferries Company the strip of land in controversy.

The Blanchard lease, under which the defendants claim, after describing the property demised as part of the Norfolk county dock property, provides as follows: "It being, however, understood and agreed between the parties hereto that if it shall within the said period of 10 years become necessary for the use and conduct of the said Norfolk county ferries, in the said city of Norfolk, that any portion of the property hereby demised shall be found to be necessary for the use of said ferries, then, and in that event, such portion shall be released and given up by the said party of the second part, and the Norfolk county ferries be allowed to occupy and use the same."

This provision of the lease under which the defendants claim is a clear recognition by the county of Norfolk, the lessor therein, that the strip in controversy is part of the Norfolk county ferries property, and expressly provides that it shall be surrendered at any time during the lease that it may be needed for ferry purposes. It conclusively appears from the evidence that the constantly increasing use of these ferries by the public has so congested the traffic as to make the use of the strip in question essential for ferry purposes.

The facts in this case impel the conclusion that the use of the property in controversy belongs jointly to the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk, and that its use passed from them to R. E. Jordan under their joint lease to him of March 31, 1909, and by assignment from R. E. Jordan to the Ferries Company, the plaintiff in this case; that its present use by the Ferries Company is a necessity for the operation of the Norfolk county ferries and the public convenience; and, further, that the adverse claim, under the demise from Norfolk county, asserted by the defendants Consolvo & Cheshire, is wholly inadequate to defeat the superior rights of the plaintiff.

[2] It is difficult to appreciate the defendants' contention that the plaintiff is asserting a right to a franchise and cannot maintain an action of unlawful detainer, the effect of a judgment in which is, as claimed, to give it an unqualified and absolute possession, when it is only entitled to a qualified right and qualified possession. The plaintiff is asserting a right to the possession of land that was leased to it by the owners thereof under a clear and explicit lease, which land is wrongfully in the possession of another. The effect of the judgment of the lower court is merely to hold that, under the facts shown of record, the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the land in controversy, to be held by him in accordance with the terms of his lease contract.

Section 2716 of the Code of 1904 provides that the action of unlawful detainer shall be brought against the party in possession. That the property right asserted in this case by the plaintiff can be recovered in an action of unlawful detainer, see Norfolk City v. Cooke, 27 Grat. 430; Power & Kellog v. Tazewells, 25 Grat. 786.

In the case last cited, the Tazewells, under authority of an act of the General Assembly, had leased for one year from the state inspector of oysters a lot covered by water below low-water mark for the purpose of planting oysters thereon. The Tazewells had staked off the lot, so as to designate it, but had planted no oysters thereon, when defendants took possession of the lot. An action of unlawful detainer was brought to recover the possession. It was insisted that the action could not be maintained; that the lease of the state was only a license or privilege; that the Tazewells had no title and no right of possession to the bed of the river covered by water, and therefore could not maintain an action of unlawful detainer. This court held otherwise, and declared that the lease to the Tazewells was not a mere license or privilege, but that it conferred rights of property in the soil covered by water, to which the plaintiffs had the right of exclusive possession, and that the action of unlawful entry and detainer was a proper remedy.

[3] The defendant contends that the county of Norfolk should have been made a party defendant to this action.

The county of Norfolk was not formally made a party, but the record shows that it was represented by counsel, who defended this suit through the lower court and in this court. It was, however, not necessary that it should be a party. The county of Norfolk, it is true, was the holder of the naked legal title to the property in controversy, while it and the city of Portsmouth were the perpetual joint and equal owners of the use and enjoyment thereof. The county of Norfolk was not in the possession of the property. On the contrary, it had united with the city of Portsmouth in leasing the same to the plaintiff for a term of 10 years, and, therefore, neither its rights nor those of the city of Portsmouth could be affected by a judgment in favor of their lessee for land which rightfully belonged to that lessee under the terms of their demise. The plaintiff had no other or different rights against its lessors after the judgment in this proceeding was rendered than it had before. The judgment only settled the right of possession as between the lawful lessee of the property and the defendants, who are claiming the possession under another and different lease.

There is no error in the judgment complained of, and it must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Error to Circuit Court, Louisa County.

Action by Richard S. White's administratrix against the Arminius Chemical Company, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

The following instructions were given and refused, respectively:

Plaintiff's instruction No. 1, given:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that after the notices were posted by the defendant at different times, with respect to its employes using the skips, to be carried to and from within the mine at their own risk, the defendant did not refuse, but continued as before such notices were posted, to so carry its employes, including the plaintiff's intestate in such skips, then such notices, so far as relied on by the defendant as a defense to relieve it from liability in this suit for its negligence, if any such there be, do not constitute such a defense."

Plaintiff's instruction No. 2, given:

"That, when the plaintiff's intestate entered the service of the defendant, the law presumes that he contracted with reference to the dangers and hazards incident to the business of the employment as the defendant conducted it at the time he entered it, and that the compensation was adjusted accordingly; and

"The plaintiff's intestate, while engaged in the service of the defendant, in the absence of any notice or warning to the contrary, or the same being obvious to him, or discoverable by reasonable care and observation on his part, was warranted by law in presuming that such dangers and hazards had not been increased in any way, and, in determining what was reasonable care and observation on the part of the plaintiff's intestate, the jury must take into consideration that the servant is not under the same obligation as the master to know the nature and extent of the dangers and hazards which may exist, unless they are obvious to him."

Plaintiff's instruction No. 3, given:

"That it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary and all reasonable care to provide hoisting machinery reasonably safe and suitable for use to which it was put by the defendant, and also to use ordinary and all reasonable care, skill, and supervision, forethought, and inspection to discover and repair defects, if any therein; and,

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the new hoisting machinery provided by the defendant as used by it before the death of the plaintiff's intestate was more dangerous and hazardous to his safety than the hoisting machinery which was provided and as used by the defendant at the time of the employment of the plaintiff's intestate, that this was, before the day plaintiff's intestate was killed, known to the defendant, or would have been known to it by the supervision, forethought, and inspection, before the death of the plaintiff's intestate, but was unknown to the latter, and was not obvious to and could not have been discovered by the latter by the use of ordinary and all reasonable care and observation on his part, that the defendant did not give any warning or notice to the plaintiff's intestate that there was any such increase of danger or hazard to his safety, that the fall of the south skip and the sudden stop and jar of same threw the plaintiff's intestate off therefrom and caused his death, and that this fall, sudden stop, and jar of such skip occurred by reason of such increase of danger and hazard, the jury must find for the plaintiff and assess her damages as provided in instruction No. 7 below."

Plaintiff's instruction No. 4, given:

"That it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary and all reasonable care to make and give proper regulations and orders to its hoistmen in doing their work, and to see that such orders and regulations were obeyed and carried out by them; and,

"If the jury believe from the evidence that to use the hand levers to control the brakes on the new hoisting machinery, for the purpose of holding the skip in the shaft with the plaintiff's intestate thereon, and for the purpose of stopping the skip when in motion going rapidly down the shaft, was practically the same means as those used with the old hoisting machinery for such purposes when the employment of the plaintiff's intestate began, and that the use of the compressed air for such purposes by such hoistman as the defendant intended to provide was more hazardous and dangerous to the safety of the plaintiff's intestate than the use of the said hand levers therefor, that this was known to the defendant, or would have been discovered by it, before the day plaintiff's intestate was killed, had it used ordinary and all reasonable care and skill in supervision, forethought, and inspection of said new hoisting machinery and of its operation, but that the defendant gave no notice or warning of any increased danger or hazard to the plaintiff's intestate, and that same was unknown to the latter, not obvious to him, and could not have been discovered by him by the use of ordinary and all reasonable care and observation on his part, then it was the duty of the defendant to have used said care and give some proper order or regulation to its hoistman, operating said machinery at the time plaintiff's intestate was killed, to use said hand levers for said purposes, and not to rely entirely on the compressed air, when handling men, and to have seen that such order or regulation was obeyed and carried out by the hoistman; and,

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant neglected to discharge such duty, that the compressed air was so used by said hoistman for said purposes, that it was due to the failure of the defendant to make and give such order or regulation and to see that same was obeyed and carried out by said hoistman that the compressed air was used for said purposes, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff's intestate was killed, the jury must find for the plaintiff, and assess her damages as provided in instruction No. 7 below."

Plaintiff's instruction No. 5, given:

"That it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary and all reasonable care to see that its hoistmen were reasonably careful in doing their work; and,

"If the jury believe from the evidence that to use the hand levers to control the brakes on the new hoisting machinery for the purpose of holding the skip in the shaft with the plaintiff's intestate thereon, and for the purpose of stopping such skip when in motion going rapidly down the shaft, was practically the same means as those used with the hoisting machinery for such purposes when the employment of the plaintiff's intestate began, that to use the compressed air for such purposes by such a hoistman as the defendant intended to provide, and did provide, was more hazardous and dangerous to the safety of the plaintiff's intestate than the use of said hand levers therefor, that this was known to the defendant, or would have been discovered by it, before the day the plaintiff's intestate was killed, and if it had used ordinary and all reasonable care and skill in supervision, forethought, and inspection of said machinery and of its operation, but that the defendant gave no notice or warning of any increased danger or hazard to the plaintiff's intestate, and that the same was unknown to the latter, not obvious to him, and could not have been discovered by him by the use of ordinary and all reasonable care and observation on his part, that the hoistman provided by the defendant, who was operating said machinery at the time plaintiff's intestate was killed, used compressed air for said purposes, that it was due to such use, instead of the hand levers being used therefor, that the plaintiff's intestate was killed, and that such hoistman before that day for a considerable time had habitually used the compressed air for such purposes, and had habitually not used the said hand levers for such purposes, in handling men, that this was known to the defendant, or could have been discovered by it, before the day plaintiff's intestate was killed, had it used ordinary and all reasonable care in supervision of such hoistman, and that such hoistman was not discharged, nor any effort made by the defendant to prevent such failure to use such hand levers, and such hoistman was continued in his employment until the plaintiff's intestate was killed, the jury must find for the plaintiff, and assess her damages as provided in instruction No. 7 below."

Plaintiff's instruction No. 6, given:

"That it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary and all reasonable care to provide a hoistman sufficiently experienced in the use of the methods furnished by the new hoisting machinery for controlling the brakes, and in fit condition physically and mentally to operate such machinery with reasonable care and skill, having regard to the safety of the other employes of the defendant, including the plaintiff's intestate, and also to use such care to inform itself, by supervision and superintendence, up to the time plaintiff's intestate was killed, whether the hoistman, who was operating such machinery at the time, was thus sufficiently experienced, and was also in such fit condition to so operate such machinery; and,

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the hoistman provided by the defendant, who was operating said machinery at the time plaintiff's intestate was killed, was not, at such time, sufficiently experienced in using compressed air, or, if sufficiently experienced, was not in a fit condition, physically or mentally, by reason of his being sick with the pleurisy, to operate said machinery with reasonable care and skill, having regard to the safety of the other employes of the defendant, including the plaintiff's intestate, that the defendant knew, or could have discovered before the day plaintiff's intestate was killed, such lack of experience on the part of such hoistman, or, sufficiently long before the plaintiff's intestate was killed for the hoistman to have been put off duty before he was killed, so knew or could have discovered such unfit condition, physically or mentally, of such hoistman, by the use of ordinary and all reasonable care by the defendant to inform itself on these subjects; and,

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the loss of control of the skip and its subsequent stopping with a sudden and violent jar threw the plaintiff's intestate off down the shaft and killed him, and that such loss of control of the skip, and such subsequent stopping and violent jar of the skip, was due to said lack of sufficient experience by said hoistman in the use of compressed air, or to his not being in said fit condition, physically or mentally, by reason of his being sick of the pleurisy, or to either of these things, the jury must find for the plaintiff and assess her damages as provided in instruction No. 7 below."

Plaintiff's instruction No. 7, given:

"If you find for the plaintiff, in ascertaining the amount of damages, you should assess same with reference:

"First. To the pecuniary loss sustained by the widow and the two children of Richard S. White, by reason of his death, fixing the same at such sum as would be equal to the probable earnings of the deceased, taking into consideration his age, business capacity, experience, health, habits, energy, and perseverance, during what would probably have been his lifetime if he had not been killed.

"Second. By adding thereto compensation for the loss of his care, attention, and society to his widow and children.

"Third. By adding such further sum as you may deem fair and just by way of solace and comfort to his widow and children for the sorrow, suffering, and mental anguish occasioned them by his death—the entire damages in such case not to exceed the sum of $10,000."

And likewise, after the introduction of the foregoing testimony, the defendant moved the court to give the jury the following 24 instructions:

Defendant's instruction No. 1, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the negligence of the defendant in this case cannot be inferred from the mere happening of the accident by which the decedent, White, lost his life. That fact does not raise even a prima facie presumption that the defendant was guilty of negligence or a breach of duty to White.

"Negligence of the defendant is an affirmative fact, to be established by preponderating proof. The party who affirms negligence must establish it by proof sufficient to satisfy reasonable and well balanced minds. The evidence must show more than the probability of a negligent act, or else there can be no recovery. An inference cannot be drawn from a presumption, but must be founded upon some fact legally established."

Defendant's instruction No. 2, given:

"The court instructs the jury that all employes serving a common master, drawing authority and compensation from the same source, although working in different grades and departments, are fellow servants, and assume the risk of each other's negligence."

Defendant's instruction No. 3, given:

"The court instructs the jury that under the evidence in this case, the hoistman, Schmitz, and the plaintiff's intestate were fellow servants, and if the jury believe from the evidence that the injury was caused by the careless manner in which Schmitz operated the machinery, and that said carelessness on his part was not due to incompetency or unfitness, or had not been habitual during the period after the installation of the new machinery up to the death of the plaintiff's intestate, then the jury must find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 4, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the defendant was not required in law to guarantee the absolute competency and fitness of its hoistman, Schmitz. It was only required to exercise ordinary care—that is, such care as a man of ordinary prudence would exercise under like circumstances—in the selection and retention of Schmitz as hoistman. And if the jury believe that the defendant did exercise such care in the selection and retention of Schmitz as a hoistman, then the defendant would not be responsible for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, White, if it was caused by Schmitz's incompetency or unfitness, and the jury should find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 5, given:

"The court instructs the jury that although they may believe from the evidence that at the time of the accident Schmitz was nervous and was suffering from pleurisy, and that the injury to White was due to these causes, still the defendant would not be responsible for White's death unless it knew, or ought to have known, prior to the accident, of Schmitz's condition, and did not likewise know, before the accident, that this condition rendered him unfit and incompetent to operate the hoist."

Defendant's instruction No. 6, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the happening of the accident by which the plaintiff's intestate, White, lost his life cannot be considered by the jury as evidence tending to show that the defendant knew, or should have known, of Schmitz's condition, or of his incompetency, if such incompetency existed. The burden is upon the plaintiff to show that Schmitz, the hoistman, was incompetent and unfit, and likewise to show that the accident was caused by his incompetency or unfitness, and that the defendant knew or should have known of the alleged incompetency or unfitness prior to the time the accident occurred."

Defendant's instruction No. 7, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the fact that the defendant, after the accident, may have adopted a different method for holding the skip in place, cannot be considered by the jury as evidence tending to show that the method adopted by the defendant prior to the accident was a negligent method."

Defendant's instruction No. 8, as modified by the court:

"The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of Mr. White to protect himself as far as he could, and take the safest place on the skip which the circumstances would admit, and that if he failed to do this, but took the more dangerous position, and that but for such position he would not have been thrown from the skip, then he was guilty of contributory negligence which proximately caused his death, and his administratrix cannot recover in this action, notwithstanding the fact that you may believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence but for which the accident would not have occurred, unless the jury shall believe from the evidence that the position taken on the skip by the plaintiff's intestate was his customary position, and that the defendant before said intestate's death had been accustomed to allow its employes to be carried in such position on its skip, in which case this paragraph of these instructions will not bar you from finding a verdict for the plaintiff."

(Underscored part being court's modification; such underscoring, however, not being there when given the jury.)

Defendant's instruction No. 9, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the defendant is not liable in this case, unless it had notice, either actual or constructive, of the unfit condition of Schmitz, if you shall believe from the evidence that he was unfit. Actual notice means knowledge of the fact that he was too ill to be safely entrusted with the work, and that to allow him to work would likely result in the death or injury of some third person."

"Constructive notice is that which the law imputes to the defendant from negligent ignorance; that is, its failure to observe some fact or facts which a person of ordinary prudence and forethought in a like situation would have seen and acted upon. In order to charge the defendant with negligence for failing to observe the symptoms of disease in evidence, it is essential that the plaintiff show that such symptoms did actually exist; that is, that the symptoms described in the evidence were exhibited and manifested by Schmitz. And this must be shown by affirmative evidence, and cannot be left to conjecture or presumption."

Defendant's instruction No. 10, given:

"The court instructs the jury that an employe assumes all risks from causes which are known to him, or which he could discover by the exercise of ordinary care, including the risks from the method of doing the work used by his employer. And even if there was a safer and better way to do it, if the danger was known to the plaintiff's intestate, or could have been known by him by the exercise of ordinary care, the jury must find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 11, given:

"The court instructs the jury that, no matter how dangerous the work in which a servant may be engaged, the duty imposed by law on the employer is to exercise ordinary care for the employe's safety, and by ordinary care is meant such care as a man of ordinary prudence would exercise under like circumstances; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant company exercised ordinary care to provide for the safety of the decedent, White, then the defendant company would not be responsible for his death, and the jury must find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 12, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the defendant company was not an insurer of the safety of the decedent, White, and was not required in law to adopt the safest and best means of providing for his safety. The law required the defendant company to use such means for providing for the safety of the decedent, White, as are generally employed by reasonably prudent persons engaged in the same kind of work under like circumstances; and, if the jury believes from the evidence that the defendant company used such means for keeping its mine safe as are generally used by reasonably prudent persons in the same kind of work under like circumstances, then the company would not be responsible for the decedent's death, and the jury must find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 13, given:

"The court instructs the jury that it is not negligence to fail to take a precautionary measure to prevent an injury, which, if taken, would have prevented it, when the injury could not reasonably have been foreseen; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant company, taking into consideration the conditions as they existed at the time of the happening of the accident, could not reasonably have foreseen that such an accident was likely to occur, then it was not negligence on the part of the defendant in not taking precautionary measures, which, if taken, would have prevented the injury, and the jury must find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 14, given:

"The court instructs the jury that an employé who knows the unsafe condition of the place in which he is working is not compelled to continue the work, but, if he does continue it, he assumes the risk, not only of those dangers ordinarily incident to the work, but also dangers as become known to him during the progress of the work, or which were readily discernible by a person of his age and experience in the exercise of ordinary care; and, if the jury believe from the evidence that the decedent, White, knew of the danger of riding on the skip, or ought to have known of it, and continued in the work, then he assumed the risk of injury, and the jury must find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 15, given:

"The court instructs the jury that it is their duty to try this case without being influenced by sympathy, or the mere fact that the injury to White resulted in his death, and the jury must disregard all questions of the relative financial conditions of the parties, as the jury, as well as the court, are under the solemn obligation of an oath to decide according to the law and the facts, and without negligence by the defendant as the proximate cause of White's death the defendant cannot be held pecuniarily liable."

Defendant's instruction No. 16, given:

"The court instructs the jury that it is the duty of the employer to use ordinary care to provide and maintain in a reasonably safe condition the place where the employé has to work; but the employer is not an insurer of the employé, not a guarantor of his surroundings. The employer is not liable for the consequence of danger, but only for the direct consequence of negligence."

Defendant's instruction No. 17, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the employer is required to anticipate and guard against consequences injurious to his employé that may be reasonably expected to occur, but it is not compelled to foresee and provide against that which reasonable and prudent men would not expect to happen."

Defendant's instruction No. 18, given:

"The court instructs the jury that the presumption is that the machine used by defendant was reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was used; and if the jury believe that there is in this case no evidence that the machine was not so, you cannot find for the plaintiff upon an alleged defect in the machine."

Defendant's instruction No. 19, refused:

"The court instructs the jury that if you shall believe from the evidence that said holstman sometimes operated said skips in a negligent and careless way, but that the plaintiff's intestate either knew or could by reasonable diligence have known of such habits, and made no complaint thereof to defendant's agents in charge, he assumed the risk of such negligent handling of the skip, if afterwards injured thereby."

Defendant's instruction No. 20, refused:

"The court instructs the jury that if you shall believe from the evidence that the skip descended the shaft with great rapidity from the point of starting therein, and this result could not have been accomplished except by throwing the brake left of center, then you are instructed that the proximate cause of the accident was not the leaking of the air brake; and if you so believe you will disregard the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth counts of the plaintiff's declaration, and consider only the fitness or unfitness of the holstman involved in the sixth count."

Defendant's instruction No. 21, refused:

"The court instructs the jury that under the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth counts of the plaintiff's declaration the burden is on her to show: (1) That the air brake was defective; (2) that such defective condition was the proximate cause of the accident. If, therefore, it appears from the evidence that the descent of the skip may have been due to the leakage of the air on the brake, or if it, on the other hand, may have been occasioned by the inadvertent act of the holstman in throwing the lever left of center, and you further believe that either of these theories is reasonably probable from the evidence, then you will disregard all of said counts, and consider only the sixth count of said declaration, involving the unfit condition of said holstman."

Defendant's instruction No. 22, refused:

"The court instructs the jury that where a person is confronted with two ways of doing his work, one safe and the other dangerous, it is his duty to adopt the safer course, irrespective of the degree of danger which may be in the unsafe course."

"And if the jury believe from the evidence that it was known to White that a ladder was provided for the men to go in and out of the mine, and that it was safer to use the ladder than to ride on the edge of the skip, then the decedent, White, was guilty of contributory negligence in not using the ladder, and the jury must find for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. 23, refused:

"The court instructs the jury that it does not relieve the decedent, White, from the duty of adopting the safer way to get out of the mines, by showing that other employes also adopted a dangerous way of coming out of the mine, when they could have adopted a safer way."

Defendant's instruction No. 24, refused:

"The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that there was a notice posted in the shaft house of the mine, before the accident occurred, notifying the men that if they rode the skips in and out of the mine that they would do so at their own risk, but not forbidding them to do so, and that the defendant had no interest in their mode of ingress and egress, that there was and is a ladder in said mine furnishing a safer, but more laborious, method of going in and coming out of such mine, then Mr. White assumed the risk of riding such skip, as such notice was sufficient to advise him of the danger thereof, though he did not know or appreciate the method or manner in which the brakes were operated on the engine."

Gordon & Gordon and P. H. C. Cabell, for plaintiff in error. F. W. Sims, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. White's administratrix brought suit against the Arminius Chemical Company, Incorporated, in the circuit court of Louisa county, to recover damages for the death of her decedent by the wrongful act of the defendant company. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,000, upon which the court entered judgment, and the case is before us upon a writ of error.

[1] The case was tried upon an amended declaration, which contains six counts, and the defendant is described as the "Arminius Chemical Company, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the state of Virginia." The Arminius Chemical Company, Incorporated, appeared and cravedoyer of the original writ, from which it appears that the sheriff of Louisa county was commanded to summon the "Arminius Chemical Company, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the state of Virginia," and that it was executed by delivering a copy thereof to R. L. Gordon, Jr., the agent and attorney of the Arminius Chemical Company, whereupon the defendant company pleaded that R. L. Gordon, Jr., was not the attorney of the company named upon whom legal process could be served, but was the agent for the purpose of receiving service of process on the Arminius Chemical Company, Incorporated; that they were separate and distinct legal entities; that the West Virginia corporation, the Arminius Chemical Company, expired on the 9th day of January, 1907, when it conveyed by deed of that date all of its property in the state of Virginia to the Arminius Chemical Company which was created a corporation under the laws of the state of Virginia on the 8th day of November, 1906, by the name of the Arminius Chemical Company, Incorporated.

The court rejected this plea and gave leave to the plaintiff to amend her declaration by inserting the word "Incorporated" after the word "Company"; and these two rulings of the court, refusing to allow the plea to be filed, and permitting the plaintiff to amend her declaration, are the subjects of the first and second bills of exceptions.

We think the rulings of the court were plainly right. There was at the time of the institution of this suit but one company which was the Arminius Chemical Company, Incorporated. It was the defendant in the suit. R. L. Gordon, Jr., was its attorney duly appointed under the laws of the state to receive service of process on its behalf. It was served upon him, and the Arminius Chemical Company, Incorporated, was thereby brought before the court.

[2] The defendant company also moved to quash the original writ in the case, because it was not made returnable in accordance with the law, in that it did not appear that it was made returnable within 90 days from its date.

The writ was issued on the 25th of November, 1908, and was made returnable to the rules to be holden "on the third Monday in January," to answer the administratrix of Richard S. White of a plea of trespass on the case; the objection being that the writ should have said "on the third Monday in January next."

We find no merit in this objection. Of course, it would have been better to have said "the third Monday in January next"; but the omission was immaterial. It could have misled no one who did not exercise some ingenuity to be deceived.

There was a demurrer to the declaration, and to each count thereof. Upon examination we find that, while the counts in the declaration are more elaborate than needful, containing much which might safely have been rejected as surplusage, yet in each, if the material facts which are well pleaded are proven, the plaintiff would be entitled to a judgment. In other words, each count states a sufficient cause of action.

The several preliminary exceptions and the demurrer to the declaration are therefore overruled.

With respect to the instructions given on behalf of the defendant in error, we find no objection, if there be evidence tending to prove the facts upon which they are predicated; nor do we find reversible error in the action of the court refusing to give certain instructions asked for by the plaintiff in error.

[3] This brings us to a consideration of the motion of the plaintiff in error to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence.

The defendant company is engaged in the mining of pyrites, and employs about 300 men. The shaft of the mine is sunk at an angle of 30 degrees from the perpendicular and 60 degrees from the horizontal. It is 1,060 feet deep, and from it at various depths levels are run off on either side, from which the ore is taken. The ore is raised by a steam engine, by means of an ore car or skip. The car is moved by a wire cable attached to the ball of the car; the other end of the cable being attached to a large drum at the surface, which drum is connected by a clutch or cog wheels which fit into the wheels on the engine. This connection is made by a lever, which is moved to the right to disconnect, and to the left to connect, by the turning of a wheel at the engineman's stand. When the drum is thus connected with the engine, the car cannot descend, and when it is desired to lower the car the drum is disconnected from the engine and it is lowered—or it would, perhaps, be more correct to say that the speed by which it is lowered is regulated by means of a brake on the drum. This brake may be operated by hand or by compressed air, by which pressure is brought to bear upon the drum. The setting of the brake by hand is effected by forcing a lever back and catching it in a clutch, by means of which it retains the pressure thus secured. The air, when used, has a pressure three times as great as that which can be secured by hand. The car runs upon a narrow-gauge steel track, and in order to facilitate the work there are two of these tracks over each of which a car is moved, being attached to separate drums, but drawn up and lowered by the same engine. In the engine room, immediately in front of the hoistman or engineman, there is a gauge upon which there are two hands, one red and one black, like those on the face of a clock, which indicate at all times the exact pressure of air upon the brake cylinder or brake, and the air pressure on the air reservoir, which is connected with the brake cylinder. This pressure can be increased or decreased at the will of the operator. There is an air brake for each drum, and a gauge for each drum. Both drums are under the eye of the hoistman, and any movement of either can be instantly observed. There is also a shaft indicator, consisting of a large dial, the hands on which point to the depth of the skip in the shaft from the top of the dump to the bottom of the shaft. The air is turned on or off of the brake by a hand lever 8 or 10 inches long, which is moved easily by the operator, but is stationary unless moved by physical force.

The plaintiff's intestate was killed by falling from defendant's ore car or skip. The hoistman testified that after he had landed the men from the north skip he turned to raise those on the south skip, and saw the drum turning the wrong way, and knew that the skip had escaped control; that he applied the air brake suddenly, turning the lever to emergency; that he did not know how it escaped control, but that he might have struck it inadvertently and knocked the air pressure off.

The lever referred to, by which the air is controlled, moves through a space of about six inches. The point midway between the extremes of its movement is known as the center. If the air is to be turned on, it is moved to the right. Moved slowly, the air pressure is gradually generated; moved rapidly, the pressure upon the brake is correspondingly increased. When it is moved from the center to the left, the air escapes and the pressure is correspondingly diminished.

As has been said, there are two skips, moving on two separate tracks—one known as the "north skip," and the other as the "south skip." The accident, which is the subject out of which this suit grows, took place about half past 5 o'clock on the evening of October 7, 1908. The north skip was at the 900-foot level; the south skip was at the 400-foot level. A signal was given to the engineman of five bells from the lower level, which indicated that the skip was to be drawn up with men upon it. The skip was an iron bucket, and the usual complement which each skip could bring up was twelve men—six in the bucket itself, one upon each of the corners (that is to say, four upon the edge), one upon the ball, and one upon the rope, making twelve in all. The north skip was brought safely to the surface, when the hoistman observed that the drum of the south skip was moving in a direction that indicated it was descending. Thereupon he applied the air brake by moving it to the right, and the movement was so rapid and the action of the brake so violent that the car or skip was brought to a sudden stop, and the men standing upon the edge or rim of the skip were thrown off, and the plaintiff's intestate was killed.

Just how the occurrence took place is not shown by the evidence. The theory of the plaintiff is: (1) That the machinery, especially the brake, was not reasonably safe; and (2) that the defendant had not exercised due care in the selection of a suitable hoistman, and had not exercised due care to see that he properly discharged his duties, and that upon the evening of the accident especially, as a result of an attack of pleurisy, the hoistman was not in a physical condition properly to discharge his duties.

The Arminius Company and its predecessors have been for a long time engaged in the business of mining pyrites. Machinery of various types has been in use. For a great while a brake operated by hand was used in regulating and controlling the movement of the ore cars or skips; but about two months before the accident a brake was installed, which was controlled by air pressure. The proof shows that this machinery was obtained from and installed by a manufacturing company in good standing; that the machinery itself was in perfect order, and that a man skilled in its operation came to the mine when it was installed, put it into position, and remained for two or three weeks instructing the hoistmen in its uses; that it was not a machine of great complexity, and that a man conversant with machinery of that general description could easily acquire the requisite skill safely to operate it.

It appears that Schmitz, who was the hoistman upon the occasion of the accident, had been engaged in that business for many years, and had shown himself to be a reliable and capable man. He had received instruction at the time the new brake was installed, and had operated it successfully. It does not appear that there had been any accident, or any circumstance to indicate his incapacity or unfitness for the service required of him, during the whole period of his connection with the company, during which, when the machine was equipped with hand brakes, the skip had been moved up and down, loaded most frequently with ore, but numberless times with men, without any accident or occurrence which caused his coemployees to question his fitness or give to his employers any reason to suspect such to be the fact.

On Saturday, October 3d, Schmitz went home. On Sunday there was no work at the mines, and he went down to his brother-in-law's, at Buckner station, to pay a visit, returning on the midnight train Sunday night. He did not go to work on Monday morning, because during that week he was on the night shift, and was due to go to work on Monday afternoon; but, not feeling very well, he did not go, and his condition at that time is thus described by him:

"The trouble bothering me has bothered me every time I catch cold in the last 32 years. I was struck by a tree 32 years ago, and whenever I catch cold I have a pain in my breast. I had broke in another hoistman, and I said I would stay at home. I helped my wife shuck corn Monday, and I didn't go to work. I sent a message to the mines that I was not coming down Monday night."

Tuesday evening Mr. Clearihue, who had charge of the mines, went to Schmitz's house, and according to the statement of Schmitz and of Clearihue the latter asked Schmitz how he was getting on, to which Schmitz replied that he was getting on fairly well. The manager then asked when he was going on. "I said I didn't feel like going that night, that I didn't want to go on until I felt like going, and he said, 'I don't want you to go on until you do feel like working.'" Wednesday, about noon, they sent a messenger to him again, a Mr. Kennedy, and Schmitz told him that he would come to work that evening; and it seems that, for reasons which need not be particularly stated, it was quite necessary to the running of the mine that he should be there that night. When Kennedy went to Schmitz's house, he was accompanied by a man by the name of Thomas, and Thomas says that he heard the conversation between Schmitz and Kennedy, and that Schmitz said that he did not feel much better; that his side still hurt him, but, being urged, that Schmitz "agreed to go and do what he could." Another witness proved that on October 7, 1908, Schmitz stated to him that he was really not in a condition to go to work that night, but that he had been sent for and urged to come down; but this particular statement, it seems, was made after the accident. Other witnesses proved contradictory statements on the part of Schmitz as to his physical condition during Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, as contradicting the statement which he made upon the stand, the substance of which has been given. It is to be observed that the contradictory statements made by Schmitz are not substantive evidence of the existence of the facts thus stated by him. He was put upon the witness stand by the defendant in error, and the only effect of the proof of contradictory statements is that it may counteract in the minds of the jury the hostile testimony which he had given to the surprise of the party calling him.

A Mr. Lewis P. Trice, who went to Schmitz's on Tuesday evening with Clearihue, the manager, gives this report of the conversation that occurred between Clearihue and Schmitz: "He wanted to know how Schmitz felt, and Schmitz told him he 'was not feeling very good,' and, if he did not feel any better, that he would not be able to come to work the next day. Mr. Clearihue told him he was very much in need of him, and would like for him to come as soon as possible, and he would do all that he could towards getting him the extra quarter in the day," which he said, in reply to a question by a juror, meant extra pay.

This statement, for what it is worth, differs from other contradictory statements alleged to have been made by Schmitz as to his condition in this: That if made at all (and of this the jury, of course, were the judges) it was made in the presence of Clearihue, who occupied such a relation to the company as to make notice to him notice to the company.

We have the testimony of those who visited and met him in the interval between Saturday, the 3d, and Wednesday evening of the 7th. We have the testimony of his wife, and that of Mr. Clearihue, to whom he reported on his return to work on Wednesday evening, and of one or more of his coemployees, whom he met at that time, that they observed nothing to excite suspicion as to his condition and his fitness to perform the duties for which he was employed. He was examined by physicians after the accident occurred, and was then in a highly nervous state; but that surely is not to his discredit. That he was broken down at the thought that, however innocently, he had been in some degree connected with a horrible accident resulting in the death of four human beings, was sufficient to unnerve any man of proper feeling. There was some effort to prove that he was drunk at the time, but it wholly failed. The physicians, who made a very cursory examination, say that they found him suffering from pleurisy, which extended over about four square inches of the surface of his left lung. The examination was superficial, and was made after the accident; and, while it may show that a prudent man would have remained at home, it does not tend to show any connection between his pleuritic condition and the accident, and is certainly not sufficient to bring home to the company such notice or knowledge of his condition as required it, in the exercise of reasonable care, to forbid his exercising his duties of hoistman.

It is said, however, that the air brake when left at center leaked, that the air gradually escaped and the pressure was thereby diminished, and the force of gravity set the skip in motion. The proof is that there would be an escape of air when the lever which controlled the air brake was at center; that air, being very attenuated and volatile in its nature, will escape when confined. A machine, we suppose, made so tight as to render the escape of air impossible, would be incapable of operation; but the proof is, and there is no contradiction of the evidence upon this point, that the machine, when properly operated, is safe and adequate to the perfect control of the hoisting apparatus. The force of the brake can be applied slowly, and the movement of the car will be gradually diminished; if applied rapidly, the force of the brake is such that the movement is suddenly stopped. All then depends upon the method of operation, and in the case before us the hoistman, finding the car descending, it already having fallen about 81 feet, and knowing, of course, that as it moved its descent would be accelerated, found himself in the presence of a sudden emergency. From center to the extreme right is only 3 inches, and in moving the lever from center to the right, where the extreme of movement was only 3 inches, he moved it so far as to bring to bear a pressure upon the brake which brought the car to a sudden stop.

But it is contended that the movement began as the result of the leakage of the air; that the leakage of air was an inherent quality which could not be overcome, and that it was improper to rely upon the air brake while the bucket or skip was swinging in the shaft, and in doing so the hoistman was violating the express directions of his instructor, and had done so so continuously and habitually that the Arminius Company knew, or ought to have known, of his conduct and taken steps to apply a remedy.

We do not so read the evidence. Turning first to the evidence of Schmitz, who was a witness of the defendant in error, he says, speaking of the evening the accident occurred: "The first thing I did was to pull the north skip from the 800-foot level, which was our rule generally to pull the men down below first. We always took the men in the lowest part first. When I got that skip to the top and landed it, I turned around to take the south skip up, and found it going down, and my first thought was to put the emergency on to save those men, and when it stopped it threw those men off. I don't know what caused it to move. When I first saw it, it was going at a pretty good speed." With reference to the use of the hand brake he says: "We wasn't in the habit of using the hand brake, only when we stopped over Sunday or overnight we put that on for a lock. * * * I did not use the hand brake on this occasion to hold the south skip suspended in the shaft. I used the air brake, because the air brake was safer and easier to put on."

Hester, also a witness for the defendant in error and one of the principal hoistmen or engineers, testified upon the subject of the air brake as follows:

"Q. Now, after the new machinery was installed, and up to October 7, 1908, did you use the air brake alone when handling men to hold the skips suspended in the shaft? A. Yes, sir; I used the air brake.

"Q. I mean, did you use the air brake in handling the men? When you were going to hold a skip suspended in the shaft with men on it, and you had to wait some considerable time, did you rely on the air brake to hold the skip? A. Well, most of the time; of course, I used the lever, also, whenever I left the engine any time.

"Q. You did not use the lever, except when you left the engine? A. No, sir— Well, yes, sir; sometimes when I was standing by the engine I used it, pulled the lever in.

"Q. You did do that? A. Yes, sir; I did.

"Q. In your position there as hoister? A. Yes, sir; I did.

"Q. You did do that often? A. Mighty near every time when I had occasion for swinging in the shaft.

"Q. You did that nearly every time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Why did you do that? A. Because I thought it was best."

This witness, it will be remembered, was on duty immediately before Schmitz, and he testified, in addition to what has already been quoted, that when he left the engine and Schmitz took his place it was in good order, working properly, and there was no difficulty in controlling the air brake whatever, that he had observed no leaks or escape of air, and that when he came back after the accident he found everything all right, just as he left it; that he used the air brake after he returned, and it worked properly.

Mr. Harper, who installed the machinery and gave instructions as to its use, says:

"Q. Now, Mr. Harper, the engine is used to raise everything there, and the air only is used in practice as a brake? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Or to control or retard motion; that is what a brake is intended for, isn't it? A. Yes, sir; that is what a brake is intended for. I will further state that in connection with these air brakes there are two auxiliary hand brakes that they use in case that they shut down over Sunday, or let the cages stand without any steam on the pumps, and they want to keep the engines from moving. They put the hand brakes on them. * * *

"I did not recommend the use of the hand brake in getting out ore, because it is slower naturally, and more laborious. A man has to get out of his position somewhat to handle it. It has a long leverage, and it takes considerable effort to pull it. In order to get out the product more rapidly, the air brake is quicker and more sure, and requires less effort on their part. So I recommended the air brake altogether. I only recommended the use of the hand brake when they were shutting down and had no air, and only as an auxiliary of safety to the air brake.

"Q. Now, when the engine was in operation, and the man was actively engaged in the work of the mine, which brake would he use under your instructions chiefly? A. The air brake."

It is plain from this that Schmitz correctly understood and applied the instructions which he had received. The hand brakes were auxiliary, not to the regular use of the machine in active operation, but when the mines were shut down on Sundays, or when the cages were left standing without any steam on the pumps and they wanted to keep the engines from moving. "I only," said Harper, "recommended the use of the hand brake when they were shutting down and had no air, and only as an auxiliary of safety to the air brake."

On the occasion in question, none of these conditions existed. They were in active and constant operation, there was steam on the pumps, and they had abundance of air, as was illustrated when, by accident or otherwise, the lever was moved to the right and the air turned in full force upon the brake. We have searched and searched in vain for any evidence that there was any increased danger in the operation of the air brakes over and above that which pertained to the operation of the machinery in use at the mines prior to the installation of the air brakes; on the contrary, the air brakes are more powerful, more efficient, and more easily controlled than the hand brakes.

Leaving out of view for the moment responsibility for the beginning of the downward movement of the car, the situation called for prompt action. According to Harper, the use of the hand brake is slower and more laborious. "A man has to get out of his position somewhat to handle it." Under such conditions, the almost instinctive act in such an emergency was to apply the force most easily within reach. Had he waited to get out of his position in order to use the hand brake, the disaster might have been still more appalling.

There are some minor circumstances proved by the evidence, introduced for the purpose of showing the unfitness of Schmitz, the holstman, for his duties, but which we do not regard as at all material. For instance, that while the south skip was waiting at the 400-foot level it was suddenly run up a few feet, and then allowed to come back; that the usual habit was to bring the skip from the lower level up to a level with the upper skip, and then draw them both up to the surface together, which was not done upon the occasion in question; that the skips, upon being drawn up, were sometimes carried above the surface for a considerable distance—10 or 12 feet. From all of which the argument as to the unfitness of Schmitz is deduced, but which to us seem to be altogether trivial and of no probative value; and it is possible we have omitted to mention other circumstances of a like character.

After the case had been submitted to the jury, they came into court and propounded the following question: "If we should believe from the evidence that Mr. Harper, the man who installed the machinery, fully instructed the holstman, Mr. Schmitz, in the manner and mode of using said machinery, but the said Schmitz was negligent in not carrying out the instructions, and the defendant was negligent in not seeing that they were carried out, then would the law under such state of facts allow us to find for the plaintiff?" In answer to this query the court said: "Yes; provided you believe the other propositions of fact contained in instruction No. 4."

Now, instruction No. 4 is predicated upon the idea that the use of brakes operated by compressed air was more hazardous than the use of the hand levers; that this was known to the defendant, or could have been known, had it used ordinary care and skill in supervision; that it gave no notice or warning of any increased danger; that the same was unknown to the plaintiff's intestate and was not obvious to him; that it was the duty of the Arminius Company to have made some proper order or regulation which would have required its holstman operating the machinery to use the hand levers for stopping the skip; and that the accident was due to the failure of the defendant to give such order or to make such regulation, and to see that the same was obeyed and carried out.

The defendant in error, in reference to what passed between the jury and the court, as above detailed, says: "Here is the very gist of the case, and the ground on which the verdict was based, namely, the concurring negligence of the hostman, a fellow servant, and of the defendant itself, which was the proximate cause of the intestate's death."

If we are correct in the conclusion we have reached, that there was no greater danger in the use of the air brake than of the hand brake, then the facts did not exist upon which instruction No. 4 was predicated, and the whole theory of the case upon which defendant in error relied falls to the ground.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the verdict should have been set aside and a new trial awarded, and this court will enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered.

Reversed.

SECURITY BANK OF RICHMOND v. EQUITABLE LIFE ASSUR. SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. DEATH (§ 2*)—PRESUMPTION.

The presumption that one who has left home and who has not been heard from for seven years is dead does not arise until the end of the seven years; but there is no presumption as to the particular time of death, nor that he was living at any particular time, within that period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-3; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 668*)—LIFE POLICIES—PRELIMINARY PROOFS OF DEATH—SUFFICIENCY—DETERMINATION.

In a suit on life policies, it is the duty of the court to determine in the first instance whether the preliminary proofs of death are satisfactory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1732-1770; Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 543*)—LIFE POLICIES—PROOFS OF DEATH—SUFFICIENCY.

Provision for payment of life insurance on "satisfactory proof" of death entitles insurer to demand proof with reasonable certainty, and is complied with by proof sufficient, standing alone, to support recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1347; Dec. Dig. § 543.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 550*)—LIFE POLICIES—PROOF OF DEATH.

A statement, submitted as part of a proof of death under life policies, showing that assured disappeared March 10, 1902, must be considered as of the time the proof was submitted April 22, 1903, and certainly not later than August, 1903, when suit was brought on the policies, as affected by the legal presumption of death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1359-1361; Dec. Dig. § 550.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 550*)—LIFE POLICIES—PROOF OF DEATH—SUFFICIENCY.

The presumption of death arising from seven years' disappearance and a statement showing that assured disappeared March 10, 1902, is insufficient to show his death before April 14, 1903, when the policies lapsed for nonpayment of premiums.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1359-1361; Dec. Dig. § 550.*]

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Security Bank of Richmond, Va., against Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following instructions were given:

"(1) That whilst the law presumes that a person who has left his home and has not been heard from for seven years has died, yet the presumption of death in such cases only arises at the end of the seven years; that is to say, that the presumption of law of death does not arise until the expiration of seven years. But there is no presumption of the law as to the particular time of death within the seven years, nor does the law raise any presumption that the party who has so left the state has continued to live, or that he is living at any particular time during the seven years; but the burden is on the party asserting such a claim to prove it by testimony satisfactory to the jury. And in this case the jury are instructed that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show to your satisfaction that Charles H. Hudspeth died before the 14th day of April, 1903, and unless you are so satisfied from the evidence of the proof of this fact you must find for the defendant.

"(2) That if the policies sued on in this case had lapsed by reason of nonpayment of premiums before the bringing of this suit, or that suit was brought before satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured had been furnished to the defendant, then the jury must find for the defendant.

"(3) That the statements set forth in the paper signed 'Jackson Guy, Cashier,' and marked 'A,' with the claimant's statement, are not 'such satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured' as is contemplated by the policies sued on in this case; and unless the jury believe from the evidence that further proof of the death of the assured was furnished to the defendant before this suit was brought, then they must find for the defendant."

Meredith & Cocke, Jno. H. Guy, and Samuel A. Anderson, for plaintiff in error. Christian, Gordon & Christian and Hill Carter, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Three policies of insurance, amounting to $17,500, were taken out by Charles H. Hudspeth in the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States. At the institution of this suit, the Security Bank of Richmond, Va., the plaintiff, was the undisputed beneficiary of the three policies, and brought its action to the first Monday in August, 1903, averring that Hudspeth, upon whose life the policies were issued, was dead, and asking judgment for the amount of the insurance.

These policies contain a provision which is as follows: "The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States hereby assures the life of Charles H. Hudspeth, of Midlothian, Va., hereinafter known as the assured, and on receipt of satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured, providing this policy is then in force, agrees to pay" the amount for which the policy is written.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and for grounds of defense said: (1) That the policies of insurance sued on lapsed for non-payment of premiums on April 14, 1903; (2) that no proof of the death of the assured has been furnished to the defendant, as required by said policies of insurance, and that no presumption of his death arose until the expiration of seven years from the time he was last seen alive, which time is stated by the plaintiff to have been about 2 p. m. on Monday, March 10, 1902; (3) that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the assured died prior to the time when the policies lapsed, on the 14th of April, 1903.

There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, to which the plaintiff applied for and obtained a writ of error.

Passing over the preliminary correspondence between the attorneys for the Security Bank and the Equitable Life Society, we come to the proofs of death furnished to the Society before the institution of the suit, in compliance with the stipulation in the policies above set forth.

The eighth clause of claimant's statement is as follows: "State all facts regarding cause and circumstances of death." Answer: "See paper hereto attached, marked 'A.'" The paper here referred to is as follows:

"He disappeared from Richmond about March 6, 1902, without warning to family and friends; was traced to Washington, D. C., by detective, who learned that he had been drinking very heavily. Since that his family have not had a line from him. We sent full description to all police bureaus and detective agencies, offering reward.

"It is said he was very ambitious to make money, was very despondent, and exceedingly dissipated. Had lost all of his means, which we think caused him to take his own life. Last time seen, as far as we know, was at Johnson Hotel, Washington, D. C., about 2 p. m. on Monday, March 10, 1902. After his departure, his room was searched, and in it were found a number of empty whisky bottles, carried there by him. It was also proven that he drank very heavily at bar of said hotel.

"His family also have made every effort to locate him, but without success.

"Attached to and made a part of the proof of death of Charles H. Hudspeth by the Security Bank of Richmond.

"Jackson Guy, Cashier."

The paper marked "A" was dated April 22, 1903, and on April 27th the general agent of the Assurance Society informed Mr. Guy that the proofs submitted were not satisfactory to his company. It appears that the policies sued on were kept in force until April 14, 1903, by the payment of premiums, and, no further payment having been made, they lapsed upon that day.

[1] After the evidence had been submitted to the jury, the court refused to give certain instructions asked for by the plaintiff, but instructed the jury: "That whilst the law presumes that a person who has left home and has not been heard from for seven years has died, yet the presumption of death in such cases only arises at the end of the seven years; that is to say, that the presumption of law of death does not arise until the expiration of seven years. But there is no presumption of law as to the particular time of death within the seven years, nor does the law raise any presumption that the party who has so left the state has continued to live or that he is living at any particular time during the seven years; but the burden is on the party asserting such a claim to prove it by testimony satisfactory to the jury. And in this case the jury are instructed that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show to your satisfaction that Charles H. Hudspeth died before the 14th day of April, 1903; and unless you are so satisfied from the evidence of the proof of this fact you must find for the defendant."

This instruction is in accordance with the decision of this court in Evans v. Stewart, 81 Va. 724, and correctly states the law.

The second instruction given was: "That if the policies sued on in this case had lapsed by reason of nonpayment of premiums before the bringing of this suit, or that suit was brought before satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured had been furnished to the defendant, then the jury must find for the defendant."

And the third instruction: "That the statements set forth in the paper signed 'Jackson Guy, Cashier,' and marked 'A,' with the claimant's statement, are not 'such satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured' as is contemplated by the policies sued on in this court; and unless the jury believe from the evidence that further proof of the death of the assured was furnished to the defendant before this suit was brought, then they must find for the defendant."

The case turns upon whether or not the second and third instructions correctly propounded the law. The case was argued ably and fully, orally and upon the briefs. A great number of cases were cited—a greater number than can be considered and criticised within the limits of an opinion; and we shall, therefore, refer specifically only to those which seem to bear most directly upon the points at issue.

[2] One of the principal controversies raised in the case is whether or not the preliminary proofs of death are to be passed upon by the court as constituting a condition precedent to the right to bring the suit, or whether it is for the jury to determine whether or not they comply with the provision of the policies, which required the plaintiff to furnish satisfactory proofs of death of the assured.

We are of opinion that the weight of authority imposes the duty upon the court to determine, in the first instance, whether or not the proofs are satisfactory.

In 25 Cyc. at page 947, note 27, in enumerating questions of law for the court, there is included: "The legal effect and sufficiency of the proofs of loss furnished in compliance with the requirements of the policy"—citing a number of cases.

In Citizens' Fire Ins. Co. v. Doll, 35 Md. 89, 6 Am. Rep. 360, it is said: "The preliminary proofs of loss required by an insurance company of the assured are not per se evidence to the jury of his loss. They are conditions precedent to his right to recover, and it is for the court, and not for the jury, to decide on their sufficiency."

In Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Stibbe, 46 Md. 302, by the terms of the policy the amount insured was payable in 90 days after satisfactory proofs of death. At the trial the proofs of death furnished in compliance with this requirement were offered in evidence by the plaintiff, for the purpose of showing such compliance. Held, "that the same were admissible for that purpose, and for no other, and their sufficiency was a question for the court to determine."

In Policemen's Association v. Ryce, 213 Ill. 9, 72 N. E. 764, 104 Am. St. Rep. 190, it is said that while the questions of fact, whether proofs of loss or of death have been furnished, or whether the assured rendered as full proofs of loss or of death as the circumstances would permit, are for the jury, yet the legal effect of such proofs is a question of law for the court.

In Gauche v. London, etc., Ins. Co. (C. C.), 10 Fed. 347, the court said that the sufficiency of preliminary proofs, there being no question of waiver involved, in a question of law for the court, and not a question of fact for the jury.

The case of Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Rodel, 95 U. S. 232, 24 L. Ed. 433, is relied upon by the plaintiff in error; but we do not think it bears out its contention. In that case the policy provided that payment should be made "ninety days after due notice and satisfactory evidence of the death of A. and of the just claim of the assured under this policy has been received and approved by the insurers," and it was held that the words "just claim of the assured" had reference to her claim or title to the policy, and not to the justness of her cause of action thereon. Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, said: "We think there was no error in the ruling of the court in admitting in evidence the proofs of death, which had been served on the defendant. Of course, the company could not justly contend that it might arbitrarily object to the sufficiency of the proofs; but it had an undoubted right to demand and insist upon such proofs as the law would adjudge to be reasonable and satisfactory. The objection to those furnished was that, whilst otherwise sufficient as proofs of the death of the insured, they disclosed at the same time a cause of death which exempted the company from liability, and hence could not be said to be sufficient proof of 'the just claim of the assured' as well as of the death of Rodel. * * * Proof of death was all that was required. This was given, and does not appear to have been objected to. If the proofs also disclosed facts of which the defendant could avail itself as a defense to an action on the policy, this would not derogate from the sufficiency of the proofs as proofs of death. But whilst the disclosure of such facts might well suggest to the company the propriety of refusing payment and standing suit, it would be no bar to the bringing of the suit; otherwise, no suit could ever be brought until the parties had gone through an extrajudicial investigation resulting favorably to the assured." We think it is to be inferred that if the proofs of death, as distinguished from the justness of the claim, had been the question at issue, and those proofs had been found insufficient by the court, the judgment would have been otherwise.

Noyes v. Commercial Travelers' Accident Ass'n, 190 Mass. 171, 76 N. E. 665, seems to support appellant's contention, and to hold that, under a provision in a policy for payment "within sixty days from the receipt by its board of directors of proof satisfactory to said board of the particular disability suffered by said member," it is a question for the jury whether the plaintiff furnished proof which reasonably should have satisfied the directors.

In Buffalo Loan & Trust Co. v. Knights Templar, etc., 126 N. Y. 450, 27 N. E. 942, 22 Am. St. Rep. 839, Judge Andrews, speaking for a unanimous court, said: "The words 'satisfactory proof' entitled the association to demand that the fact of death should be shown with reasonable definiteness and certainty, and if the proofs furnished failed to satisfy the association of the fact of the death, the association, acting reasonably and in good faith, could require further evidence. But the insurer cannot, under guise that the requirement that 'satisfactory proof' of the death of the assured should be given, demand information of the cause of the death. This would be a different subject. The information, however important it might be in its bearing upon a death from the excepted causes, nevertheless has no relation to the one fact which alone the claimant is bound to embrace in his proofs." That is to say, in his preliminary proofs. In that case the proof of death was satisfactory, and the insurer had no right to demand more, and could not require information as to cause of death.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 12 S. E. 18, it was held that: "Where the policy stipulates for preliminary proof of loss, and the declaration alleges that such proof was furnished, and where the whole declaration is denied by plea, the plaintiff is entitled to verify the allegation by submitting in evidence the affidavits which were furnished to the company as preliminary proof. But the affidavits are evidence for the sole purpose of showing compliance with the terms of the policy as to preliminary proof, and the better opinion is that their sufficiency is for the court. They are no evidence against the company of any fact stated in their contents. Though the policy stipulates that the preliminary proof of death, etc., to be furnished, shall be 'direct and affirmative proof,' any proof that ought to be satisfactory will suffice, although it may involve inference of the main fact from other facts, and therefore be properly denominated circumstantial, rather than direct, evidence."

From an examination of the authorities we have reached the conclusion that it was for the court to pass upon the sufficiency of the preliminary proofs.

[3] The question which next arises is: Did it correctly discharge that duty?

Every case seems to stand upon its own particular facts, and no precise standard, as far as we have been able to discover, is established for the guidance of courts in determining what is satisfactory proof of loss. As was said in Buffalo Loan, etc., Co. v. Knights Templar, supra: "The words 'satisfactory proof' entitled the association to demand that the fact of death should be shown with reasonable definiteness and certainty." But that is a variable standard. Perhaps as accurate a measure as we can apply is to say that if the preliminary proofs are such as, when introduced upon the trial of the case, standing alone and without further proof, would be sufficient to support a verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiff, they should be held to be satisfactory proofs, as a condition precedent to the institution of an action.

It will be observed, in the case under consideration, that, when the claimant was 1 upon to state all facts regarding the cause and circumstances of death, the reply was a reference to an attached paper, marked "A," which has already been copied into this opinion.

The instruction given by the court told the jury that statement A did not contain satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured, and that the jury should find for the defendant, unless they believed from the evidence that further proof of the death of the assured was furnished to the defendant before this suit was brought. The jury by their verdict, therefore, found that there was no such proof furnished to the defendant; and in the petition for a writ of error it is said that the proof offered upon the trial was but "an elaboration of the statements contained in the said proof of death." The whole case made by the plaintiff is, therefore, to be found in statement A.

[4] This brings us to inquire as to the probative value of the facts set forth in statement A; and here it must be borne in mind that the paper was prepared on the 22d of April, 1903, and that Hudspeth was last seen on March 10, 1902; that the suit was brought to August rules, 1903; and that the judgment complained of was rendered on the 10th of March, 1910. The evidence must, therefore, be considered as of the time the proof of loss was rendered, and certainly not later than the time of institution of the suit. In some of the cases it seems that the period elapsing between the institution of the suit and its determination was taken into consideration; but in that view we cannot concur.

[5] But, even if the period of absence down to the trial were to be considered in aid of statement A, it would not avail the plaintiff in error; for not only must it show that the assured is dead, which at the expiration of seven years would be presumed, and as to which the presumption would be strengthened as the period from his disappearance increased, but it is also necessary, in order to maintain an action in this case, to show that death occurred during the life of the policy—that is to say, prior to April 14, 1903. In other words, it would aid the presumption of death, but would be of no value as tending to fix the time of death. See Evans v. Stewart, supra.

In 2 Wharton's Evidence (3d Ed.) § 1277, the law is thus stated: "It has been incidentally observed that, aside from the general presumption of death arising from unexplained absence abroad for seven years, certain facts have been noticed by the courts as affording grounds on which inferences of death, more or less strong, may rest. Among these facts may be noticed: Presence on board a ship known to have been lost at sea, the inference of death increasing with the length of time elapsing since the shipwreck; exposure to peculiar perils, to which death will be imputed if the party has not been subsequently heard from; ignorance, as to such person, after due inquiry, of all persons likely to know of him if he were alive; cessation of writing of letters, and of communications with relatives, in which case the inference rises or falls with the domestic attachments of the party. Thus death may be inferred by a jury from the mere fact that a party who is domestic, attentive to his duties, and with a home to which he is attached, suddenly, finally, and without explanation, disappears. On the other hand, it is admissible to explain such disappearance by putting in evidence pecuniary embarrassments."

In Ryan v. Tudor, 31 Kan. 366, 2 Pac. 797, Mr. Justice Brewer (afterwards of the Supreme Court) said: "In reference to the death of Ryan, it is clear that there was no direct proof. The matter rests mainly on presumptions. The general rule in respect thereto is that at the close of a continuous absence of seven years, during which time nothing is heard of the absent person, death will be presumed. Now at the time of the commencement of this action only five years and eight months had elapsed since Ryan left New Hampshire, and at the time of trial seven years' absence had not fully run; so that, with nothing but the mere fact of unexplained absence before it, the court was clearly right in its instructions. It is true, that, besides the mere fact of unexplained absence, there were one or two slight matters bearing upon this question. While a man of good health, Ryan was past middle life when he went away. He told his relatives in New Hampshire that he would be back in a month. He told his agent in Kansas that as soon as he got settled he would write. He neither returned nor wrote. * * * So that perhaps the court ought to have left it to the jury as a question of fact whether, considering Ryan's eccentric disposition, his lack of family, his expressed uncertainty as to his future residence on the one hand, and on the other his age, his promise to write and return, and his long absence, his death ought, or ought not, to be inferred. Be that as it may, under the instructions as given, the jury ought not to have found as they did. As more than seven years have now passed since Ryan's departure, if no tidings have been received from him, the presumption of death unquestionably arises. But, whether dead or alive, defendants' obligation to pay remains. If Ryan be alive, they should pay the money to the agent, that it may be by him remitted to Daniel Fish in accordance with Ryan's instructions. If, on the other hand, Ryan be dead, an administrator should be appointed to collect this money and distribute it among his heirs. It is unnecessary that this suit be dismissed; for, if an administrator be appointed, the death of Ryan can be suggested, and the suit revived in the name of such administrator."

Tisdale v. Connecticut Mutual Life Ins. Co., 26 Iowa, 170, 96 Am. Dec. 136, was much relied upon by plaintiff in error. It seems to add but little to the force of the quotation from Wharton. There was evidence at the trial tending to prove the following facts: That the party upon whose life the policy was issued was a young man of exemplary habits, excellent character, of fair business prospects, respectably connected, and of the most happy domestic relations. He had the fullest confidence of his friends and the entire affection of his wife, and was living in apparent happiness, with no cause of discontent with his condition, which would have influenced him to break the domestic and social ties with which he was so pleasantly bound to life. Visiting Chicago, September 25, 1866, upon business, he was last seen by an acquaintance on the corner of Lake and Clark streets in that city, about 3 o'clock p. m. of that day. No trace of him was afterward discovered, though his friends made every effort to find him and ascertain the cause of his mysterious disappearance. A large reward was offered through the newspapers for information that would lead to his discovery, either dead or in life. The detective police were employed to search for him without results. No tidings have been received of him, and not the faintest trace of the cause or manner of his disappearance has been discovered. He gave no intimation to any one of an intention to absent himself, and the latest declaration of his intentions was to the effect that he expected to leave Chicago the day of his disappearance to join his wife at Dubuque. He owed no debts amounting to any considerable sum, and had made payment of some small ones about the day of his disappearance. His valise, containing clothing and other articles commonly carried by travelers, was found at his hotel. His bill there was unpaid. The reporter says that a further statement of the evidence is not necessary for a proper understanding of the points ruled. It is said in the opinion: "Any facts or circumstances relating to the character, habits, condition, affections, attachments, prosperity, and objects in life, which usually control the conduct of men, and are the motives of their actions, are competent evidence, from which may be inferred the death of one absent and unheard from, whatever has been the duration of such absence. A rule excluding such evidence would ignore the motives which prompt human actions, and forbid inquiry into them in order to explain the conduct of men. The true doctrine may be readily illustrated thus: An honored and upright citizen, who, through a long life, has enjoyed the fullest confidence of all who knew him, prosperous in business and successful in the accumulation of wealth, rich in the affection of wife and children, and attached to their society, contented in the enjoyment of his possessions, fond of the associations of his friends, and having that love of country which all good men possess, with no habits or affections contrary to these traits of character, journeys from his home to a distant city and is never afterward heard of. Must seven years pass, or must it be shown that he was last seen or heard of in peril, before his death can be presumed? No greater wrong could be done to the character of the man than to account for his absence, even after the lapse of a few short months, upon the ground of a wanton abandonment of his family and friends. He could have lived a good and useful life to but little purpose, if those who knew him could even entertain such a suspicion."

In Seeds, Executor, v. Grand Lodge of Iowa, etc., 93 Iowa, 175, 61 N. W. 411, the court held that where a married man leaves home because his wife declines to live with him, and later professes to be unmarried and states that he is going to Dakota, is in good health when last seen, and six years after his disappearance he is advertised for to receive a legacy, "there is no presumption of death by reason of the fact that he has not been heard from in seven years. At any rate, it will not be presumed that he dies within two years after disappearing, so as to render valid an insurance policy which lapsed at the end of said two years for non-payment of dues and assessments." In that case, while the law of Tisdale v. Insurance Co., supra, is not questioned, the facts of the two cases are differentiated, and Rowell, the beneficiary in the case in 93 Iowa, 175, 61 N. W. 411, is shown to be a very different man from Tisdale. The court states that "he was wanting in the character, habits, condition, affections, attachments, and objects in life which usually draw men to their families, their homes, and the society in which they have lived. It was evidently not his purpose to return and dwell with his family; but, cast off as he was for his own fault, and with the character and inclinations which he evidently possessed, his object was to entirely withdraw himself from them. There is nothing in the condition of his health from which to infer death, for it is shown that when last seen he was in usual good health."

Contrast the proof furnished in statement A with the facts in Tisdale's Case, supra, and one cannot but be impressed with the fact that the two cases differ in almost every circumstance. We have given statement A our most careful consideration, and we are of opinion, first (as before stated), that it was the province of the court to determine whether or not it furnished sufficient proof of death; second, that the court correctly held that it did not furnish sufficient proof of death; and, third, that if the court had submitted that question to the jury, and they had found for the plaintiff upon the faith of the facts stated in statement A, which we have seen contained all the facts of probative value introduced before the jury, it would have been the duty of the court to have set aside the verdict; and therefore we are of opinion, from every point of view, that there is no error in the judgment of the lower court, which is affirmed.

Affirmed.

GORDON v. JOYNER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 8, 1911.)

1. TAXATION (§ 748*)—TAX DEED—LIMITATION.

To entitle a purchaser at a tax sale to the benefit, of Code 1904, § 661, providing that where a purchaser of real estate, sold for taxes under section 666, has obtained a deed therefor and the same has been duly recorded, the title shall be vested in the grantee, subject to be defeated only by proof of specified facts in a suit brought within two years, his deed must have been executed by the proper clerk after the expiration of two years from the date of the tax sale, and after the purchaser has given the four months notice required by section 655.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1494-1499; Dec. Dig. § 748.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 749*)—TAX DEED—EXECUTION—POWER OF CLERK.

The authority conferred on a clerk to execute a tax deed to a purchaser after two years from the date of the tax sale and after four months' notice to redeem, conferred by Code 1904, § 655, is a naked power not coupled with an interest, and must be strictly complied with in order to render a deed executed by him of any validity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1496; Dec. Dig. § 749.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 746*)—TAX DEED—EXECUTION—PERSON AUTHORIZED.

In the absence of a curative statute, a tax deed executed by a person other than the official designated by law to make the same is a nullity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1491, 1492; Dec. Dig. § 746.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 750*)—TAX DEED—NOTICE—FAILURE TO SERVE—EFFECT.

Code 1904, § 655, provides that after two years from the date of a tax sale the purchaser may obtain a deed from the proper clerk, and declares that in no case shall a deed be executed to a purchaser until after he has given to the person or persons therein mentioned, who are supposed to be interested in the land as owners or lienors and entitled to redeem, four months' notice of the purchase, etc. Held, that a tax deed issued to a purchaser without such notice was a nullity, and was not cured by any of the provisions of section 661, providing that the deed of a purchaser of land sold for taxes pursuant to section 666 shall not be set aside, except on specified grounds, and that no suit shall be brought to vacate the same, except for fraud, after two years.

Error to Corporation Court of Newport News.

Action by Collins Joyner against Harris Gordon. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Allan D. Jones and R. M. Lett, for plaintiff in error. Samuel R. Buxton, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The only question to be determined on this writ of error is whether a deed made to a purchaser at a delinquent land tax sale before he has given the notice required by section 655 of Code Va. 1904 is void, or whether the failure to give such notice is an irregularity which is cured by section 661 of the same Code.

Section 655 provides that, after two years have expired from the date of a tax sale, such purchaser may obtain a deed from the proper clerk, but declares that "in no case shall a deed be made to any such purchaser of any such real estate until after such purchaser has given" to the person or persons therein mentioned, who are supposed to be interested in the land as owners or lienors and entitled to redeem the same, "four months' notice of his said purchase, * * * and the person entitled to redeem said real estate shall have the right to redeem the same at any time before the expiration of the said four months, although such time extend beyond the two years first mentioned herein."

Section 661 provides that where the purchaser of any real estate so sold, or sold in pursuance of section 655, has obtained a deed therefor, and the same has been duly admitted to record in the proper clerk's office, the right or title to such estate shall stand vested in the grantee in such deed as was vested in the party assessed with the taxes or levies on account of which the sale was made, etc., subject to be defeated only by proof (1) that the taxes, etc., for which it was sold were not properly chargeable thereon; (2) that the taxes, etc., properly chargeable on such real estate had been paid; (3) that the notice of the tax sale, where made to a person other than the commonwealth, or notice of the application to purchase, in case the sale was made under section 655, had not been duly given; or (4) that the payment or redemption of said real estate was prevented by fraud or concealment on the part of the purchaser. That section further provides that no suit shall be brought to set aside, cancel, or annul such deed, except for fraud, as therein provided, unless within two years after the same is properly admitted to record.

[1, 2] In order for a purchaser at a tax sale to be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of section 661, he must have obtained his deed in accordance with the provisions of section 655; that is, his deed must be executed by the proper clerk (unless the clerk himself be the purchaser) after the expiration of two years from the date of the tax sale, and after the purchaser has given the notice required by that section. The authority conferred upon the clerk to execute the deed is a mere naked power not coupled with an interest, and must be strictly complied with. No rule of law is more firmly settled than that in the case of a naked power, every prerequisite to its exercise must precede it. Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 203, 316, 25 S. E. 232, and authorities cited; Reusens v. Lawson, 81 Va. 226, 236, 21 S. E. 347; Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Grat. 421, 435, and cases cited.

[3] In the absence of a curative statute, if the deed be executed by a person other than the official designated by law to make the deed, it is, of course, a nullity. If authorities be needed for so plain a proposition, they can be found in Judge Allen's opinion in Flanagan v. Grimmet, supra. If the official be authorized to make the deed after a time named, and he execute it before that time elapses, the deed is also a nullity. Bowe v. City of Richmond, 109 Va. 254, 260, 64 S. E. 51; Bradley, Tr., v. Patterson, 112 Va. —, 70 S. E. 540, decided at March term, 1911; Minor on Tax Titles, p. 111, and cases cited. And, a fortiori, the deed must be a nullity when the purchaser not only obtains it without complying with the conditions which entitle him to a deed—i. e., giving the notice required—but when executed by an official in plain violation of the statute which prohibits him from making the deed until four months after the required notice has been given.

[4] It may be true, as argued, that the Legislature has the power to authorize a conveyance to be made to a purchaser at a tax sale without requiring some such notice as that provided for by section 655; but it has not done so. On the contrary, the Legislature has declared that the purchaser shall give notice of his purchase, and that he is not entitled to a deed until he has done so.

There is nothing, as it seems to us, in section 661 which validates a deed executed to a purchaser at a tax sale in violation of section 655. The deed must be made by the clerk. It cannot be made until after two years expire from day of sale, nor until four months after the notice required by that section has been given. The purchaser at a tax sale must comply with the provisions of section 655 before he is entitled to a deed which will give him the benefit of curative provisions of section 661. See Va. Coal Co. v. Thomas, 97 Va. 557, 34 S. E. 486; Va. Building, etc., Co. v. Glenn, 99 Va. 460, 39 S. E. 136; Bowe v. City of Richmond, supra; Bradley v. Patterson, supra.

The provision in section 655 requiring the purchaser to give notice of his purchase as therein provided was not in that section when section 661 was enacted as it now stands, March 7, 1900 (Acts 1899-1900, pp. 1234, 1235), but was afterwards enacted by amending section 655 of the Code of 1887 by an act approved April 2, 1902 (Acts 1901-02, p. 779). Section 661 as found in Code Va. 1904 (not as it was when the deed under consideration in the case of Va. Building, etc., Co. v. Glenn, supra, 99 Va. 460, 462, 39 S. E. 136, was executed) does provide that the deed of a purchaser at a tax sale or under the provisions of section 666 of the Code may be set aside, annulled, or canceled by a suit brought for that purpose within two years from the recordation of the deed, upon the ground, among others, that "the notice of the tax sale where made to a person other than the commonwealth, or notice of the application to purchase in case the sale was made under section 666, has not been duly given." Whatever may be the effect of that provision in section 661, as amended, upon the rights of a purchaser under section 666 where the notice required by that section has not been given (Va. Building, etc., Co. v. Glenn, supra), it has no reference to the failure to give the notice required by section 655, because at the time that provision was inserted in section 661 the purchaser at a tax sale was not required to give notice of his purchase before obtaining his deed, as he now is under section 655 (Code 1887, and Acts 1901-02, p. 779), and because the language of the provision in section 661 shows that it refers to the "notice of the tax sale" when bid off by such purchaser, and not to the "notice of his said purchase," as provided for in section 655, as amended.

There are several reasons of public policy why a tax deed obtained by a purchaser who has complied with all the requirements of section 655 should cure irregularities in the proceedings which led up to the sale, and for which such purchaser is in no wise responsible; but there is no reason in a sound public policy or in good morals why a purchaser at a tax sale, who has failed or refused to comply with the conditions upon which he is entitled to a deed and has obtained it in express violation of law, should be permitted to take advantage of his own negligence or wrong and have the same curative effect given the deed as if it had been obtained in accordance with law.

The court is of opinion that, the deed in question having been executed not only without authority, but in plain violation of the positive prohibition of section 655 of the Code, under which it was obtained, is a nullity, and that the trial court erred in not so holding. Since the plaintiff's right to recover depended upon the validity of that deed, it follows that the judgment of the trial court, to whom all matters of law and fact were submitted, must be reversed; and this court will enter such judgment as that court ought to have entered.

Reversed.

STATE v. BATES.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1084*)—DEATH SENTENCE—STAY PENDING APPEAL.

A stay of execution of a death sentence pending appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial will not be granted, where only a question of fact relating to the sanity of accused is involved, and an examination of the record discloses abundant evidence to support the finding of the trial judge.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; J. S. Wilson, Judge.

Application by J. B. Bates for a stay of execution of a death sentence pending an appeal from an order refusing a motion for a new trial, etc. Denied.

See, also, 69 S. E. 1075.

Stanyarne Wilson, for appellant. J. C. Otts, Sol., for the State.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a stay of the execution of a sentence of death imposed in this case, pending appeal from an order refusing a motion for a new trial and from the sentence of the court.

The general rule is that no appeal lies from an order of a circuit judge refusing a motion for a new trial, where questions of fact only are involved. In this case the sole question of fact involved is the sanity of the defendant. Upon careful examination of the record, we find that there is abundant evidence to support the finding of the circuit judge, and no errors of law are shown in the record. It follows, therefore, that no prima facie case has been made out for the interference of this court.

The motion for a stay of the sentence is refused.

VERNER et al. v. MULLER et al., County Com'rs.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 14, 1911.)

1. STATUTES (§ 123*)—TITLE—SUBJECTS OF ACT—"ACQUISITION."

Act Feb. 20, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1431), is entitled "An act to provide for free bridges across the Congaree and Broad rivers between Columbia township, in Richland county and the county of Lexington, the acquisition thereof by Columbia township, and the issue of bonds, if approved by the electors of Columbia township, for the purpose of such acquisition." Section 7 of the act declares that authority is given to build or purchase and to maintain such bridges, etc. Held, that the word "acquisition," as used in the title, meaning the act of getting or obtaining something already in existence or that may be brought into existence through the means employed to acquire it, included the acquiring of a bridge by construction as well as by purchase; and hence the act was not unconstitutional as containing matter not expressed in its title, in that it authorized the construction of new bridges as well as the purchase of those already in existence.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 130-132, 176-183; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, p. 7562.]

2. TOWNS (§ 52*)—TOWNSHIP BONDS—ELECTION—MANAGERS—APPOINTMENT—DE FACTO OFFICERS.

Act Feb. 20, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1431), provided for an election to authorize or reject the issuance of township bonds to pay for certain bridges, and declared that the managers of the election should be appointed by the board of county commissioners. The managers were appointed by the chairman of the board and approved by the board, which authorized the chairman to fill any vacancy which might occur, and some vacancies were so filled. Held that, though original appointment by the board was essential, those appointed in the absence of any proof of fraud or unfairness in the conduct of the election were de facto officers, and the election fairly conducted by them valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Towns, Cent. Dig. §§ 90-94; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

3. ELECTIONS (§ 203*)—POLLING PLACE—STATUTES—"NEAR."

Civ. Code 1902, § 203, provides that at all general elections held in the state the same shall be conducted at the polling precincts fixed by law in the various counties, cities, and towns, the location of which shall be as designated, and then declares that, at the Waverly precinct, in R. county, the polling place shall be "at or near the fork of the Rice Creek spring and Camden road." Held, that it could not be said as a matter of law that a polling place located a quarter of a mile from the crossing of the stream and road was not properly located "near" such point.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4687-4690.]

4. TOWNS (§ 52*)—ELECTION—ISSUANCE OF BONDS—IRREGULARITY.

Improper location of a polling place in a precinct was insufficient to invalidate an election to determine whether township bridge bonds should be issued, where a rejection of all the votes in such precinct would not change the result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Towns, Cent. Dig. §§ 90-94; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

5. TOWNS (§ 52*)—BONDS—ELECTION—CERTIFYING RESULT.

Under Act Feb. 20, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1431), authorizing an election for the issuance of bridge bonds by a township in R. county, and providing that the managers of the election shall conduct, direct, and declare the result thereof, and make returns in writing to the county board of commissioners, and that the county board shall issue the bonds if a majority of the votes cast at the election shall be in favor of issuing the same, it was not essential to the validity of the election that a certificate be filed with the Secretary of State and Governor by the board of county canvassers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Towns, Cent. Dig. §§ 90-94; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

6. TOWNS (§ 52*)—TOWNSHIP BONDS—STATUTES—TAXATION.

Act Feb. 20, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1431), authorizing the issuance of bonds by C. township to acquire bridges, provided that, on the issuance of the bonds or any part of the same, it should be the duty of the officers charged with the assessment, levying, and collection of taxes to levy and collect annually from all property, real and personal, within the township a sum sufficient to pay interest on the bonds, and one-twentieth of the principal to constitute a sinking fund to retire the bonds at maturity. Held, that such act sufficiently provided for the levy of a tax with which to meet the interest and sinking fund requirements when the same should become due.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Towns, Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

7. TOWNS (§ 52*)—BONDS—INJUNCTION—SINKING FUND.

That a statute under which town bonds were issued did not contain a sufficient provision for the levying of a tax with which to meet the interest and sinking fund requirements when the bonds should become due was no ground for enjoining the issuance of the bonds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Towns, Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Petition by James S. Verner and another to enjoin W. F. Muller and others, as members of the Board of County Commissioners of Richland County, from issuing certain township bonds for bridge purposes. Injunction denied, and petition dismissed.

Weston & Aycock, for petitioners. Clarkson & Clarkson, for respondents.

JONES, C. J. The petitioners, as taxpayers, seek to enjoin the board of county commissioners of Richland county from issuing certain coupon bonds of Columbia township in Richland county about to be issued under alleged authority of the act of February 20, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1431).

[1] It is contended, first, that the act is in violation of section 17, article 3, of the Constitution, providing: "Every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject and that shall be expressed in the title." The title of the act is: "An act to provide for free bridges across the Congaree and Broad rivers in this state, between Columbia township in Richland county and the county of Lexington, the acquisition thereof by said Columbia township, and the issue of bonds, if approved by the electors of Columbia township, for the purpose of such acquisition." Section 7 of the act provides: "That authority is hereby given to build or purchase, and to maintain said bridges," etc. The point made is that the title authorizes only the purchase or acquisition of bridges now standing, while the body of the act permits the construction of new bridges as well as the purchase of those now standing. The mandate of the Constitution is complied with if the title states the general subject of legislation and the provisions in the body of the act are germane thereto as means to accomplish the object expressed in the title. Connor v. Railroad, 23 S. C. 427; State v. O'Day, 74 S. C. 448, 54 S. E. 607. The provision in the body of the statute is not only germane to the subject expressed in the title, but is clearly within the meaning of the words of the title. "Acquisition" is the act of getting or obtaining something, which may be already in existence, or may be brought into existence through the means employed to acquire it. A bridge may be acquired by construction as well as by purchase. Moreover, the object was to provide free bridges. This contention cannot be sustained.

[2] It is next alleged that the election was invalid because some of the managers were appointed by the chairman of the board of county commissioners, whereas the statute required the appointment to be made by the board. It appears that the board of county commissioners approved all the managers, and authorized the chairman to fill any vacancies that might occur, and that the chairman made some appointment to fill vacancies. There is nothing to show that the board did not approve the appointments made by the chairman under their authority. If we should concede that original appointment by the board was necessary, there is nothing to show that there were not sufficient appointees at each precinct to hold a legal election. No fraud or unfairness in the conduct of the election is suggested. An election fairly conducted by de facto officers may be valid. Wilson v. Cox, 73 S. C. 398, 53 S. E. 613; Stackhouse v. County Board, 86 S. C. 425, 68 S. E. 561.

[3] It is also alleged that Waverly precinct, where votes were taken, was stationed at a point about one-quarter of a mile from the fork of Rice Creek spring and Camden road, whereas section 203, Civil Code 1902, provides that said voting place shall be "at or near" the said fork. We cannot say as matter of law that a country precinct a quarter of a mile from the crossing of a stream and a road may not be characterized as located "near" such point.

[4] But it appears that the votes cast at Waverly precinct were 32 "for bonds," and 13 for "no bonds," and that the votes in the whole township were 453 "for bonds," and 82 for "no bonds." Hence the vote at Waverly could be thrown out without affecting the result. A mere irregularity not sufficient to affect the result will not vitiate an election. Welsh v. Board, 79 S. C. 246, 60 S. E. 699; State v. Board, 86 S. C. 461, 68 S. E. 676.

[5] Another objection made against the legality of the election is that no certificate of the election was filed with the Secretary of State and the Governor by the board of county canvassers. The statute authorizing the election provides that the managers "shall conduct, direct and declare the result of said election and make returns thereof in writing to the said county board of commissioners," and further authorizes the said county board to issue the bonds, "if a majority of the votes cast at said election shall be for the issuing of bonds." The board of county commissioners had power to canvass the returns and declare the result. This was done. Out of abundance of caution the board of county canvassers also canvassed the returns, and made like declaration as to the result. There was no contest. Certificates of the findings of said boards were filed with the clerk of the court of common pleas and general sessions of Richland county, and a certificate of the county board of commissioners was tendered for filing with the Secretary of State, who declined to receive it on the ground that the law did not require the filing of the result of such an election with him. For this reason no certificate of the county board of canvassers was tendered for filing with the Secretary of State. But in this case it was not necessary to file the returns with the board of county canvassers. Nor was it necessary for that board to file a certificate with the Secretary of State and the Governor, as the act authorizing the special election provided a different method which contemplated that the returns should be made to the board of county commissioners, and that such board should have authority to declare the result.

[6] The issuance of the bonds is further opposed on the ground that there is no provision made for the levying of a tax with which to meet the interest and sinking fund requirements when the same shall become due on July 1, 1912. The statute provides: "Upon the issuance of said bonds, or any part of them, it shall be the duty of the officers charged with the assessment, levying and collection of taxes to levy and collect annually from all property real and personal, within the limits of said township, a sum sufficient to pay the interest on said bonds, and also one-twentieth of the principal to constitute a sinking fund with which to retire the said bonds at maturity," etc.

[7] We think this confers ample power for the assessment, levy, and collection of the necessary tax; but, if it did not, that would not constitute ground for enjoining the issuance of the bonds. Welch v. Getzen, 85 S. C. 163, 67 S. E. 294. It is alleged that it is the purpose of the board of county commissioners to permit street or railway cars to use the bridges acquired under the provisions of said act upon payment of a reasonable toll by the owners of said cars, and it is sought to restrain the Commissioners from so doing. Petitioners seek to have the court construe the provision in section 8 of said act, requiring that said bridges "shall be open forever for the passage of all persons, animals driven or ridden, and vehicles, not including street or railway cars, coming into or going out of Columbia township, free of toll or charge." We would not undertake to determine in this proceeding whether street or railway cars may be absolutely excluded from the use of said bridges, or may be used upon the same upon the payment of reasonable toll. Such a question is premature. The county commissioners as yet have not acquired any control over said bridges, and there can be no injury threatened in the premises warranting injunction. Our opinion on the subject would not be authoritative, in the absence of a real issue between proper parties. The matter in no way affects the right to issue the bonds in question.

Injunction is denied, and the petition is dismissed.

ELLEDDGE et al. v. WHARTON et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 14, 1911.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 62*)—APPOINTMENT—OFFICERS DE JURE.

Act Feb. 18, 1911 provided for the establishment and maintenance of a rural police system in G. county, and declared that, on the approval of the act, it should be the duty of the Governor, "on the recommendation of the legislative delegation of G. county, to appoint three able-bodied men of that county to serve as county policemen for four years." The act was approved on Saturday night, February 18, 1911, the last day of the session, and the Governor, on the same night, appointed petitioners as rural policemen on the recommendation of only one member of the delegation from G. county without the knowledge of the others that any appointment was to be made. The petitioners were commissioned, took the oath of office, and gave bond, incurred the expense of providing the required equipment, and in good faith discharged the duties of the office. Held, that petitioners were not officers de jure, but were officers de facto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 87-90; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 62*)—APPOINTMENT—COMMISSION—EFFECT.

Where rural policemen, appointed to serve in G. county under authority conferred by Act Feb. 18, 1911, in a proceeding to compel the county officers to pay accrued salary, produced their commissions, executed by the Governor, such commissions were prima facie evidence of appointment until declared invalid by a court of competent jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 87-90; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 74*)—DE FACTO OFFICERS—SALARY.

Where petitioners were appointed rural policemen for G. county by the Governor under authority conferred by Act Feb. 18, 1911, but without recommendation of the legislative delegation from G. county as required, petitioners, having qualified and performed services under such appointment, being officers de facto, were entitled to recover salary, in the absence of any other appointment or persons entitled to and claiming the office.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 87-90; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

Petition by L. C. Elledge and another for mandamus against J. B. Wharton, foreman of the grand jury, and certain other officers of Greenwood county to compel payment of salary of petitioners as rural policemen for the two months ending May 7, 1911. Writ granted.

D. H. Magill, for petitioners. Giles & Ouzts, for respondents.

JONES, C. J. The petitioners, claiming to be rural policemen duly commissioned by the Governor and qualified under the rural police act of February 18, 1911, seek by mandamus to compel respondents to pay the salary, $166.66, alleged to be due each for the two months ending May 7, 1911. By their return respondents deny that petitioners had been duly appointed and commissioned, in that they were appointed by the Governor without the recommendation of the legislative delegation of Greenwood county, as required by the act.

[1] It appears that the act was approved Saturday night, February 18, 1911, the last day of the legislative session, and that the Governor on the same night appointed petitioners as rural policemen upon the recommendation alone of Hon. D. H. Magill, one of the Greenwood delegation. It is stated by the affidavit of Senator C. A. C. Waller and Representatives W. H. Nicholson and J. W. Bowers, the other members of the Greenwood delegation, that the appointments were made without their recommendation before they had knowledge of the approval of the act or opportunity to recommend. Section 1 of the "Act to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a rural police system in Greenwood county," approved February 18, 1911, provides: "That upon the approval of the act it shall be the duty of the Governor upon the recommendation of the legislative delegation of Greenwood county to appoint three able bodied men of the county of Greenwood * * * and shall commission them as county policemen for a term of four years," etc. Appointment to office not being inherently an executive prerogative, it is competent for the Legislature in conferring the power of appointment to attach such limitations and conditions to its exercise as may be deemed proper. The statute expressly provides that the appointment of rural policemen for Greenwood county shall be upon the recommendation of the legislative delegation of Greenwood county. No such recommendation having been made, the appointment was made without authority, and the petitioners cannot be held to be officers de jure.

The petitioners, however, were commissioned by the Governor on the recommendation of a member of the Greenwood delegation, have taken the oath of office, have given bond for the faithful performance of duty, have incurred expense of $350 each in providing the equipment required by the act, and have in good faith discharged the duties of rural police. Having acted in good faith under color of title to the office, they are officers de facto.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[3] The general rule is that an officer de facto cannot sustain an action to recover the fees or salary attached to the office, and this rule is usually enforced when there is another who has the right to the emoluments. 29 Cyc. 1393; Mechem on Public Officers, § 331. In Dolan v. Mayor, 68 N. Y. 274, 23 Am. Rep. 168, it is declared to be the settled law of New York "that the right to the salary and emoluments of a public officer attach to the true and not to the mere colorable title, and, in an action brought by a person claiming to be a public officer for the fees or compensation given by law, his title to the office is an issue, and if that is defective and another has the real right, although not in possession, the plaintiff cannot recover." "The principle is that the right follows the true title, and the courts will not aid the intruder by permitting him to recover the compensation which rightfully belongs to another." In the present case, however, there is no other person claiming or having a right to claim the salary in question. In Kottman v. Ayer, 3 Strob. 95, the court uses this language: "To entitle one to claim the emoluments of an office or the privileges conferred by it, he must show, if his right be questioned, that he is the officer de jure, as in the case of Allen v. McNeel, 1 Mill, Const. 459, where one claimed prize money as an officer it was held he ought to prove himself such. His having acted would not be sufficient where his being an officer is the very gist of his action." In the case of Allen v. McNeel, supra, the claimant produced no commission or other competent evidence of his appointment, and there was evidence that another person was really the officer and that the money had been paid to him.

[2] In the case at bar, the claimants produced the commissions of the Governor, which were prima facie evidence of appointment, and until now have not been declared invalid. In the case of Eubank v. Montgomery County, 127 Ky. 261, 105 S. W. 418, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 91, 128 Am. St. Rep. 340, the Supreme Court of Kentucky, not unanimously, however, denied the right of a de facto officer to the emoluments of the office without regard to whether there was another entitled to and claiming the office, but in Behan v. Prison Commissioners, 3 Ariz. 309, 31 Pac. 521, and Adams v. Insane Asylum, 4 Ariz. 327, 40 Pac. 185, the Supreme Court of Arizona held that a de facto officer was entitled to the emoluments of the office of which he was the incumbent when there was no de jure officer. In a case where no de jure officer was acting, the Supreme Court of New Jersey held that one who became a public officer de facto without dishonesty or fraud and who has performed the duties of the office may recover the compensation fixed by law for such services. Erwin v. Jersey City, 60 N. J. Law, 141, 37 Atl. 732, 64 Am. St. Rep. 584.

The petitioners are not usurpers of office by force or fraud, and have in good faith, with prima facie evidence of right, performed the duties of the office. We think it not only just, but consonant with sound law, to hold them entitled to the salary claimed. The statute provided for each policeman an annual salary of $1,000 payable in monthly installments upon the order of the foreman of the grand jury and the warrant of the county commissioners on the treasurer of Greenwood county, and the services for which compensation is sought were for the two months ending May 7, 1911. The only matter of defense submitted to the court was the right of petitioners to the compensation claimed; all other issues originally raised by the return being waived.

The judgment of this court is that respondent J. B. Wharton, foreman of the grand jury, forthwith issue the necessary order, that respondents T. C. Burnett, supervisor, and G. B. Riley and George Dorn, constituting the board of county commissioners, draw their warrant on the county treasurer in favor of each petitioner for $166.66, and that respondent F. Graham Payne, county treasurer, pay said warrants.

ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 68*)—EXCEPTIONS TO AWARD—"OATH."

The requirement of Civil Code 1910, § 5049, that exceptions to the award of arbitrators be made "on oath," is not met by an affidavit of the party filing such exceptions that they are true to the best of the knowledge and belief of affiant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Dec. Dig. § 68.*

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Submission to arbitration between Courtland S. Winn, administrator, and L. R. Miller. From an order dismissing objections to the award, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Lewis W. Thomas, for plaintiff in error. Evins & Spence, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff in error and the defendant in error (hereinafter called, respectively, plaintiff and defendant), by virtue of an agreement in writing signed by them, submitted to arbitrators the decision of certain matters in controversy between them, and provided that the award of the arbitrators might be made the judgment of the superior court of Fulton county, in which county both parties resided. Each of the parties selected an arbitrator, and the two arbitrators selected the third arbitrator. An award in writing was made, finding that the plaintiff owed the defendant certain amounts, aggregating a total of $2,714.40. This award was returned to the clerk of the superior court, and the plaintiff filed certain objections thereto. The court dismissed the objections on the motion of the defendant's counsel, and also refused to allow an amendment offered by the plaintiff to the objections, and the plaintiff excepted.

Counsel for the defendant contend in their brief that neither the exceptions, nor the amendment offered, were properly verified, and that this fact justified the court in dismissing the former, and in refusing to allow the latter. The record does not disclose upon what grounds the motion of the defendant to dismiss the exceptions was predicated, nor upon what ground the court dismissed the exceptions and refused to allow the amendment thereto; and if the failure properly to verify the exceptions and the amendment justified the court in making the rulings complained of, his judgment should be sustained. The affidavit to the exceptions filed was made by Courtland S. Winn, and, after stating that he was administrator of the estate involved and was a party to the arbitration, contained only the following averment: "That the above and foregoing suggestions and exceptions filed by deponent at the return term at which said award was made, to the best of deponent's knowledge and belief, are true." The body of the affidavit to the amendment is as follows: "Personally appeared before me, Courtland S. Winn, who on oath says that the facts stated in the foregoing amended petition are true to the best of his knowledge and belief."

Civil Code 1910, § 5049, omitting a provision in the latter part as to the time of trial, is as follows: "When said award shall have been returned to said court and entered upon its minutes, as provided in the previous section of this Code, either of the parties may suggest, on oath, at the term to which said award is returned, that the award was the result of accident, or mistake, or the fraud of some one or all of the arbitrators or parties, or is otherwise illegal. Whereupon the court shall cause an issue to be made up, which issue shall be tried by a special jury under the same rules and regulations as are prescribed for the trial of appeals." This section of the Code does not permit of objections being made to an award unless they are filed "on oath." An affidavit wherein the party filing exceptions swears that they are true to the best of his knowledge and belief does not meet the requirement of this section that the exceptions be "on oath" of the party filing them.

Civil Code 1910, § 5305, provides that when an execution shall issue or be proceeding illegally against the property of any person and be levied thereon, "such person may make oath in writing, and shall state the cause of such illegality." We can see no reason for permitting an oath under a requirement that exceptions to an award of arbitrators be "on oath" to be different from an oath under the requirements of the section above referred to, providing that the person filing an illegality to an exception "may make oath in writing"; and in the case of Sprinz v. Vannuck, 80 Ga. 774, 6 S. E. 816, it was ruled: "The grounds of an affidavit of illegality must be verified positively. An oath qualified by the words 'to the best of his knowledge and belief' is not sufficient, though the oath be made by an executor to an affidavit of illegality filed to an execution against his testator." See Stancel v. Puryear, 58 Ga. 445; Sharp v. Kennedy, 50 Ga. 208; Bryan v. Ponder, 23 Ga. 480; Thompson v. Davitte, 59 Ga. 473 (14); 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 321, 322; 2 Cyc. 24, 25. In the case of Martin v. Lamb, 77 Ga. 252, 3 S. E. 10, it was decided that "a plea of non est factum, or of nonpartnership, sworn to by the defendant 'to the best of his knowledge and belief,' does not cast the onus upon the plaintiff, but only entitles the defendant to go to the jury and establish his defense"; and on page 256 of 77 Ga., page 11 of 3 S. E., Bleckley, C. J., said: "Before the Constitution of 1868, a plea of non est factum had to be sworn to—not to the best of one's knowledge and belief, but sworn to. An affidavit 'to the best of his knowledge and belief' commits the affiant to almost nothing." It has been held that, when the plaintiff in attachment makes an affidavit for an attachment to issue thereon, the grounds of the attachment must be sworn to positively, and it is not sufficient for affiant to state that he swears to such grounds to the "best of his knowledge and belief." See Bruce v. Conyers, 54 Ga. 678.

Civil Code 1910, § 5085, provides that "the party seeking the attachment, his agent or attorney at law, shall make affidavit" among other things, as to "the amount of the debt claimed to be due." It further provides: "When the affidavit is made by the agent or attorney at law, he may swear that the amount claimed to be due is due according to the best of his knowledge and belief." This section seems to recognize a difference between an oath positively stating something to be true and one stating it to be true "to the best of the knowledge and belief" of affiant. In the exceptions filed it is complained that the award is the result of a mistake on the part of the arbitrators and is otherwise illegal. Many of the exceptions relate to the alleged illegal admission of evidence over objections, and a copy of the entire evidence introduced upon the hearing before the arbitrators is attached to the exceptions and amendment thereto as a part thereof. Whether the legal inferences of the party filing the exceptions should be verified, the alleged existence of facts upon which such inferences are based should be verified positively, and not simply to the best of the knowledge and belief of the party filing the exceptions. The requirement of the law that exceptions to the award of arbitrators be "on oath" is not met by an affidavit that the exceptions are true to the best of the knowledge and belief of the party filing the exceptions, and we cannot say that the court committed error in dismissing the exceptions and refusing to allow the amendment offered thereto.

NATIONAL BANK OF WEBB CITY, MO.,
v. J. H. EVERETT & SON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CARRIERS (§ 58*)—TRANSFER OF BILL OF LADING—RIGHTS OF TRANSFERREE.

Where a customer of a milling company orders flour, which is consigned by the milling company to itself, with a memorandum on the bill of lading to notify the customer, and contemporaneously the milling company draws a draft for the price of the flour on the customer, payable to a bank, to which is attached the bill of lading indorsed in blank, and deposits with the bank the draft with bill of lading attached, and the amount of the deposit is credited to the depositor's general account and drawn against by him, the bank becomes the purchaser and owner of the draft and bill of lading; and the title of the bank to the flour is superior to a subsequent lien against the milling company.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. H. Everett & Son against the Boyd & Gunning Milling Company. On levy of attachment, the National Bank of Webb City, Mo., filed a statutory claim. Verdict against claimant. From an order denying a new trial, it brings error. Reversed.

Brown & Randolph and Hugh M. Scott, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Maddox, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. J. H. Everett & Son sued out an attachment against the Boyd & Gunning Milling Company, and caused the same to be levied on a certain lot of flour contained in a railway car. The National Bank of Webb City, Mo., filed its statutory claim. The verdict of the jury was adverse to the claimant, and its motion for a new trial was overruled.

The flour upon which the attachment was levied was consigned by the milling company to itself, with direction in the bill of lading to notify the plaintiffs. The bill of lading was indorsed by the milling company and attached to a draft, drawn by the milling company for the purchase price of the flour, on the plaintiffs in favor of the claimant. The draft with bill of lading attached was deposited by the milling company with the bank, and the amount thereof placed to its credit. The draft with bill of lading attached was duly presented to the plaintiffs, who refused to pay it. At the time of the deposit of the draft the milling company had overdrawn its account with the bank. The milling company deposited other items that day, and drew several checks against the same. The milling company has not reimbursed the bank for the dishonored draft. The bank has not charged or received interest on the amount represented by the dishonored draft.

The foregoing is a fair résumé of all the testimony bearing on the bank's acquisition of the bill of lading. We do not think this testimony sufficient to justify the contention of the plaintiffs that the bank had no title to the flour, but was simply acting as the agent of the milling company in the collection of the draft drawn by it on the plaintiffs. Prima facie the passing to the credit of a depositor of a check drawn in favor of the bank, not indicating that it was deposited merely for collection, passes the title to the bank. 2 Morse on Banking, § 569 et seq. This general rule will yield to the intention of the parties as reflected in the transaction. If a regular customer of a bank deposits with the bank his draft, payable to his own order or to the bank, and the same is entered to his credit on the books of the bank, and the drawer by course of dealing has the right to draw against such deposit, and in fact did draw against it, and his checks are honored, the title to the draft passes to the bank. Fourth Natl. Bank v. Mayer, 89 Ga. 108, 14 S. E. 891. The bank may indicate its intention not to receive the draft as money, by receiving the draft deposited, not as cash, but as a check for collection. Baillie v. Augusta Savings Bank, 95 Ga. 277, 21 S. E. 717, 51 Am. St. Rep. 74.

In the instant case the evidence discloses that at the time of the deposit the drawer had overdrawn his account, and the deposit was entered as cash to his credit; that the drawer was not only accustomed to draw against deposits of this character, but actually did draw. These circumstances evince the parties' intention to treat the draft as a deposit of money, and therefore the title to the draft and the bill of lading attached is in the bank. The effect of the indorsement of the bill of lading and its delivery to the bank was a pledge of the flour to the bank. Delivery of the property is ordinarily es-essential to the validity of this species of bailment, but bills of lading or other commercial paper symbolic of property may be delivered in pledge and constitute constructive delivery of the physical property. It follows that the title to the flour under the undisputed facts was in the bank. American Nat. Bank v. Lee, 124 Ga. 863, 53 S. E. 268; Farmers' Bank v. Allen-Holmes Co., supra; *Tilden v. DARSEY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 10, 1911.
Rehearing Denied June 23, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1182*)—APPEAL—EQUALLY DIVIDED COURT.

This case came on before the Supreme Court upon a writ of error. The same being for decision by a full bench of six justices, who are evenly divided in opinion (Justices Lumpkin, Beck, and Atkinson being in favor of a reversal, and Chief Justice Fish, Presiding Justice Evans, and Justice Holden being in favor of an affirmation), the judgment of the court below stands affirmed by operation of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3206; Dec. Dig. § 1182.*]

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Joe Darsey was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The bill of exceptions recited as follows:

"Thereupon [i. e., after the close of the evidence] his honor, J. H. Martin, judge presiding, delivered his charge to said jury, and concluded said charge by instructing the jury: That if they found said defendant guilty of murder, and did not wish to recommend him to life imprisonment, their verdict should be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty.' That if they found said defendant guilty of murder, and wished to recommend him to life imprisonment, the form of their verdict should be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty, and recommend him to the mercy of the court.' That if they found said defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, the form of their verdict should be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter.' That if they found said defendant not guilty, the form of their verdict should be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty.' Thereupon the jury retired to their room, and, after deliberating upon said case for some time, they returned into court and announced to said judge that they had agreed upon a verdict, and said judge directed the clerk of said court to receive the bill of indictment and read the verdict. The clerk received the bill of indictment from the jury and read the verdict written upon said bill of indictment, which was as follows, to wit: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter.' February 3, 1911. J. H. Holcomb, Foreman.' Whereupon said judge of said court returned the bill of indictment to said jury, who still remained impaneled and in the jury box, where they were seated when the bill of indictment was handed the clerk, having never separated or left the jury box, with the following statement, to wit: 'I cannot receive that verdict'—which was made as soon as verdict was read. Thereupon defendant's counsel in open court made the following oral objections, to wit: 'We interpose an objection on the ground that the verdict had been rendered by the jury, received by the clerk and published in open court, after the court had asked the jury if they had agreed on a verdict and the foreman stating that they had. We object to the jury further considering the case, and to the court refusing the verdict tendered, on the grounds mentioned.'

"Thereupon the judge instructed the jury as follows, to wit: Gentlemen, I shall return that [referring to the indictment] to you, and you go back and enter upon your deliberations again. I cannot receive that verdict. No such charge was given you by the court in regard to a verdict. The court did not charge you anywhere involuntary manslaughter as a form of verdict. The court charged you the different forms of verdict that you could find in this case; that if you find it for murder, that you say, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty,' and that would mean the death penalty, or if you find the defendant guilty of murder and recommend him to mercy, that would mean that he be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. I further charged you that, if you found him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, the form of your verdict would be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter.' If you find the defendant not guilty, then the form of your verdict would be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty.' I nowhere charged you anything about involuntary manslaughter. You may retire and find a verdict. The court further instructed the jury to strike from the indictment the verdict for involuntary manslaughter written thereon, stating that it was not in proper and legal form. The said jury returned to their room and further deliberated upon said case, and so continued to deliberate until the following morning, at which time said judge called said jury into court and inquired whether or not they had agreed or were likely to agree upon a verdict, and said jury informed the court that they had not agreed and could not agree upon a verdict in said case.

"Thereupon counsel for the defendant, anticipating that the court was going to declare a mistrial, submitted the following oral objection, to wit: 'I suppose your honor is going to declare a mistrial. I make the point that the jury has already found the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter, and the verdict of the jury has been published, and afterwards the court instructed the jury to go to the jury room and make a verdict. We now come in behalf of the prisoner at the bar and object to the court declaring a mistrial and withdrawing the case from the jury, on the ground that the jury in this case has already found a legal verdict, to wit: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter." The defendant contends that this is a legal verdict, and has been so construed by the Supreme Court of Georgia, and it means the highest grade of involuntary manslaughter. The defendant also contends that there is evidence submitted by the state that the prisoner, just immediately after the shooting, said to two or three of state's witnesses that he killed him in fun, meaning that there was no intention to kill, and where there is any doubt about the intention to kill the judge should always give in charge to the jury the law on involuntary manslaughter. For these reasons the defendant contends that the verdict of the jury was correct in law, and the evidence authorized it, and it was error for the court to send the jury back to their room, and the defendant now objects to the court declaring a mistrial, and insists that a verdict has already been found and published against him, which was legal. That is all the point I want to make.' Whereupon said judge of said court declared a mistrial."

When the case was again called for trial, the accused filed a plea of former conviction and former jeopardy. The issue was submitted to the presiding judge on an agreed statement of facts. He decided the issue in favor of the state. The defendant excepted.

Jno. R. Cooper and Howard & Hightower, for plaintiff in error. E. D. Graham, Sol. Gen., and H. A. Hall, Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. Justices LUMPKIN, BECK, and ATKINSON are of the following opinion on this point:

In this state it is the duty of the judge to charge the law in a criminal case, and the duty of the jury to accept the law given them in charge as correct. Nevertheless, the jury have it in their power to find a verdict of not guilty, and the judge cannot properly refuse to receive it because it may not accord with his charge or the evidence.

Under an indictment for murder, a finding of guilty of a lesser grade of homicide is an implied acquittal of murder. Whether or not the jury ought to have found this, under the evidence and the law applicable thereto, the judge can no more refuse to allow a partial acquittal than he can refuse to allow a total acquittal. This is entirely different from a case where the verdict is informal, or does not express the finding of the jury clearly, or is for an offense not covered by the indictment. The judge having, over objection of defendant's counsel, refused to receive a verdict of guilty of involuntary manslaughter, because the law of that grade of homicide was not given to the jury in his charge, having required them to return to their room to further deliberate and find a verdict, and, after they could not agree on another verdict, having, over objection, declared a mistrial, when the case was again called for trial a plea of former jeopardy was a good plea in bar. A verdict of guilty of involuntary manslaughter was a verdict of the higher grade of involuntary manslaughter. Thomas v. State, 121 Ga. 331, 49 S. E. 273.

Chief Justice FISH, Presiding Justice EVANS, and Justice HOLDEN are of the opinion that the facts relied on to support the plea of former jeopardy are insufficient as a bar to the further prosecution of the case. They are of the opinion that on a trial for murder, where neither the evidence nor the charge of the court authorize a verdict of involuntary manslaughter, the judge may refuse to accept a finding of the jury that the defendant is guilty of that grade of homicide, and if the jury subsequently are unable to agree upon a verdict of guilty of another grade of homicide authorized by the law and the evidence, or of not guilty, a mistrial may be legally declared.

DAVIS MERCANTILE CO. v. WALKER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 44)—ACTION FOR WAGES—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE.

Where the plaintiff brought an action against his employer, alleging that the contract of employment was for a year, and that the defendant had wrongfully discharged the plaintiff, the action being brought after the expiration of the year and for the recovery of wages for the balance of the term after the alleged discharge, and where the defense was that the plaintiff had never been discharged, but had left the employment of the defendant of his own accord, it was error requiring the grant of a new trial for the court to instruct the jury as follows: (1) That if the plaintiff quit with the understanding with the defendant that plaintiff "was to quit unless he did a certain thing, unless he stopped drinking, and refused to do it, it would be equivalent to a discharge from his employment; if the demand was for him to stop drinking or comply with his contract, or quit, this would amount to a discharge on the part of the" defendant; and (2) "if he [plaintiff] abandoned his employment because his salary was cut without his consent, it would be a discharge from the employment of the" defendant.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 30*)—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was no error in charging the jury that if the defendant discharged the plaintiff because he would not consent to have his salary cut, and this was the only reason for his discharge, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

However great the preponderance of evidence in favor of the party who was successful upon the trial of the case in the lower court, the first grant of a new trial will not be disturbed, unless it appears, upon an examination of all the evidence, that the verdict as rendered was demanded; and as it cannot be adjudged in the case at bar that the evidence required a finding in favor of the defendant, although the evidence is ample to support the finding in its favor, this being the first grant of a new trial, the judgment of the court below granting the new trial upon special grounds will be affirmed, without an examination of such grounds for the purpose of determining their sufficiency.

WATSON v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—LIABILITIES—INJURIES BY PUBLIC AMBULANCE.

A petition is demurrable where it is alleged that the plaintiff was injured in consequence of being struck by an ambulance which was negligently driven against him while he was in the exercise of due care, it appearing from the remainder of the petition that the ambulance belonged to and was being operated for a public hospital of a municipal corporation, which was under the control of the municipality through its board of officers, although it is averred that in the maintenance of the hospital the municipality "charged fees for patients entering therein"; this last averment not being tantamount to an allegation that the municipality maintained and operated the hospital for pecuniary gain and private profit.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. E. Watson against the City of Atlanta. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. B. Blackburn, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mason and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

BECK, J. This was a suit against the city of Atlanta to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of being run upon and knocked down by a Grady Hospital ambulance in charge of and under the control of agents and employees of the city, and it is alleged that plaintiff's injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant, through its agents and employees in the manner in which the horses pulling the ambulance were driven, to wit, at an unlawful rate of speed. It is also alleged that "said Grady Hospital was under the control of the city of Atlanta, through its board of officers, and that in the maintenance of said Grady Hospital the city of Atlanta charged fees to patients entering therein." The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was sustained by the court below, and the plaintiff excepted.

Section 33 of the charter of the city of Atlanta provides: "The said mayor and general council shall have power and authority to pass all by-laws and ordinances respecting public buildings and grounds, workhouses, public houses, carriages, wagons, carts, drays, pumps, wells, springs, fire engines, care of the poor, suppression of disorderly houses, houses of ill fame, for the prevention and punishment of disorderly conduct and conduct liable to disturb the peace and tranquility of any citizen or citizens thereof, and every other by-law, regulation, and ordinance that may seem to them proper for the security of the peace, health, order and good government of said city." We think that under the provisions of this section of the charter the city of Atlanta is authorized to establish and maintain a public hospital. The maintenance of such an institution may well be regarded as in a measure incidental and necessary to the security and preservation of the health and well-being of the citizens, who in the hour of need require the attention of such skilled nurses and physicians as may be selected and employed by the officials who are elected or appointed by the municipal authorities to conduct the hospital and render the services requisite and proper for such an institution. In the case of Love v. City of Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64, it was said: "In the discharge of such duties as pertain to the health department of the state, the state is acting strictly in the discharge of one of the functions of the government. If the state delegate to a municipal corporation, either by general law or by particular statute, this power, and impose upon it within its limits the duty of taking such steps and such measures as may be necessary to the preservation of the public health, the municipal corporation likewise, in the discharge of such duty, is in the exercise of a purely governmental function, affecting the welfare, not only of the citizens resident within its corporation, but of the citizens of the commonwealth generally, all of whom have an interest in the prevention of infectious or contagious diseases at any point within the state, and in the exercise of such powers is entitled to the same immunity against suit as the state itself enjoys. Such a duty will stand upon the same footing as its duty to preserve the public peace, and its liability or nonliability would depend upon the same principle which relieves the city from liability for the misfeasance of a police officer in the discharge of his duty. * * * It can make no difference in principle as to the character of the agents employed in the discharge of this duty with respect to the public health. The principle of nonliability rests upon the broad ground that in the discharge of its purely governmental functions a corporate body to which has been delegated a portion of the sovereign power is not liable for torts committed in the discharge of such duties and in the execution of such powers. It can be no more liable because of the failure to select competent drivers of garbage carts than a city could be held liable for failing to elect a wise, conservative, and discreet mayor."

We are of the opinion that under the decision in the case just referred to, and the reasoning upon which the conclusion reached in that case is based, the operation of the ambulance is an incident to the maintenance and operation of the hospital itself, and is consequently to be classed with those acts in the performance of which the municipal corporation is exercising a governmental function. It is true that it is alleged in this petition that "in the maintenance of said Grady Hospital the city of Atlanta charged fees for patients entering therein"; but we cannot construe this allegation to be an affirmative allegation that the city requires of all its patients payment for expense of board and treatment at the Grady Hospital, as would be the case of a private hospital maintained and operated for profit and the pecuniary advantage of those who own and operate it. Had the distinct allegation been that the hospital was established and operated for private gain and profit by the city, quite another case would have been made from that presented in this petition. If the pleader had wished to charge that the city of Atlanta maintained and operated the Grady Hospital for private gain and profit, and that to this end it charged fees of all of its patients, it would have been very easy to have made that distinct averment. For the Grady Hospital to charge fees from some of its patients is not at all inconsistent with its character as a public institution and one operated by the municipal corporation in the performance of its governmental duties. Under the authority of the case of Love v. City of Atlanta, supra, the court below ruled rightly in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the case. See, in this connection, 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 977, and cases cited, especially that of Maxmillian v. New York, 62 N. Y. 160, 20 Am. Rep. 468, and Elliott on Mun. Corp. 327.

CROW v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

RAILROADS (§ 350*)—BLOCKING HIGHWAY—NEGLIGENCE—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Under the evidence it was for the jury to determine whether it was negligence to obstruct the highway, and whether the death of the plaintiff's daughter resulted from becoming wet and chilled while standing in the rain waiting for the crossing to be cleared, and was proximately caused by the blocking of the highway. It was error to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; G. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by Cornelia Crow against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Judgment reversed.

M. B. Eubanks and W. B. Mebane, for plaintiff in error. Geo. A. H. Harris & Sons and Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Mrs. Cornelia Crow brought suit against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages because of the death of her minor daughter, alleged to have resulted from exposure to inclement weather while waiting for the clearing of a freight train which blocked the highway between the daughter's place of work and her home. On the trial evidence was submitted by the plaintiff and defendant, at the conclusion of which the court directed a verdict. The exception is to the direction of a verdict.

The material part of the evidence submitted by the plaintiff was as follows: The plaintiff's daughter, a strong and healthy girl of the age of 18, was employed in a factory located in a town of 5,000 inhabitants, and earned $1 per day, most of which she contributed to her mother's support. The factory employed about 2,000 operatives, and suspended work at the usual time (about 15 minutes past 6 o'clock) on the evening of November 22, 1907. It was a cold, rainy night. When the plaintiff's daughter came out of the mill, "it was raining as hard as it could." She, with many others of the mill operatives, came through the mill gate and proceeded along the highway on her way home until she reached the spur track of the railway company which entered the mill yard, and which was 30 yards distant from the mill gate. The highway was obstructed at this place by a freight train with 30 cars, half of the train projecting on either side of the highway. Inside of the factory inclosure and near the gate, about 40 yards from the railroad crossing, there is a waiting shed. There is also a hotel near the crossing, about the same distance as the waiting shed. She waited in the rain for about 30 or 40 minutes for the crossing to be cleared, when she proceeded home. One witness testified that it would have been difficult, and not a safe way, for ladies to have gone around the train; and another witness testified that she could not go around the cars. After the employees leave, the gates of the factory yard are shut and locked, and no one except the night watchman is permitted to enter the yard. When the plaintiff's daughter came out of the mill, and discovered that it was raining and that the crossing was blocked, she could have returned to the yard and have taken shelter under the shed before the gate was shut. There was a means of exit from the rear of the mill; but a person must needs go under a railroad trestle, and it would have been 300 yards further to the plaintiff's home. The effect of becoming wet and chilled from standing in the rain was to suppress the menses of the plaintiff's daughter and to produce vicarious menstruation, which caused her death in June of the next year. A physician testified that one is more likely to catch cold and contract disease standing still in the rain and becoming thoroughly wet than when walking in the rain.

The defendant submitted testimony that the plaintiff's daughter died of tuberculosis; that she lived with her brother and sister-in-law, who died of tuberculosis; that this disease is a germ disease, and is communicable; that the freight train had several heavy laden cars and was switched into the siding to its extreme length; and as the engineer attempted to move the train forward a coupling on the third car from the engine broke. Several unsuccessful attempts were made to connect the coupling, and then the car with the broken coupling was cut loose from the others, and signalmen sent out on the main line to flag approaching passenger trains, which were then due from opposite directions. After arranging for the signals for the passenger trains, the car with the broken coupling was drilled out and left on a spur track, and the engine was brought back and connected with the remaining cars and the crossing was cleared. This work consumed about 30 or 40 minutes, and could not have been accomplished in less time. The conductor testified that it was his duty to carry with his train chains with which to fix couplings. He had a chain with him, but it was left on a disabled car at the last stopping place. If the servants in charge of the train had had a chain, the train could have been pulled off the crossing. The engineer and conductor did not inform any one in the waiting crowd at the crossing while it was obstructed by the train that the train was broken down and could not get away. They knew that the factory usually suspended work about 6:15 o'clock in the afternoon, and that it employed a large number of operatives, many of whom lived in houses located beyond the crossing. The master mechanic of the factory testified that the night watchman has until 10 minutes to 7 to permit employes to leave the mill, at which time he closes the gates. There could not have been much difference in the distance to the home of the plaintiff's daughter by leaving the front or rear exit. There was nothing to prevent the plaintiff's daughter, upon discovering that the crossing was blocked, to have returned to the mill yard and leaving through the back gate.

The plaintiff's case is based upon the propositions that the railway company was negligent in blocking the crossing, and that this negligent act proximately induced her daughter's fatal illness. We think both of these propositions were supported by proof sufficient to require the submission of the issues to a jury. It was inferable from the evidence that the crossing was blocked for a much longer time than would have been necessary, had the servants of the railway company been provided with chains to use in substitution of a broken drawhead. The conductor testified that it was his duty to carry chains in anticipation of accidents to car couplings, and that, if the train had been supplied with a chain, the train could have been pulled off the crossing by its use. It is true that when the train started on its journey it was furnished with one chain; but this had been left on a disabled car, which was sidetracked at the last stopping place. It was for the jury to say under these circumstances whether the crossing was negligently blocked an unreasonable time.

The other proposition contains two elements: (1) Whether it is possible from the evidence to distinguish between the act of the defendant and the deceased as the cause of the injury; and (2) whether the proximate cause of the injury was the decedent's own negligence in voluntarily standing in the rain, when she could have gone home by a different route, or could have gained shelter in the hotel or shed which were near by. In considering this matter, we must take the evidence in its most favorable aspect to the plaintiff, as a verdict was directed for the defendant, and she was deprived by this action of having the jury pass upon any conflict in the evidence. We may concede that if between the cause of an injury from obstructing a highway the negligence of the injured person intervenes, so that the injury is the direct consequence of his negligence as well as the negligent obstruction of the highway, and it is not possible to determine what portion of the injury is caused by either, or that any substantial injury would have been received except for the negligence of the person injured, no action can be maintained for the injury. 5 Thomp. Neg. § 6237. But one who negligently causes an injury will not be heard to say that part of the mischief would not have arisen if the injured party had not been guilty of some negligence. If one negligently injures a person afflicted with a disease, which injury aggravates or accelerates the course of the malady, he is still responsible for his tortious act. The injured person's affliction is to be considered in the estimate of damages, but does not excuse the tort-feasor's act. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the fatal illness of the decedent was caused from her standing in the rain upon a cold night. A physician testified that one is more likely to catch cold and contract disease standing still in the rain and becoming thoroughly wet than when walking in the rain. It was for the jury to say whether the decedent's voluntarily leaving the mill in the rain would have produced her illness, if she had been permitted to walk home, instead of being detained in the rain for half an hour at the crossing.

Likewise the jury should have been allowed to pass upon the alleged contributory negligence of the decedent. It is inferable from the evidence that a mill shelter and hotel were near by and accessible to the decedent, and that she could have repaired to either of these places while waiting the clearance of the crossing. The evidence also discloses that, while the train was blocking the crossing, the agents in charge of it, though seeing that a number of persons were delayed because of an obstructed highway, did not inform the waiting crowd of the cause of the delay, or when the train was likely to move. It did appear that the broken coupling was on the third car, which was 12 car lengths away from the crossing. The jury might have been of the opinion from the facts (and the inference would not have been unwarranted) that the decedent momentarily expected the crossing to be cleared, and that she was not negligent in remaining on that assumption, rather than going to a shelter, or taking a more circuitous and less convenient route to her home.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., and BECK, J. (dissenting). In our opinion the evidence was wholly insufficient to show that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the death of the plaintiff's daughter, and therefore the court properly directed a verdict for the defendant.

EASTMAN COTTON MILLS v. SUGGS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 291*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, upon the trial of an action brought by an employé against his employer for damages alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence, in that another employé of the defendant, without warning to the plaintiff, started a machine to running at which plaintiff was at work, while plaintiff's hand was in a position to be injured by the running of the machine, the defendant expressly admitted that the employé who started the machine was the vice principal of the defendant, and that his act was the act of the defendant, the court did not err in omitting to instruct the jury as to the doctrine of fellow servants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1137; Dec. Dig. § 291.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 291*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTIONS.

The evidence did not authorize an instruction that "where there were two ways to do a thing, and the injured party selected that way which was the most dangerous, there could be no recovery," and there was no error in omitting to so instruct the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1136-1144; Dec. Dig. § 291.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 376*)—MATTERS TO BE PROVED—ADMISSIONS BY PLEADINGS.

It was not error to charge "that those things which are admitted to be true in the defendant's answer need not be proven."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1225-1227; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 128*)—GROUNDS—SUFFICIENCY OF ASSIGNMENT.

The ground of a motion for new trial, "that the charge taken as a whole does not cover the issues of the case, as made by the evidence, and the law applicable thereto," was not a sufficient assignment of error, in that it failed to specify what issue or issues were not covered by the charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-262; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; Frank Park, Judge.

William Rouse was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 69 S. E. 180.

J. W. Walters & Sons, Perry, Foy & Monk, J. B. Williamson, and Jno. R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., F. A. Hooper, H. A. Hall, Atty. Gen., and J. H. Tipton, for the State.

HOLDEN, J. The defendant, William Rouse, was placed on trial at the October term, 1910, of the superior court of Worth county, on the charge of having murdered one William Bailey. He was convicted by the jury of murder, without recommendation, and sentenced to be hung. To the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial he excepted. The killing occurred on September 4, 1909. On that day the defendant and the deceased rode together in a buggy from Sylvester to Poulan; the deceased having been informed by the defendant that he could obtain some whisky at the latter place. The only eyewitness to the killing was one Dink Smith. This witness swore that at a place known in Poulan as Sandy Bottom he first saw the defendant and the deceased, and all three of them went into a store there and took a drink of whisky, and were then invited by the defendant to go to his house and get another drink. They proceeded to the house occupied by the defendant, and entered the room thereof in which the killing occurred. The immediate circumstances attending the killing were detailed by the witness as follows: "We went in the front door, in the room on the right as you go in. Mr. Rouse then got a bottle of whisky, and we all went to take a drink, and Mr. Bailey said he couldn't take a drink without water, and he goes out around the house to get a drink of water, and he comes back in the back hall door and set down in a chair in the room. Rouse did not say anything that I know of, when Bailey went out. * * * Bailey came back in the house after he went after water. He came in and set down in the room where he was killed. He came in and set down in the chair, and we all went to take a drink, and Rouse drank, and I drank and handed it to Bailey, and he drank, and he set the bottle down on the right-hand side, and he stooped over to set the bottle down. Mr. Rouse pulled a pistol from his right hip pocket and began shooting. Then he fell forward toward the bed, and Mr. Rouse shot him; and, after he had fell forwards on his face, he shot him in the back. Mr. Rouse after he had finished shooting him he pulls a small pistol out of his bosom, and placed it in his hand. That small pistol he placed in Mr. Bailey's hand. He fired this pistol off in the fireplace before he placed it in his hand." The defendant then told Smith to go get the marshal and tell him that the defendant had killed Bailey, which he did. Witness did not know what took place after he left the house. On his return after going after the marshal, the defendant told him that, when he left Sylvester with Bailey, he carried him off for the purpose of killing him. This witness further testified that there were no cross-words between the defendant and the deceased, and that the deceased did nothing to the defendant that the witness knew of. The state also sought to establish the theory that Bailey was not immediately killed by the bullet wounds inflicted upon him, but that the defendant, who had gone out of the house when Smith went after the marshal, returned, and while alone with Bailey (whom witnesses testified they could hear groaning at the time of Rouse's return to the house), with a knife or other sharp instrument, so cut the throat of the deceased as to render speech on his part impossible. Dr. Lunsford, sworn by the state, testified at length as to the character of the wounds on the body of the deceased, giving it as his opinion that the mortal wound was the one in the throat, which he testified was caused by a knife or other sharp instrument.

In his statement to the jury the defendant's version of the killing was substantially as follows: When he, the deceased, and Dink Smith got into the defendant's house, the deceased proposed to take a drink, and said he would have to have some water. Defendant stepped to the edge of the door and handed deceased a dipper, and returned into the house and commenced writing a note, which he had promised to write for the deceased to take to a woman. Deceased returned with a tin bucket of water. "He took a drink and set the bottle down and took the cup, and took some water, and he says: 'Now, by God, treat me right about that thing.' I says, 'I don't want to do anything else with you but treat you right.' He says, 'It will be more than you did heretofore.' He says, 'I mean for you to treat me right,' and mentioned some old things between us. I says, 'You are mistaken; I don't want to appear against you in court, nor say anything against you unless I am called without any choice of it.' He says, 'You are a pretty good hand to swear lies against a man,' with an oath to it, and, as he said it, he brought his pistol out of his shirt, and I stepped out and stepped towards him, and he stepped towards, and as he come around I fired with my left hand on his wrist, that way [indicating], and, as I did the pistol went off. That hole they were talking about being in the south side of that house, the ball was shot from Bailey's pistol, and went through my pants, * * * and the bullet went right through these pants and into the floor, and, as Bailey wrung from me to get loose, I shot him through the arm and through the body, and somewhere else in the body I shot him again, and that's what's said to be the knife in the neck. Gentlemen, that was the last shot from my gun. So far as me cutting that man, or putting a knife in him, there was no knife put in that man than there is in one of your jurors."

The witness Smith was arrested along with the defendant. This witness was present at the coroner's inquest, and made a statement regarding the killing which corroborated the defendant's contention as to how it occurred. Afterwards, while in jail, this witness gave in a written statement a different version, and on the stand, at the trial, detailed it as above set forth. On the trial he stated that his testimony given at the inquest was false, and that he so testified because the defendant threatened to kill him, or to have some of his friends do so, if the witness did not tell the story the way the defendant wanted it told. While the motion for a new trial, as amended, contains a number of assignments of error, only one of them relates to alleged error in the admission or rejection of testimony; and we deem it unnecessary to relate the testimony more extensively that has been hereinbefore set forth.

[1] 1. In several grounds of the motion for a new trial complaint is made that the court erred in so charging the jury as erroneously to lead them to believe that if the "words, threats, menaces or contemptuous gestures" of Bailey, the decedent, at the time of the homicide were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man, that he was manifestly intending or endeavoring by violence or surprise to commit a felony on Rouse, the defendant, and the latter, acting under the influence of those fears, killed Bailey, the homicide would not be justified. The defendant contends that the charges excepted to constitute error requiring a new trial under the ruling in the case of Cumming v.

State, 99 Ga. 662, 27 S. E. 177, where it was held: "In the present case it was error to charge: 'A fear growing out of and only supported by mere words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures is not the fear which would justify or excuse another for committing a homicide.'" Similar rulings were made in the cases of Clay v. State, 124 Ga. 795, 53 S. E. 179, and Johnson v. State, 105 Ga. 665, 31 S. E. 399. We do not think the charges excepted to subject to the criticism presented. One of the court's instructions excepted to is as follows: "Provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder." [1] The charge above quoted is a part of the Penal Code 1910, § 65, wherein voluntary manslaughter is defined, and is taken from that portion of the court's instructions wherein he gave this section in charge to the jury. No complaint is made that the law of voluntary manslaughter was not applicable under the testimony, or that the court erred in instructing the jury upon the law of this grade of homicide. If it was proper to charge the jury upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter, it was certainly not error to charge the precise language of the Code defining this offense. The above-quoted language in the section referred to means that, though "words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures" of the decedent may arouse in the slayer a passion by reason of which he kills the decedent, a homicide because of the passion thus engendered will not be reduced from murder to manslaughter. In the charges complained of, the court was dealing with this principle of law, and the language used by him was not such as to deprive the defendant of the benefit of his defense that in committing the homicide he acted under the fears of a reasonable man, nor to exclude the jury from considering, in determining whether or not he so acted, whether words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures on the part of the deceased occurred under such circumstances as would justify the excitement of such fears on the part of a reasonable man. On the contrary, the jury were instructed in one portion of the charge, "You will bear in mind that in every case of homicide where it appears that the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that the deceased was intending or endeavoring by violence or surprise to commit a felony on him, and that the party killing really acted under the influence of those fears and not in a spirit of revenge, that the homicide is justifiable," and substantially repeated this instruction in several other portions of the charge. In view of the entire charge, the instructions above referred to as being complained of were not such as to mislead the jury into the belief that the law was other than that laid down in the cases above cited, and were not subject to any of the exceptions thereto.

[2] 2. Complaint is made that the court failed to charge the provisions of Pen. Code 1910, § 72, relating to the right of one person to kill another to prevent the latter from forcibly attacking and invading property or habitation of the former, after using persuasion, remonstrance, or other gentle measures; and in so charging the jury as to exclude from their consideration the defense involved in the latter part of Pen. Code 1910, § 70, providing that it shall be justifiable homicide for a person to kill "any persons who manifestly intend and endeavor, in a riotous and tumultuous manner, to enter the habitation of another for the purpose of assaulting or offering personal violence to any person dwelling or being therein." The defenses above referred to were not involved in the case, and there is no merit in either of the complaints to which reference is above made.

[3] 3. Complaint is made that the court committed error in failing to charge Penal Code 1910, § 1017, relating to the necessity of corroboration in felony cases, where the only witness to establish a fact is an accomplice. Neither in the evidence nor in the defendant's statement was there anything to show that the witness Dink Smith on whom the state mainly relied to establish the killing by Rouse was an accomplice in the commission of the homicide, and the court committed no error in failing to charge the action of the Code above mentioned.

[4] 4. One ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'When an apparent discrepancy exists between the testimony of different witnesses, it is the duty of the jury to reconcile the whole together if it can be done, so as not to impute perjury to any one. There are several methods prescribed by our law by which a witness may be impeached, and one is by disproving the facts testified to by him. Another is by proof of contradictory statements previously made by him as to matters relevant to his testimony and to the case, and still another is by evidence as to his general bad character. The credibility of a witness is a matter to be determined by the jury under proper instructions by the court. When an attempt to impeach a witness in any of the methods pointed out has been made, it is for the jury to say whether such attempt has been successful, and, when a witness has been successfully contradicted as to material matter, his credit as to other matters is for the jury.' Defendant excepts to this charge, and says the same is error because, when a witness has been successfully impeached by contradictory statements, it is the duty of the jury to disregard his testimony altogether. So that it was error for the court to charge the jury when the witness has been successfully contradicted as to material matter.

His credit as to other matters is for the jury. Defendant contends it was also error for the court to instruct the jury that it was their duty to believe a witness as to other matters who had been impeached by some of these designated methods; there being other legal ways in which a witness may be discredited. For instance, a jury may take into consideration the witness' feelings or prejudices against the defendant, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of his tale, his manner of testifying, and many other things may be considered by the jury in passing upon his credibility." Another ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'While it is for the jury to determine the credit to be given the testimony of each and every witness, yet when a witness has been successfully impeached as to absolutely establish in the minds of the jury his unworthiness of credit, as well as where a witness swears willfully and knowingly falsely, his testimony in each and both of these cases ought to be disregarded unless corroborated by circumstances, or other unimpeached evidence.' Defendant contends that the court erred in instructing the jury that, if the witness had been successfully impeached, his testimony would not be taken by the jury, unless corroborated by circumstances or unimpeached evidence. The defendant contends that this charge was error further, because, when a witness has been successfully impeached, it is the duty of the jury to disregard all of his testimony, and pay no attention to it and not to consider it at all." The charges above quoted do not furnish any ground for a new trial. The charge that a witness may be impeached in one of the three ways named in the charge excepted to (first above quoted) is not cause for a new trial, though a witness may be discredited in other legal ways besides those designated in the charge. The court did not instruct the jury that a witness must be believed unless impeached in one of the three ways named in the charge to which reference is made, and immediately preceding the portion of the charge referred to the court instructed the jury as follows: "To enable you, in considering the evidence, to separate the false from the true, you are made by law the exclusive judges not only of the evidence and the weight of the evidence, but also of the credibility of the witnesses. In determining what degree of credit a witness should have, the jury should bring to bear their own intelligent judgment and use such reasonable standards as they would apply in seeking for truth in such matters of importance where their own interests are concerned. Among other things, the jury may look to and consider any interest which a witness may have in the case on trial, whether he manifests any bias or prejudice for or against the accused. You may look to his manner of testifying, to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the facts he relates, and apply such other mental tests in weighing the evidence as your reason and judgment dictate." See, in this connection, Chapman v. State, 109 Ga. 157 (3), 34 S. E. 369; Southwestern R. Co. v. Allen, 130 Ga. 656 (5), 61 S. E. 541. The portions of the charge excepted to, other than the one just commented on, were in substantial accord with the provisions of the Penal Code relating to the impeachment of witnesses, and the Civil Code 1910, § 5884, which does not appear in the Penal Code, but which is applicable upon the trial of criminal cases as well as civil cases. See, in this connection, Humphreys v. State, 133 Ga. 456, 66 S. E. 158; Grant v. State, 118 Ga. 804-806, 45 S. E. 603; Arnold v. State, 131 Ga. 494-497, 62 S. E. 806; Smith v. State, 109 Ga. 479, 35 S. E. 59.

[5] 5. One ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'A reasonable doubt of the law is one that grows out of the evidence, or arises from the lack of evidence adduced upon the trial; and leaves a reasonable mind wavering and unsettled—not satisfied from the evidence. A juror cannot create for himself a doubt and act upon it. He cannot raise an artificial or captious doubt in order to acquit. The doubt should be real and honestly and fairly entertained after all reasonable effort to find out the facts. The responsibility of discovering the truth in relation to the charge made against the defendant from the evidence rests upon you, and you alone, under your oaths to render a true verdict according to the evidence. It is only that character of verdict which protects the person on trial on the one hand and preserves society and compels men to respect the law on the other. A verdict rendered on any other consideration is but a mockery of justice.' Defendant excepts to this charge, for the reason that it restricted the jury to find their verdict from the evidence and excluded from their consideration the defendant's statement. The error is that the court omitted to tell the jury in this connection that, if they had reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt from his statement, it would be their duty to acquit him. The court, defendant contends, nowhere in its charge instructed the jury to this effect." Another ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'While I have told you that, in order for your verdict to be a legal and proper one, it must be founded on the evidence in the case, yet, in this connection, I give to you another rule, which may or may not, as you must determine, affect your finding: In all criminal trials the prisoner shall have the right to make to the court and jury such statement in the case as he may deem proper in his defense. It is not to be made under oath, and it shall have such force only as the jury may think right to give it. The jury may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the case.' Defendant excepts to this charge, because the court did not instruct the jury that if they had any reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt, either from the evidence or the defendant's statement, they ought to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt and acquit him. Defendant contends that nowhere in the charge did the court instruct the jury that, if they had any reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt, they ought to acquit him, but restricted the jury to base their verdict upon the evidence, and that, if they had any reasonable doubt, they should acquit. For these reasons, the defendant assigns this charge as error." On similar grounds the following charge is excepted to: "Now understanding as you do your responsibility in this case, the obligation under which you rest to discharge your duty in an impartial, unbiased and unprejudicial manner, to find a verdict according to truth of the case as disclosed by the evidence after applying the evidence to the rules of law as I give them to you, I now call your careful and intelligent consideration to the law of murder, the law of justifiable homicide, and along with them the law of voluntary manslaughter." We do not think there is any error in the charges quoted requiring a new trial. In Tolbirt v. State, 124 Ga. 767 (2), 53 S. E. 327, it was ruled: "It is proper for the judge to frame his general charge to the jury upon the evidence alone, appropriately instructing them, however, at some stage thereof, with respect to the prisoner's statement." Also, in this connection, see Tucker v. State, 133 Ga. 470 (5), 66 S. E. 250; Brantley v. State, 133 Ga. 264 (1), 65 S. E. 426; Jordan v. State, 130 Ga. 406 (2), 60 S. E. 1063; Walker v. State, 118 Ga. 34, 44 S. E. 850.

[6] 6. Exception is taken to a charge wherein the court stated: "In deciding this question you will remember that you are the sole judges of the evidence submitted to you during the trial of this case. You will accept as correct, for your guidance in making up your verdict, the law as I shall give it to you in charge. So that, having applied the law to the evidence as you shall find it to be, you may render such verdict as the law demands at your hands. You are not at liberty, in determining your verdict, to depart from the evidence nor the law as given in charge." Exception is taken to this charge on the ground that in criminal cases the juries are the judges of the law as well as the facts, and that "they become the final judges of the law and the evidence," and that it was error for the court to tell the jury "that they were the sole judges of the evidence without telling them they would become the judges of the law also." There is no merit in this exception. The jury must accept as the law what the court charges them as being the law. In this connection, see Berry v. State, 105 Ga. 683, 31 S. E. 562; Jackson v. State, 118 Ga. 780, 782, 45 S. E. 604.

7. One ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court committed error in admitting the following testimony of a state's witness by the name of Dink Smith, over objection of defendant's counsel: 'I do not go out at night at all, and I stay close at home. I left this county and went to my father's to keep from being killed by some of Rouse's friends like he told me.' Defendant's counsel objected to this testimony and asked the court to rule it out, on the ground of its irrelevancy, and on the further grounds that no substantial reason was given by the witness for being in fear of the defendant after he was turned out of jail. Defendant objected to the testimony further for the reason that the defendant could not harm him, as he had been in jail at the time, and, if other people were threatening his life outside, he could not be held responsible for it. And any threats made by any one outside of the prisoner at the bar against this man's life would not be admissible." The testimony discloses the following facts: Rouse killed Bailey on Saturday, and on Sunday Rouse and the witness Dink Smith were arrested and incarcerated in the same cell in jail. On Monday morning Smith was removed from this to another cell, where he remained for a short time, after which he was released from custody. On cross-examination of the witness Smith, counsel for the defendant brought out from him the following testimony: "I have been out of jail about eight months. Nobody ain't bothered me. I went up home and stayed four or five months, and came back down here I think the 12th of August. I moved right back to Poulan and moved in the house that Rouse killed Bailey in, and I have been living in it ever since. I haven't had any cause to go all over the country. I have been in Poulan working around. I have been everywhere I have had any necessity to go. I will be 27 years old the 24th day of January." Immediately after this testimony was delivered counsel for the state, on redirect examination of the witness Smith, brought out the testimony objected to in the ground of the motion for a new trial above quoted. Counsel for the defendant, on recross-examination of the witness immediately thereafter, brought out the following testimony: "I was afraid of Mr. Rouse's friends. He told me, if he didn't kill me himself, he had friends in the county who would. * * * I got out of jail on Sunday, and went home on Monday on the 11 o'clock train, up to Andersonville. I got out of jail after the case was tried. My family went with me and I moved back here on the 12th of August. I wasn't afraid to come back. If I had been afraid at the time, I wouldn't have come back. I came back after I had testified against Rouse. I am afraid to be out at night." It does not distinctly appear from the testimony where was the home of the father of the witness to which in the testimony objected to the witness said he went,

but, in view of all the testimony, we think it proper to consider that it was at Andersonville in another county, and was "the home" referred to in the testimony first above quoted. Counsel for the defendant having brought out from the witness the fact that he went to the home of his father, and stayed four or five months after being released from jail, we do not think the admission of the testimony of the witness as to the reasons why he went to the home of his father, over the objection that it was irrelevant, cause for a new trial. We think this testimony was relevant. Nor do we think the testimony that the witness left the county of Worth and went to the home of his father "to keep from being killed by some of Rouse's friends like he told me" subject to the other objections contained in the above-quoted ground of the motion for a new trial. The witness Smith testified that, after the killing, Rouse several times told him that if he did not relate the occurrence as happening in a certain way, if he (the defendant) did not kill Smith, his friends would. There was no testimony that any of the friends of Rouse had made any threats against Smith. The last sentence in the testimony objected to was admissible, and not subject to any of the grounds of objection made thereto, and, even if the first sentence in the testimony objected to was subject to any of the objections made in the ground above quoted, objection to the testimony as a whole would not be sustainable. The objections made in the ground of the motion for a new trial which we are considering were to all of the testimony therein quoted, and were not to any special portion thereof. However, we think the testimony in the sentence above referred to, that "I do not go out at night at all, and I stay close at home," was admissible in view of the fact that counsel for the defendant had previously brought out on cross-examination of Smith the testimony that "I have been everywhere I have had any necessity to go."

[7] One ground of the motion complains that the court committed error in refusing to grant a mistrial made after the solicitor general used the following language in his closing argument to the jury: "Rouse, came out of the house wiping his hands and immediately jumped into his buggy, and rushed off down to the house of this negro woman, evidently his concubine, and then rushed back." When the motion was made, the solicitor general stated to the court and jury as follows: "There was evidence in this case that he [the defendant] either stayed there or ate there, I forget which it was, but in the heat of my argument I did go too far in referring to that particular woman as being evidently his concubine, and I desire to withdraw that." Whereupon the court instructed the jury as follows: "I charge the jury that they are to be actuated and governed solely by the evidence in this case and the law as given in charge, and are not to consider any statements made by counsel in their zeal or otherwise that do not appear in the evidence in this case. You will be governed by the evidence as you were sworn to do in being impaneled, and not by any statements counsel may make outside of the evidence. I especially warn you against considering any statements of counsel, not borne out by the evidence." The defendant then renewed his motion to declare a mistrial, and the court made the following statement: "I have instructed the jury, who are presumed to be upright and intelligent men, and who will remember the testimony and be guided by the testimony alone. The motion is overruled." All of what has been above stated transpired in the presence of the jury. Civ. Code 1910, § 4957, is as follows: "Where counsel in the hearing of the jury make statements of prejudicial matters which are not in evidence, it is the duty of the court to interpose and prevent the same; and, on objection made, he shall also rebuke the same, and by all needful and proper instructions to the jury endeavor to remove the improper impression from their minds; or, in his discretion, he may order a mistrial 'if the plaintiff's attorney is the offender.'" Under the circumstances as above set forth, it was a matter in the discretion of the court whether or not to declare a mistrial, and the failure to do so was not an abuse of discretion requiring a reversal. The cases cited by counsel for the defendant to sustain their contention that the failure to declare a mistrial was error show upon examination that none of them involved instances in which the court promptly and fully complied with the requirements of the section of the Code above set forth. The record shows that the judge and the solicitor general did their utmost to wipe from the minds of the jurors any impressions created by the statement of the solicitor general which were liable to harm the defendant, and said that the statement was unwarranted by the evidence.

Counsel for defendant contends that the venue was not shown. The evidence of the witness Smith shows that the homicide was committed in Worth county, and there is no merit in this contention. This is the second time that the defendant has been convicted of the crime charged against him, without recommendation, and sentenced to be hung. This court granted him a new trial when the case was formerly before this court (135 Ga. 227, 69 S. E. 180) because of an error in the charge of the court. The testimony introduced by the state shows an unprovoked murder. It is true that this testimony was that of a witness who before the coroner's jury swore that the homicide occurred in a way tending to justify the defendant in its commission. But this witness says that the testimony then given was false, and was given because of repeated threats made by Rouse that, if he did not testify in the way he did before the coroner's jury, the defendant or his friends would kill him. The jury trying the case had a right to believe the witness' testimony as delivered on the trial. Moreover, there was testimony that after shots were heard in the house by parties on the outside groans were heard, and that while they continued Rouse returned alone to the house where the homicide occurred, shortly after which the groans ceased. A physician testified that the wound in the neck was made by a knife, or other sharp instrument, which cut the trachea and inflicted a mortal wound, and rendered speech impossible, and that, after this wound was inflicted, it would have been impossible for the deceased to have uttered groans of the character described by the witnesses. The evidence was sufficient to warrant the verdict.

CHAMLEE LUMBER CO. v. CRICHTON.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 260*)—DISMISSAL OF ACTION—RENEWAL—LIMITATIONS.

An essential element in the creation of a lien of a materialman is his foreclosure of the same within 12 months from the maturity of his claim. If he forecloses within 12 months, and dismisses his action, it cannot be renewed within 6 months thereafter, under Civil Code 1910, § 4381, unless the renewal be also within 12 months of the maturity of the claim. That Code section applies to ordinary suits and remedies, and not to suits to foreclose a materialman's lien on real estate.

EVANS, P. J. A materialman, furnishing material for the improvement of real estate, is given a lien upon the real estate so improved; but, in the language of the statute, "to make good [the materialman's lien] it must be created and declared in accordance with the following provisions and on failure of either the lien shall cease." The provisions referred to comprehend three vital and essential things: The completion of the contract to furnish material, the record of the claim of lien within 3 months, and the institution of a suit of foreclosure within 12 months from the maturity of his claim. Civil Code 1895, § 2804. In transferring this section to Civil Code 1910, § 3353, certain errors occurred: Subparagraph 3 was entirely omitted, and paragraph 4 was erroneously numbered 3. The materialman in this case began his suit within 12 months of the maturity of his claim of lien, but voluntarily dismissed it. He renewed his action within 6 months of the dismissal of his former action, but after the expiration of 12 months from the maturity of his claim. The primary question is whether the renewed action stands on the same footing as the original action, so as to bring it within the statutory requirement that the foreclosure of the lien be commenced within 12 months of the maturity of the claim.

Civil Code 1910, § 4381, is as follows: "If a plaintiff shall be nonsuited, or shall discontinue or dismiss his case, and shall recommence within six months, such renewed case shall stand upon the same footing, as to limitation, with the original case; but this privilege of dismissal and renewal shall be exercised only once under this clause." This Code section appertains to the remedy, and not to the cause of action. It is applicable to those cases where the defendant may plead the statute of limitations (by demurrer or by special plea) at his pleasure, and where the element of time does not enter into the creation of the cause of action. This court has repeatedly held that statutory liens of this character are in derogation of common law, and the statute must be strictly construed. Indeed, it has been held that the mere fact that a materialman's claim of lien was filed for record before the expiration of three months would not suffice to meet the statutory requirement of record within that time. Jones v. Kern, 101 Ga. 309, 28 S. E. 850. In giving to the materialman a lien, the statute expressly states that in order to "make good" his lien he must both record and foreclose within the statutory periods. The record of the lien in time is no more essential to its creation than its foreclosure in time. The lien comes into potential existence only when the statute is satisfied. Its vitality as an enforceable lien depends upon the concurrence in fact of three things, viz.: The furnishing of the materials, the record of the claim of lien within 3 months, and the institution of foreclosure suit in 12 months. If there is a failure in either, the lien is inoperative. Cherry v. N. & S. R., 65 Ga. 633.

In Parmelee v. S. F. & W. Ry. Co., 78 Ga. 239, 2 S. E. 686, the action was against a railway company to recover money paid for freight in excess of the sum allowed by the Railroad Commission, under section 719 (j) of the Code of 1882 (see section 2640 of Civil Code of 1910). That section gave a right of action provided suit was brought thereunder within 12 months after the accrual of the action. The court, in holding that Civil Code 1910, § 4381, permitting the renewal within 6 months of dismissed or discontinued actions, did not apply to suits under that Code section, said: "The proviso to this act is a condition precedent upon which the suit must be brought. The right of action is given provided the same is brought within 12 months from the time the same accrued. If the same be not brought within 12 months, then there is no right of action under this statute; and where a case has been brought within 12 months, and dismissed, and another case brought, but not within 12 months from the time the right of action accrued, no such right exists; and the statute which provides for the bringing of actions after the dismissal of the same within 6 months does not apply in a case like this." And in Walker v. Burt, 57 Ga. 20, it was held that a dismissed foreclosure of a sawmill lien could not be renewed under the statute, where the renewed suit was brought after the expiration of 12 months, and that the renewal statute applied only to ordinary suits and remedies.

Adhering to the rule of strict construction, we interpret the statute to mean that, in creating the lien, the statute demanded as one of its constituent elements that suit to foreclose be begun within 12 months from the maturity of the claim; and this requirement appertains not merely to the remedy, but constitutes one of the essential things which enter into the creation of the lien. Given this construction, Civil Code 1910, § 4381, as to renewal of dismissed actions has no application to suits to foreclose the lien of materialmen.

There are other questions made by the demurrer; but, as the point upon which we have ruled is decisive of the plaintiff's right to a lien, it becomes unnecessary to consider them.

KIMSEY & DOPSON v. MACON LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PROCESS (§ 141*)—CORPORATIONS (§ 507*)—RETURN OF SERVICE—CONCLUSIVENESS—SERVICE OF PROCESS—SUFFICIENCY.

The return of service by the sheriff is conclusive as to the fact of service, unless traversed according to law. Elder v. Cozart, 59 Ga. 200. But such return is not evidence as to matters which are not properly the subject of the return. 32 Cyc. 515.

(a) Under Civ. Code 1910, § 2258, there are two modes prescribed for service of process upon corporations: (1) "By serving any officer or agent of such corporation." (2) "By leaving the same at the place of transacting the usual and ordinary public business of such corporation, if any such place of business then shall be within the jurisdiction of the court in which such suit may be commenced." Where service of process in an action for damages was made by serving the president personally, it was not an essential part of the return that the sheriff recited in his return, "Said [president] being the officer in charge of said company's office and business in" the county where the suit was brought; and on the trial of a plea to the jurisdiction such recital was not evidence that the defendant had an office in the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 189-192; Dec. Dig. § 141; Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 507.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Though conflicting, the evidence was sufficient to authorize the judge, by consent passing on the law and facts without the intervention of a jury, to find that the court was without jurisdiction of the defendant corporation.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. REECE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 256*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PETITION—DEMURRER.

The gist of the plaintiff's action in this case was that a railroad steel rail was carelessly and negligently thrown or caused to fall, without fault on the plaintiff's part, upon the foot of the latter, breaking and crushing it, and that the negligence complained of consisted in moving or throwing a steel rail while a gang of laborers, of which the plaintiff was a member were engaged in unloading steel rails from a car, without giving proper notice to the plaintiff that the rail was about to be moved or thrown; but the petition fails entirely to show just how the complainant was engaged in assisting in the removal of the rails from the car, what was his relative position with reference to the rail that was being moved or unloaded, or with reference to the other members of the gang who were engaged in the same work, or how or why any notice was necessary or proper, and the court erred in overruling a demurrer calling for more specific information in regard to these questions.

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Flite, Judge.

Action by C. L. Reece against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. L. Reece brought suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the negligence of certain employes and agents of the defendant company. Petitioner alleged that his right foot was broken across the instep, in consequence of a heavy steel rail falling across his foot; that it was caused so to fall by the negligence of the agents and employes referred to; that petitioner was without fault; that at the time his foot was broken he was unloading steel rails from cars, with other members of a gang of workmen under Foreman McArthur; and that one of the "supervisors" of the defendant company was present, "hurrying the men to unload iron from the cars, which interference with the men and the confusion caused by the unwarranted interference of said supervisor, and hurry and confusion caused by the change in foremen, and the excitement caused by the company, and abusive language used by the supervisor to the extra gang, caused them to excitedly throw railroad steel [rails] or iron from the cars without proper notice to the employes who were assisting to unload the cars." The petition was demurred to by the defendant on the grounds that it failed to set forth what constituted the negligence complained of, and did not fully show the character of the negligence and the particular person or persons who were guilty of such negligence, together with their relation to the defendant; that it did not sufficiently set forth acts of negligence on the part of any one, and failed to show how the supervisor's presence and direction was an interference with the company's business, and why the same should have produced confusion, and how the plaintiff's injuries were the result of anything alleged; and that the petition failed to show how petitioner's injuries were received, and failed to set forth any cause of action against the defendant. The court overruled the demurrer, to which ruling the defendant excepted. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, and, this being overruled, the defendant excepted.

BECK, J. While the general demurrer was properly overruled, we think the petition is defective in the respects pointed out by the special demurrer. The petition alleges that the plaintiff was injured in consequence of the falling of the rail upon his foot; and in a vague, indefinite way it is averred that the rail fell upon his foot in consequence of some interference upon the part of a certain "supervisor" for the defendant company with a gang of workmen engaged in unloading rails under a certain named foreman; and it is further alleged that the hurry and confusion caused by the interference on the part of the supervisor, and the abusive language used by him to the gang of workmen, "caused them to excitedly throw railroad steel [rails] from the car without proper notice to the employes who were assisting to unload the car." There were no allegations to show the position of petitioner relatively to those who were engaged in unloading the steel rails, nor whether his position was such as to require that notice should be given him when a rail was about to be moved or thrown from the car; nor does it appear from the allegations of the petition that he could not easily and readily see how the rail was being handled, if it was being handled so as to put in jeopardy his person. In fact, there is not the slightest suggestion in any of the allegations of fact to show that the other employes engaged with the plaintiff were under any duty of giving notice when a rail was about to be moved or thrown from the car. The gist of the plaintiff's action, it seems, is that a rail was moved or thrown without giving proper notice, and yet nothing is alleged to indicate how or why any notice of the moving or the throwing of the rail was necessary or essential to the safety of the complainant, if he observed proper precautions himself for his own safety. The allegations of the petition are so meager, vague, and indefinite that one cannot determine from reading them whether the complainant was on the car assisting in unloading, and was injured while so engaged, or whether he was on the ground, and from that position engaged in assisting at the work of unloading the rails from the car, and while engaged in the latter place a rail was thrown upon him. The demurrant was entitled to more specific information as to the contentions of the plaintiff as to how he was engaged at the time he received the injuries complained of, and what there was in the circumstances which rendered the giving of notice proper or necessary; and the court erred in overruling the special demurrers calling for this information.

The court having improperly overruled the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, what took place subsequently thereto upon the trial is nugatory, and it is unnecessary to pass upon the questions raised by the assignments of error in the motion for a new trial. General Supply & Construction Co. v. Lawton, 131 Ga. 375, 62 S. E. 293.

WHITE v. BRYANT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COSTS (§ 277*)—SECOND ACTION—FAILURE TO PAY COSTS OF FIRST ACTION.

Where a suit has been dismissed by the plaintiff, in order to bring a second suit for the same cause of action, the plaintiff must pay the costs or file a pauper's affidavit showing his inability to do so. A failure in this regard furnishes ground for a plea in abatement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 1048-1060; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

2. COSTS (§ 277*)—FAILURE TO PAY—SECOND ACTION—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—FAILURE TO PAY COSTS OF FORMER SUIT.

Where one had instituted proceedings to foreclose his livery stable keeper's lien, and dismissed the proceedings, and subsequently instituted other proceedings to foreclose the same lien, to which a plea in abatement was filed, setting up that the costs in the first case had not been paid, and that a pauper's affidavit in terms of the statute had not been filed, it was error to overrule the plea in abatement, after the introduction of evidence sustaining the material allegations of the plea.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by T. J. Bryant against John W. White. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

On the 6th day of January, 1909, T. J. Bryant instituted proceedings to foreclose his lien as a livery stable keeper against John White. White filed his counter affidavit, and on the same day Bryant filed his application with the ordinary for an order to sell the property described in his foreclosure proceedings. On the 9th day of the same month the plaintiff, through his attorney at law, dismissed the proceedings, and, subsequently to the dismissal of the case, Bryant instituted proceedings to foreclose the same lien. Whereupon the defendant White filed a plea in abatement, setting up that the costs which had accrued in the first case had not been paid before the institution of the proceedings to foreclose a second time the lien sought to be foreclosed in the first proceeding, nor had the plaintiff filed with his second suit a pauper's affidavit showing his inability from poverty to pay the accrued costs in the first case. After hearing evidence the court overruled the plea in abatement. The evidence submitted, relative to the issue raised by the plea in abatement, was as follows:

Judge Longley, attorney for Bryant, testified: "After I brought the first suit, I went up with the papers in my hand and called the clerk's attention that I wanted to dismiss and bring another suit, and I asked him if he would accept me for the costs, and he accepted me, and I paid it. Q. (Mr. Mann). You didn't pay it before you filed it? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Did the sheriff and clerk both accept you? A. Yes, sir. I asked the clerk and sheriff, 'Will you accept me for the costs?' and he said they would, and I filed the suit, and some time afterwards I paid the money. Q. The sheriff consented to it? A. Yes, sir; I talked to the sheriff and clerk both."

The sheriff testified: "Q. (Mr. Mann). You are the sheriff of the county? A. Yes, sir. Q. In the case of Bryant against White was the cost—you made the levy and served the papers? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was the cost in that case paid before you made the second levy? A. It has been paid. Q. How was it paid? A. Why, Judge Longley paid me. Q. When? A. Why, I didn't take no memorandum. Q. It was after the second suit was brought, wasn't it? A. Why, yes; it was after the second suit, but I thought you meant the day of the month. Q. Did he pay you before? A. No, sir. Q. Mr. Bryant didn't pay you before? A. No, sir; not before the levy. The cost has been paid. Q. That was after the suit was brought. Who was to pay you before the suit was brought? A. The first suit? Q. Yes, sir. A. Why, I supposed it would come out of the parties; wasn't anything said about the first suit, I don't think. Q. Before the second suit was brought? A. Judge Longley told me he would see it paid, and I told him I would take him for it. Q. Mr. Bryant didn't say anything about it? A. After the stuff was sold, I went over there with a bill of costs, and he paid it; that was afterwards. Q. (Judge Longley). You mean by that the horses were sold and the costs paid? A. Yes, sir."

W. E. Mann, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Longley, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. [1] Under the decision in the case of Wright v. Jett, 120 Ga. 995, 48 S. E. 345, the court should have sustained the plea in abatement, and erred in refusing to do so and in overruling that plea. The mere fact that the clerk and the sheriff agreed, in the language of the witnesses, to "take him [Mr. Longley] for the costs," did not meet the requirement of the statute. It is disclosed by the evidence that the costs of the first case were not actually paid until after the institution of the second case. The fact that the officers of the court agreed to take Mr. Longley, the attorney, for the costs, did not mean that they had released the party plaintiff from liability for the costs. It is unnecessary for us to rule as to what would have been the effect of an agreement between Mr. Longley, the attorney for the plaintiff, and the officers of court that they would accept his obligation to pay the costs in lieu of the obligation of the party plaintiff himself, and that the plaintiff should be entirely released from all liability for the costs. We cannot construe the agreement between the attorney and the officers of court, so as to give it this meaning. Such an arrangement between the plaintiff, who dismissed the first case, or his attorney, and the officers of court, relative to the payment of costs, falls entirely to satisfy the statute requiring the payment of costs, where a case is dismissed, before the suit can be brought again. See, in this connection, Wright v. Jett, supra, and Board of Education v. Kelley, 128 Ga. 479, 55 S. E. 288.

THOMPSON v. WILKINSON. (No. 3,065.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§§ 370, 374*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1052*)—ACTION ON NOTE—PLEA OF NON EST FACTUM—EVIDENCE.

Where suit is brought upon a promissory note, and a plea of non est factum is filed, it is not proper to admit the note in evidence until prima facie proof of execution has been made. If there be a subscribing witness, he should be called or accounted for. If the inaccessibility of the subscribing witness is shown, or if, when he is called, he fails to remember the signing of the note, or if he testifies that the alleged maker did not execute it, the party offering the note may then proceed to other proof to show that it was in fact executed. In the present instance the magistrate erred in admitting the note without proof of execution; but as the subscribing witness was subsequently called and testified as to the execution of the note, and as there was further proof as to its execution, this error was rendered harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1559-1580, 1583, 1584, 1587-1612; Dec. Dig. §§ 370, 374; * Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4171-4177; Dec. Dig. § 1052.*]

2. SUNDAY (§ 13*)—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

A contract relating to a person's ordinary business is void, if executed on Sunday.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sunday, Cent. Dig. § 3644; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 87*)—DEBTS OF HUSBAND—CONTRACT OF WIFE.

A married woman cannot make any contract of guaranty or suretyship, or make a valid promise to pay her husband's debt. The form in which it is attempted to make her liable for the debt is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 346-353; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 423*)—SIGNATURE—CHARACTER OF SUBSCRIBER—EVIDENCE.

It is competent to show that a person who signed a paper, apparently as a maker, signed only as a witness.

Error from Superior Court, Dade County;
A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by W. E. Wilkinson against Nancy Thompson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Foust, Payne & Tatum, for plaintiff in error. W. U. Jacoway, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Wilkinson brought suit upon a promissory note signed as follows:

his
"Meredith X Thompson. mark

her
"Nancy X Thompson.
mark

"Hugh A. Price.

"Witness: Zona Thompson."

[1] Mrs. Thompson filed a plea of non est factum, and afterward by amendment further pleaded that, though her name appeared on the note as a maker, she could neither read nor write, and merely signed as a witness; also that the note was executed on Sunday; also that the note was executed for the pre-existing debt of her husband. The note was tendered in evidence without proof of execution. The defendant objected. The objection was overruled. Primarily speaking, this was error (as the plea of non est factum put the plaintiff to proof of the execution of the note); but it was rendered harmless by reason of the fact that the subscribing witness was called and testified that Mrs. Thompson signed as a witness and not as a maker; and Price was called as a witness and testified that Mrs. Thompson signed as a maker and not as a witness, and that he himself signed as a surety. It was undisputed that the note was signed on Sunday. The plaintiff testified that he had sold Mr. Thompson a horse, and that Mr. Thompson had agreed to give him a note, signed by himself, his wife, and by Price in payment therefor. Thompson and Mrs. Thompson both swore that she had nothing to do with buying the horse and had no interest in it, and this testimony was undisputed. Mrs. Thompson also testified that she signed only as a witness and had no intention of becoming liable on the note. Another person, who was present when the note was signed, testified that he never heard anything said about Mrs. Thompson's signing as a witness, but that he understood that she was signing as one of the makers of the note. The jury found against all the defendants, and Mrs. Thompson brought certiorari to the superior court. It was overruled, and to this judgment she excepts.

1. The exception which relates to the admission of the note without proof of execution has been covered by what has been said above, and the error assigned as to this we hold to be harmless error.

[2-4] 2-4. While the testimony is conflicting in many respects, still it is not conflicting as to the material points. Of course, it was proper for Mrs. Thompson to prove that she signed the note as a witness, and not as a maker. As to this the evidence was in conflict, and we may eliminate that from the discussion. Her connection with the transaction, so far as the evidence discloses, began and ended on the Sunday on which this note was executed. Even if she had had the capacity to agree to become a maker on the note, so as to assume her husband's debt, the fact that she did so on Sunday would have rendered the note void. But, beyond this, the fact is plain and undisputed that her husband bought the horse and that she did not. Under the law of this state a married woman cannot make any contract of guaranty or suretyship, and cannot lawfully promise to pay her husband's debt. The form in which the transaction takes place is immaterial. If the debt was her husband's, she could not become a party to it, no matter how she signed the note, whether as principal, surety, guarantor, or as witness. If no one else but herself had signed the note, she would not have been bound on it, as the debt was her husband's, and not hers, and the law forbids her from making it hers.

Judgment reversed.

CORPORATIONS (§ 513*)—SALES (§§ 22, 411, 418*)—PLEADING (§ 8*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT OF SALE—DAMAGES—ALLEGATIONS OF FACT OR CONCLUSIONS.

The allegations of the petition show a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

Error from City Court of Ft. Gaines; Ben M. Turnipseed, Judge pro hac.

Action by the Emmett Shaw Company against the Trigg Candy Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This case came to this court on exceptions to the judgment overruling a demurrer, general and special, to the petition. The petition is as follows:

"(1) The petition of Emmett Shaw Company, said company being composed of Emmett Shaw and Carrie Shaw, shows that the Trigg Candy Company, a corporation doing business under the laws of the state of Tennessee, is indebted to said Emmett Shaw Company in the sum of $234.30.

"(2) That said Trigg Candy Company sold to your petitioner on the 3d day of March,

1909, 250 barrels of candy, each of said barrels to contain 150 pounds, at the price of 5 cents per pound, said candy to be delivered between the date of sale and the 1st day of September, 1909, which is evidenced by the written agreement of the said Trigg Candy Company, which is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A.'

"(3) That said Trigg Candy Company failed and refused to ship out and deliver to your petitioner the candy mentioned in paragraph 2 of this petition, or any part of said candy, although ordered and requested by the plaintiff to do so.

"(4) That during said period between the 3d day of March, 1909, and the 1st day of September, 1909, your petitioner was compelled and forced to purchase candy from other manufacturers at a minimum price of 5½ cents per pound, which was the market price for these goods, and they could not be purchased for a less price than 5½ cents per pound from other manufacturers than defendant during the period between March 3, 1909, and September 1, 1909.

"(5) By reason of the fact that said Trigg Candy Company refused and failed to ship out and deliver to your petitioner the candy mentioned in paragraph 2 of this petition, your petitioner was forced to go into the markets and buy the same grade of candy as that brought from defendant at a minimum price of 5½ cents per pound, which was the market price of candy during the period between March 3, 1909, and September 1, 1909.

"(6) That by reason of the facts set forth in the foregoing paragraphs your petitioner was damaged by the defendant, Trigg Candy Company, in the sum of $234.30, which is the difference in price for said candy between what said Trigg Candy Company sold it to your petitioner and what your petitioner was forced to buy from other manufacturers, being the difference between 5 cents per pound on 37,500."

The next paragraph of the petition alleges that for the purpose of enforcing collection of the damages claimed the Emmett Shaw Company sued out an attachment against the defendant and had the same levied by serving process of garnishment upon two persons therein named.

The contract referred to as "Exhibit A" is as follows: "Ft. Gaines, Ga., 3/12, 1909. Contract. Sold Emmett Shaw Company, Ft. Gaines, Ga., 250 bbl. Stick asst. 5 cents, best #1 Stick Rd (150# bbls). To be shipped as ordered by E. Shaw Co. Contract expires Sept. 1st, 1909. Terms S D to B/L, less 2% cash. Trigg Candy Co., Chattanooga, G. E. Arnold."

The demurrers, so far as they are insisted upon before this court, besides the general ground that the petition set forth no cause of action, may be stated as follows: That the defendant, being a corporation, could only act through its agent, and it is not alleged what agent sold plaintiffs the candy, and it is not alleged that the agent had authority to make such sale, or such authority as would bind it; that the contract, the breach of which is the basis of the suit for damages, is not a legal and binding contract; that the allegation that the petitioner "was compelled and forced to purchase candy from other manufacturers at the minimum price of 5% cents per pound" is defective, in that it does not allege why plaintiff was forced to buy the candy from other manufacturers, nor how much, and that this allegation is a bare conclusion, unsupported by any alleged fact, and for the same reason the allegation that the petitioner was forced to go into the market and buy the same candy as that bought from defendants, at the minimum price of 5% cents per pound, was insufficient.

Calhoun & Rambo, for plaintiff in error.
King & Castellow, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The allegation is positive that the contract in question was made by the corporation. It is signed: "Trigg Candy Co., Chattanooga, G. E. Arnold." It does not appear whether Arnold was a general agent, or a special agent authorized to make the contract, or was in fact an officer of the corporation who was fully authorized to make the contract; but the allegation that the contract was the act of the corporation was sufficient to let in proof as to these other facts, and consequently this allegation, in connection with the contract itself, was sufficient as against a demurrer.

2. The contract alleged to have been made by the defendant and subsequently breached by it constitutes an offer or proposal to sell the candy therein specified to the plaintiff within a certain period, and to deliver it as ordered by the plaintiff. The offer or proposal, by its terms, was to expire September 1, 1909. It is alleged that before this date arrived, the plaintiff "ordered and requested" the defendant to ship out and deliver to the plaintiff the candy mentioned in the contract, and that by reason of the refusal of the defendant to comply with this order and request the plaintiff was compelled and forced to purchase candy from other manufacturers at the market price. The plaintiff, by ordering and requesting the defendant to ship the candy, signified in writing an acceptance of the offer or proposal, and therefore the contract became binding upon the plaintiff, and it was already a binding contract upon the defendant as it was duly signed by it when made. Simpson v. Sanders, 180 Ga. 265, 60 S. E. 541, and cases there cited.

3. On the breach of the contract by the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages the difference between the contract price and the market price. The allegation that the plaintiff was forced to go into the market and buy the same grade of candy as that which had been bought from the defendant, at the minimum price of 5% cents per pound, is sufficiently definite, and is an allegation of fact, and not a mere conclusion. We think the allegations of the petition, considered as a whole, were sufficiently definite, and set forth a cause of action, and that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAPE (§ 53*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence fully supports the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 78-82; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 190*)—ISSUES AND PROOF—OFFENSE INCLUDED WITHIN THAT CHARGED.

On account of the provisions of Penal Code 1910, § 19, a prisoner cannot be convicted of simple assault, where the only assault committed is consummated by a battery. An assault with intent to rape may be committed without a battery, and an indictment for that offense need not charge a battery; and under an indictment for this offense, which does not allege a battery, the defendant cannot be convicted of assault and battery. It follows that if the indictment be for assault with intent to rape, and does not charge a battery, and the proof shows a mere assault and battery, without any intent to rape, the defendant cannot be convicted of any offense, but should be acquitted.

(a) In the present case the indictment charged assault with intent to rape, without charging a battery. That there was an assault and a battery was not denied, only the intent to rape being in issue. The exception to the charge is that the judge did not submit to the jury the question of the defendant's guilt of a simple assault. As the court instructed the jury that, if they did not find that the defendant made the assault with the intent to commit rape, he should be acquitted, the exception is not well taken. Cf. Carter v. State, 7 Ga. App. 44, 65 S. E. 1072.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, W. N. Miller, and J. M. Hull, Jr., for plaintiff in error. A. L. Franklin and T. F. Harrison, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The petition as amended alleged in substance that the plaintiff was employed as a yard switchman by the defendant company, and it was among his duties to couple cars, throw switches, and to do whatever else he was directed to do by the officers and agents of the company, in order that the business of the company might be expedited; that at about 6 o'clock on the morning of August 17, 1909, the crew with which the plaintiff was working was ordered to carry over a train of 35 cars to the yard of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, formerly known as the "Old Port Royal Yard," in which there were several tracks. It was alleged that this was a joint yard, used by the defendant and other companies. The train and the crew on which the plaintiff was working pulled in on track No. 1 in this yard, and on track No. 2 there was a train of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company getting ready to go out, going south. The cars which the plaintiff's crew had brought were to be placed on this track No. 2, and these cars were stopped on track No. 1 until the Charleston & Western Carolina train moved out; and as the Charleston & Western Carolina train moved out, the plaintiff took hold of the grab iron on one of the cars on that train in order to go down to the switch which connected track No. 1 and track No. 2 for the purpose of throwing it, so as to let his train in with its cars. The space between track No. 1 and track No. 2 is about 2½ or 3 feet wide. It is the habit and custom of yard brakemen and switchmen in the employ of the defendant company to jump off and on moving trains and ride to the places where switches are to be thrown; and this was permitted by the different companies occupying the joint yard in question. Indeed, it is alleged that the defendant company, in order to facilitate the business of handling its trains, required its switchmen to jump on and off the moving cars, in order to couple and uncouple cars more expeditiously at these places. As a result of a flood which had occurred about a year before, this switchyard had been considerably washed up, and piles of old scrap iron, clinkers, and rocks were left about in the yard, and between the tracks, and between tracks No. 1 and No. 2, near the place where the plaintiff attempted to catch hold of the grab iron in order to mount the moving car, on the occasion in question, was a pile of clinkers, scrap iron, and rocks about 15 inches high, and as the plaintiff caught the grab iron, he stumbled over this obstruction and was hurt. It is alleged that the morning was dark and foggy, and that the plaintiff did not know of these obstructions in this joint yard; that he had been in the yard only a few times before, and on these previous occasions was there only when it was nighttime, so that he had not seen or become acquainted with the dangerous condition in which this yard had been left; and that he had been given no warning of its condition.

The defendant excepts to the overruling of a general demurrer. We think that the petition, if it is true, sets forth a cause of action; and, of course, on general demurrer we take every allegation of fact as being true. It is not, as counsel for the plaintiff in error insist, a case where the employé of one company has gone to the yards of another company, and has there voluntarily, and for his own convenience, attempted to mount a moving train of another company, and has thus become injured. The plaintiff here alleges that the place where he was hurt was a joint yard of the defendant and of other companies, and that he had been expressly directed by his master to perform his work by jumping on a moving train when necessary to do so, and we cannot say that there was such an element of rashness in his attempt to board a train moving at a rate of five miles an hour (this is the rate of speed at which it was alleged that this train was moving) as to put the case within the rule which makes it negligence for an employé to obey orders requiring him to expose himself rashly to obvious peril. While the plaintiff may have some difficulty in proving his allegation that he did not know the condition of this yard, still he sets forth a fair excuse for his lack of knowledge; that is, that the morning in question was dark and foggy and that he had never been in the yard before, except on a few occasions at nighttime.

One important factor in the case is that the plaintiff waited until the morning of August 17, 1909, to get hurt. There may have been "method in his madness," for on the very day before (August 16, 1909) the act of the General Assembly, now embodied in Civil Code 1910, §§ 2782-2785, was approved and became law. Under that act, contributory negligence of the servant injured in railroad employment does not bar a recovery, unless his act amounted to a failure to exercise ordinary care. Under the law just mentioned, the doctrine of comparative negligence is made applicable to transactions of this nature, and the jury is allowed to diminish, instead of defeat, the plaintiff's recovery, where he has been guilty of some contributory negligence. Judgment affirmed.

MOULDER v. STATE. (No. 3,872.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

WITNESSES (§ 274*)—CHARACTER OF ACCUSED—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

Where character is put in issue, the direct examination must relate to general reputation, good or bad, as the case may be; but on cross-examination particular transactions, or statements of single individuals, may be brought in to the inquiry, in testing the extent and foundation of the witness' knowledge and the correctness of his testimony on direct examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 965, 966; Dec. Dig. § 274.*]

Error from City Court of Lumpkin; E. T. Hickey, Judge.

Luther Moulder was convicted of selling liquor, and brings error. Affirmed.

G. Y. Harrell, for plaintiff in error. T. T. James, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. The accused was convicted of the offense of selling liquor. He offered evidence of his general good character. Upon cross-examination of the witness by whom it was attempted to prove the general good character, state's counsel asked: "Do you know the reputation of Luther Moulder [the accused] for selling whisky?" The witness answered: "I cannot say that I do. It seems to me (and I am not positive, but it seems) I have a faint recollection of hearing somebody say—just who made the remark, I cannot now recall the name of such person, or who it was that said that Luther Moulder was illegally selling whisky. I am not positive that I heard anybody make the statement, and I will not swear positively that I did hear anybody made the remark that Luther Moulder was illegally—but it seems I have a faint recollection of hearing somebody say that the defendant had been selling whisky illegally." To this question, and to this most cautious, equivocal, and carefully guarded answer of the witness, counsel for the accused objected; but the court overruled his motion to exclude the testimony, and the exception to this ruling is the point which is presented to this court.

The state cannot put the general character of the defendant in a criminal case in issue; but the accused has the privilege of showing his good character as a relevant fact tending to make his guilt doubtful. Whenever the defendant puts his good character in issue as a fact, the state has the privilege of disproving this fact, either by cross-examination of the witness by whom the accused attempts to make the proof, or by the introduction of other witnesses who testify that his general character is bad, or by both methods. On the direct examination of such witnesses as are offered to establish character, particular transactions or the opinions or statements of individuals cannot be brought in; but on cross-examination this privilege may be exercised, for the purpose of showing the extent and foundation of the witness' knowledge, or for the purpose of showing the incorrectness of his testimony on direct examination. This is the rule where impeachment of a witness on account of bad character is attempted (see Civil Code 1910, § 5882); and the same rule applies where the character of a party becomes otherwise relevant to the case. Say that the accused puts his character in issue. He, of course, produces the first witness. He will not be allowed on direct examination to ask the witness as to what he has heard particular persons say; but counsel in the examination, and the witness in his answers, will be confined to the general reputation of the accused—that is, his character generally, or, if some particular trait, such as peaceableness or violence, is involved, generally as to that trait. But, when state's counsel comes to the cross-examination, he may inquire of the witness as to whom he has heard speak of the accused, as to what these persons said, and then, for the purpose of showing the incorrectness of the witness' statement that this good character which he has ascribed to the accused is general, may inquire if he has not heard particular persons speak ill of him, or if he has not known him to be accused of particular crimes, or of particular acts which would tend to detract from a man's good character in the community. "The shadings, as well as the brighter hues, are to be considered in making up the estimate of character and reputation." Ingram v. State, 67 Ala. 67, quoted approvingly in Ozburn v. State, 87 Ga. 173, 181, 13 S. E. 247, 248. "A man's character is made of a number of small circumstances, of which his being suspected of misconduct is one." Reg. v. Wood, 5 Jurist, 225, cited approvingly in Ozburn v. State, supra. The defendant having rested, the state may introduce character witnesses in rebuttal. In that event the direct examination of state's counsel will be circumscribed, as was the direct examination of accused's counsel in the first instance; that is, he must ask the witness as to the general bad character of the accused, or as to his general bad character as to the particular trait involved. On cross-examination, counsel for the accused will be allowed the same latitude as the state's counsel in the first instance; that is, he may ask the witness as to the particular persons whom he has heard speak ill of the accused, and may also ask him as to the personal views expressed by particular persons, so far as he knows them.

It is said in this case that, even though this may be the rule, it was not proper to ask the witness who had testified as to the general good character of the accused if he did not know that the accused had a reputation of having sold liquor illegally, because the illegal sale is not an act malum per se, and that even a man of good character may violate the law in this respect. It is pointed out that this court held in Wheeler v. State, 4 Ga. App. 325, 61 S. E. 409, that "proof that a witness had been convicted of the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor affords no ground for impeachment of the witness." The proposition involved in the Wheeler Case and the proposition involved in the present case are not identical. The fact that a person has been accused or convicted of violating the prohibition law, or any other penal law of the state, does tend in a greater or less degree to detract from his general good character; and, consequently, a witness who has testified to the general good character of a person may be asked on cross-examination if he has not heard that that person has been accused, either generally or by particular persons, of having violated the penal law. But, since general good character, or general bad character, is not primarily to be shown by proof of specific acts, and since proof that a person had been accused or convicted of selling liquor illegally would be proof of a specific act, it is not permissible for the offerer of the testimony thus to introduce proof of the specific acts; and that, of course, is what the Wheeler Case holds. There are certain crimes, such as larceny, perjury, etc., as to which specific acts indicate such moral degeneracy as to make a conviction of one of these offenses relevant upon the question of the character of a witness, and, therefore, by a rule different from the one we are now discussing, and additional to it, the record of the conviction of a witness for one of these offenses may be proved to discredit his testimony.

The case of Ozburn v. State, supra, clearly establishes the right of state's counsel to go into specifics on the cross-examination of a witness who has testified as to the general good character of the accused. Counsel for the plaintiff in error relies upon the earlier case of Pulliam v. Cantrell, 77 Ga. 563, 8 S. E. 280; but an examination of that case will show that the testimony there, as to which the Supreme Court sustained the lower court, related to a question by which the cross-examiner attempted to have the witness to state, not merely that the person in question had been charged with crime, but that he had been convicted of it, and the court merely held that conviction of crime can be shown only by the record. The Ozburn Case states the rule very much more clearly than does the case in 77 Ga. 563, 8 S. E. 280, supra, and there is nothing in the case last mentioned to detract from what is held in the Ozburn Case, which states the rule as it exists, not only in this state, but very generally throughout American and English jurisprudence. See, also, Dotson v. State, 136 Ga. —, 71 S. E. 164, decided by the Supreme Court on May 9, 1911.

Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v.
LOCKLEAR. (No. 2,943.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1005*) — REVIEW — EVIDENCE.

There is nothing in the evidence in the record to take the case out of the established rule that the verdict of the jury, approved by the trial judge, is conclusive as to all issues of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1005.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 351*)—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—LIABILITY OF RAILROAD COMPANY.

The following charge of the court was not erroneous: "So that, if it has been shown in this case that the plaintiff was injured by the running of the locomotives, cars, or other machinery of this company, then a presumption would be raised against the company. This presumption may be rebutted by the defendant by making it appear, either from its own or from the plaintiff's testimony, that the injury was done by plaintiff's consent, or was caused by his own negligence; and the plaintiff cannot recover if both parties were negligent, but the negligence of the plaintiff was equal to, or greater than, the defendant's, or if the injury was the result of accident, unmixed with negligence on the part of either party." It is not subject to exception on the ground that it authorizes the plaintiff to recover if the injury was the result of accident, brought about by the negligence of himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 286*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The exception that the court charged the jury as to the duty of railway companies to erect blow posts at public road crossings is not well taken, as the only reference the court made to this duty was to tell the jury that it was not applicable to the present case, and this was favorable to the excepting party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 316*)—INJURIES AT STREET CROSSING—DUTIES OF ENGINEER.

The injury having occurred at a street crossing in a city, the following instruction to the jury was not erroneous: "If you should find from the evidence that the engineer, as he approached Anderson street crossing, did not check and keep checking the speed of his locomotive, so as to stop in time, should any person or thing be on the crossing, the defendant would be negligent as a matter of law." East Tenn. Ry. Co. v. Markens, 88 Ga. 60 (4), 13 S. E. 855, 14 L. R. A. 281.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1006-1008; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The following instruction was not erroneous: "When those in charge of a railway train neglect to comply with the statutory precautions in approaching a highway, and a person on the crossing is struck and injured, the only defenses open to the company are that the injury was done by the consent of the person injured, or that by the observance of ordinary care he could have avoided the injury, or, in mitigation of damages, that his negligence contributed to it. When such injury occurs, the onus is upon the company to prove such fault on the part of the injured person." The charge is certainly not subject to the exception that it expresses an opinion on the evidence, or intimates that those in charge of the railway train in question had neglected to comply with the statutory precautions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 436-438; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

6. COSTS (§ 260*)—AFFIRMANCE—DAMAGES FOR DELAY.

The motion of the defendant in error to assess damages for delay is denied. While there is no reason for the grant of a new trial, still the verdict is not so manifestly correct as to exclude a bona fide insistence on the part of the plaintiff in error that a new trial should be granted.

BAGWELL v. MILAM. (No. 2,854.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

The evidence supports the verdict.

2. TRIAL (§§ 256, 296*)—MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 44*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE—REQUESTS FOR INSTRUCTIONS—"PRESUMES"—"INCOMPETENT."

The exceptions to excerpts from the charge of the court, considered in connection with the entire charge, are without substantial merit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641, 705-713; Dec. Dig. §§ 256, 296.* Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 130*)—GROUNDS—SCOPE.

An exception that the verdict is contrary to designated instructions is simply equivalent to the general ground that the verdict is contrary to law; and an assignment that the court erred in overruling a motion to award a nonsuit is covered by the general ground that the verdict is without evidence to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 129*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—PART PERFORMANCE.

While a verbal agreement that is not to be performed within one year is not binding upon the promisor under the statute of frauds, yet whenever the promisee performs some act essential to the contract, which results in loss to him and in benefit to the promisor, such part performance takes the contract out of the operation of the statute. There was such part performance in this case. Besides, the jury were authorized to believe, under the evidence of the plaintiff, that the contract was to be performed within the year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 288; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

Error from City Court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by J. K. Milam against J. O. Bagwell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Milam sued Bagwell to recover damages for breach of a contract of employment. In his petition he alleged that on October 11, 1907, the defendant made a parol contract with him for a period of 12 months to teach telegraphy in the defendant's school, in the city of Atlanta, at a stipulated salary of $60 a month and 10 per cent. of the gross receipts derived from the teaching of telegraphy, and on that day he began his work at the school, and that Bagwell wrongfully discharged him on the 1st day of February, 1908. The suit was for the remainder of his salary under the contract, from February 1 until October 11, 1908. Bagwell filed several defenses. First, he denied that the contract was for one year, and alleged that it was indeterminate and could be terminated at will; second, he alleged that Milam was wholly incompetent, that he neglected his duties as a teacher, that he took no interest in his work as teacher and was slow and lazy, that under his contract he was to go out and solicit students for the school of telegraphy, but this he never did, and under him the school ran down generally in the number of students and the grade of work, on account of his inefficiency and incompetency, and that for these reasons the defendant had a right to discharge him. By an amendment the defendant pleaded the statute of frauds, it being averred that, if the verbal contract relied on as the basis of the suit was for a period of 12 months (which he denied), it was not to be performed within 12 months from the making thereof, and was not binding, because not in writing. On the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the balance of his salary claimed to be due under the contract. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

Mark Bolding, for plaintiff in error. Edgar Latham and Colquitt & Conyers, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The evidence fully supported the allegations made by the plaintiff, although in sharp conflict, and unless some material error of law, prejudicial to the defendant, was committed in the trial of the case, the verdict must stand.

[2] 2. The amended motion for a new trial complains of the following extract from the charge of the court: "If you believe, from the evidence in the case, that Bagwell and Milam entered into a contract on the 11th day of October, 1907, whereby Milam was to teach in the school of Bagwell's Business College in the department of telegraphy, and that the contract was that Bagwell was to give Milam $60 a month and 10 per cent. of the gross receipts, and entered into that contract for 12 months, dated from the 11th day of October, then the court charges you that Milam was entitled to his wages for 12 months; and if Bagwell turned him off and released him before his 12 months were out, then he had no right to release him, and Milam could sue for and recover the balance per month of what he was entitled to for the 12 months." This excerpt is objected to on the ground that it does not state the true rule of law, and omits the qualification that the discharge and turning off of the plaintiff by the defendant must have been wrongful or unlawful, and in violation of the contract, before he would be entitled to recover in the case, and that this error is not cured in any other portion of the charge.

We think the judge was here stating simply what was necessary to be shown to make out a prima facie case by the plaintiff, so as to put the burden upon the defendant to show that it was not a wrongful discharge. The court did not intend to deprive the defendant of his right to justify the discharge of the plaintiff by establishing his plea that he did so because of the plaintiff's incompetency and unfitness as therein alleged, and the jury could not have so understood, because the whole question of fitness or unfitness was gone into by the evidence fully, and was one of the principal issues to be determined, and the court not only instructed the jury that they would have the pleadings out with them, which would contain the issues in the case, but, as stated, the defense of incompetency was distinctly relied upon as a justification of the discharge of the plaintiff. Besides, the court called the specific attention of the jury to this defense in the following language: "Furthermore, the defendant filed his plea that the plaintiff was incompetent when he hired him for a teacher of telegraphy, and that he was not competent to teach. The law presumes, when a man hires to do a certain thing, that he is competent to do it, and, if he is not competent to do it, the person who hires him has a right to displace him. Whether there was such incompetency here, you look to the evidence and see, and you pass upon the evidence upon that plea." It is therefore seen that the court did distinctly submit to the jury this issue of competency as made by the defendant's plea and evidence; and, on the assumption that the jurors were men of ordinary intelligence, it is extremely improbable that they could have been misled by the extract from the charge in forming the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, although the evidence in support of the plea showed that he was unfit and incompetent as therein alleged.

Error is assigned on the following excerpt from the charge: "The law presumes, when a man hires to do a certain thing, that he is competent to do it; and, if he is not competent to do it, the person who hires him has a right to displace him." This charge is objected to, first, because there is no such presumption of law as that stated; and, second, because the person hired might be lawfully discharged for other reasons than mere incompetency. The use of the phrase "the law presumes" is probably inapt; but it is clear, from the context of the charge, that the judge did not mean to instruct the jury that this was such a legal presumption as could not be rebutted by proof. On the contrary, it is plain, from the context, that the judge used the word "presumption" in its ordinary and general acceptation, and that the jury could not have been misled by it. When a man is employed as being competent to do certain work, until the contrary appears the fair presumption or inference is that he is so; but the inference is entirely rebuttable, and, if rebutted, and it is shown that he is not in fact competent to do the work he held himself out as competent to do and was employed to do, such incompetency would be a sufficient ground for a discharge. In this case the evidence shows that the plaintiff held himself out as a competent telegrapher, that he had been a teacher for many years, and that he was not only a teacher, but a practical telegrapher. Certainly this was sufficient to give rise to a presumption that he was competent as an instructor of telegraphy, and to do the work for which he was employed by the defendant, and was sufficient to cast upon the defendant the burden of showing that he was not competent. In the absence of any request for a more elaborate definition of the meaning of the word "incompetent," the instructions on this subject were sufficient. The word "incompetent," in this connection, should be given a very broad definition, and, in view of the evidence, the jury could only have construed it as applicable to and fully illustrating all the different sorts of incompetency and unfitness alleged by the defendant against the plaintiff. The defendant claimed that the plaintiff had no knowledge or skill in teaching, had no enthusiasm or energy, took no interest in his work, and was slow and lazy, and did not solicit students for the school, and that the school ran down greatly while he was in charge of it. All of these special complaints are appropriately described by the general word "Incompetent," and it was not necessary for the court to charge more specifically on this subject, unless requested in writing to be more specific. The jury certainly understood that proof of any of these special allegations of unfitness would support the charge made of incompetency.

[3] 3. The seventh ground in the amended motion for a new trial, that the verdict was contrary to the charge of the court on the subject of the statute of frauds, need not be specially considered, as it is fully covered by the general grounds of the motion. And the ninth ground of the amended motion, that the court erred in refusing to grant a nonsuit, will not be considered, because this is also embraced in the general grounds, and is not a proper ground of a motion for new trial.

[4] 4. The principal defense relied upon is that the contract was void under the statute of frauds. It is insisted that the evidence clearly showed that the contract was not to be performed within 12 months from the making thereof, and that, as it was not in writing, it was not binding on the defendant. The evidence is in conflict on this question, for the plaintiff testified that the contract was made on October 11, 1907, and was to run for a year from that date, and the inference is deducible from this evidence that all the preceding negotiations between the parties prior to that date were merely preliminary to the closing of the contract; that the promise to employ had been agreed upon, but the contract itself was not actually made until that date, and, indeed, it was uncertain that the contract would be made even at that date. If this is true, and the jury had the right to accept it as the truth, this would make the statute of frauds not applicable to the contract; and, even if this was not true, the undisputed facts, we think, show such part performance as would take the contract out of the statute of frauds. This court, in Bentley v. Smith, 3 Ga. App. 242, 59 S. E. 720, has stated the test laid down by the decisions of the Supreme Court therein cited for determining what part performance of a verbal contract would take it out of the statute of frauds. That rule or test is that the contract will be taken out of the operation of the statute of frauds whenever one party to the contract performs some act essential to the contract that results in loss or injury to him and in benefit to the other party. Let us apply the undisputed facts of this case to this rule.

Milam was employed by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, in the county of Bartow, as a telegraph operator, and had a steady job as such, when he was first approached by the defendant with the proposition to employ him as a teacher of telegraphy in his school at Atlanta. In order that he might accept the proposed contract with the defendant, it was necessary that he resign his position with the railroad company, and it was suggested to him by the defendant that he send in his resignation. This he did. In other words, he gave up a permanent position in order that he might accept the contract proposed by the defendant. Certainly the doing of this act was essential to his accepting the contract proposed by Bagwell, and the giving up of the position resulted in loss to him and in consequent benefit to Bagwell. Therefore, if, as contended by the defendant, the contract was actually made prior to October 11, 1907, when the defendant first went to see the plaintiff on the subject, it also appears that there was such part performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff as would take it out of the operation of the statute of frauds. It would be a great wrong on the plaintiff, if, after having induced him to surrender a position which he held, to accept the other, the defendant were permitted to claim that such surrender was not essential to his acceptance of the latter position. The facts of this case are not analogous to the facts of the Bentley Case, supra. In that case this court held that there was no such part performance of the verbal contract as to take it out of the statute of frauds, because all that Bentley did was to move his family to Washington, Ga., where the contract was to be performed; and Judge Russell states in the opinion that the plaintiff did not testify that it was essential to the contract in any way that his family should be moved to Washington. The expense of moving was the part performance of the contract relied upon in the Bentley Case to take it out of the statute of frauds, but it could not be said that the incurring of this expense was an act which was essential to the contract.

On the question of the statute of frauds we conclude, therefore, first, that the jury were authorized to accept the testimony of the plaintiff that his contract began October 11, 1907, and was to be performed within a year thereafter, that he had made no complete contract prior to that time, and that everything that had been done was preliminary to the making of the final contract on that date; and, secondly, that, even if the contract was made prior to that time, the resignation by the plaintiff of his position with the railroad company was essential to the making of the contract with Bagwell, was a loss to him and a benefit to Bagwell, which was within the contemplation of both Bagwell and himself, and amounted to such part performance of the contract as took it clearly out of the statute of frauds.

Judgment affirmed.

JONES v. NORTON et al. (No. 2,910.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 175*)—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—SECURITY TO INDORSER.

The maker of a series of negotiable notes executed a mortgage to his indorser or surety on the notes to protect him against loss on the contract, and stipulated in the mortgage that, on a failure to pay any one of the notes when due, the indorser or surety should have the right to declare the other notes due and proceed to foreclose the mortgage to protect himself as such indorsee or surety. The maker of the notes defaulted in the payment of several of them, whereupon the indorser or surety paid the unpaid notes to the original payee and became the holder thereof, and, under the stipulation of the mortgage, declared them to be due, and proceeded to collect them by suit. Held, the mortgage was a valid contract and the stipulation referred to was enforceable by the surety or indorser, either while the notes were still held by the payee, or after the surety or indorser had become the lawful transferee of the notes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 505-509; Dec. Dig. § 175.*]

2. USURY (§ 55*)—ELEMENTS—COMMISSIONS OR PREMIUMS.

A premium or commission paid by the principal maker of a promissory note to the indorser or surety to protect the latter in the risk assumed and to compensate him for his services in procuring a loan for which the note is given, in which premium or commission the lender has no interest, is in no sense usury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. §§ 119-121, 169-174; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 443*)—ACTION—PARTIES—RIGHT OF INDORSER TO SUE.

An indorser has the right to purchase a negotiable note from the payee; and, when the note is due by its terms or becomes due by a contract between the maker and the endorser, the latter can sue the former on the note. In such case the suit is based, not upon the obligation of the maker to reimburse his indorser for money paid out for his benefit, but upon the obligation to pay his negotiable note to whomsoever may be the lawful holder thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1377-1423; Dec. Dig. § 443.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—WAIVER OF ERROR IN APPELLATE COURT.

Questions raised by assignments of error not referred to in the argument or brief for the plaintiff in error will not be decided.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

5. STRIKING OUT PLEA—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

The pleas were properly stricken, and the evidence demanded the verdict as directed.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by J. V. Norton and others against N. N. Jones. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This is a suit on promissory notes to recover the principal, interest, and stipulated attorney's fees. The petition contains three counts. The first count alleges, in substance, that on August 6, 1909, the defendant, Jones, made and delivered to the Citizens' & Southern Bank 11 notes for $200 each, due, respectively, from 7 to 17 months after date, and one note for $100, due 18 months after date; that all of these notes were indorsed and transferred by the bank to the plaintiffs for value, without notice of any defect; that the notes due 7, 8, and 9 months after date were transferred to them after maturity, and the others before maturity; that the maker had defaulted in the payment of the notes due 7, 8, 9, and 10 months after date, and they were still unpaid; that to secure the payment of these notes to the bank, and the payment of other notes made directly to the plaintiffs by the defendant, he made a mortgage (a copy of which was set out, and which was referred to solely for the purpose of showing the maturity of the notes sued on, and was not sued on as a mortgage), in which he covenanted that, if default should be made in the payment of any one or all of said notes when due, it should be lawful for the parties of the second part (the plaintiffs) to declare the whole remaining indebtedness to be due and payable at once; that on June 9, 1910, the plaintiffs personally served the defendant with notice, in the terms of the mortgage, declaring all of the said notes due because of default in the payment of the past-due notes, and stating their intention to bring suit thereon to the July term, 1910, of the city court of Savannah. The second count alleged that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $550 principal, besides interest and attorney's fees on 11 notes for $50 each, payable to the plaintiffs, dated August 6, 1909, and due, respectively, from 7 to 17 months after date, and that the defendant had defaulted in the payment of the notes due from March 6 to June 6, 1910. These allegations were followed by allegations similar to those set out in the first count, as to the mortgage, etc. The third count was based on a separate transaction, being for $100 principal and for interest and attorney's fees on a note, and prayer for the enforcement of the lien given to secure the payment of the note.

The defendant demurred to the first count of the petition, contending that the relation between the plaintiffs and himself was that of principal and surety, and that, upon payment of the notes by the sureties, the notes were discharged, and the action should have been in assumpsit, and not on the notes; and that if the sureties did not pay the notes, but had merely had them transferred, there was no right of action in them, and their suit was premature. The demurrer was overruled, and this is assigned as error.

The answer admitted the execution of the notes and the mortgage, the default in payment of the past-due notes, and service of notice in regard to attorney's fees, but denied indebtedness for the principal sums, as well as for attorney's fees. It stated that for want of sufficient information the defendant neither admitted nor denied the transfer of the notes as alleged, or the declaration of the maturity of the remaining notes on account of the default. The answer further alleged that the defendant borrowed from the Citizens' & Southern Bank the sum of $3,500, payable in monthly installments of $200, for which he gave his notes, and that the plaintiffs became sureties on the notes and not indorsers; that he gave also his notes for the aggregate sum of $900, payable monthly to the order of the plaintiffs, and executed a mortgage to indemnify them against loss by reason of their suretyship, and that he paid all the notes, both those to the bank and those to the plaintiffs, up to and including February 6, 1910; that on February 18, 1910, the plaintiffs, without just cause or reason, and before any legal default had been made or the liability of the sureties fixed and determined, attempted to foreclose the indemnity mortgage, and that, if he had made default in payment of any of the notes, it was caused without fault on his part, and without his consent, but was due to the illegal and wrongful attempt to foreclose this mortgage whereby the sheriff of Chatham county had taken charge of his business and caused his default in performing his contract. The answer alleges that the only notes past due are "for March, April, May, and June, aggregating $800," that the rest of the notes have not matured, and that the plaintiffs are sureties on the notes, and cannot charge the defendant for moneys that they have not been called upon to pay, and for which their liability in law has not become fixed and determined by judgment or otherwise. It is further alleged by the defendant that the contract and notes sued on and set out in the first and second counts of the petition are tainted with usury; that he has paid $300 in excess of the legal rate of interest on these notes for the amount of money loaned him by the bank up to February 6, 1910; that the $550 sued for in the second count is for money promised and contracted to be paid for the use of money in excess of legal interest, and is usurious; that, as the sums of money sued for in the first and second counts are not due, the plaintiffs were not entitled to attorney's fees, and that the $100 sued for in the third count is infected with usury.

The answer was demurred to both generally and specially. The court sustained the demurrer to the answer as to the first and second counts of the petition, and overruled it as to the third count, and thereupon the defendant amended by setting up the transactions more in detail, but in substance repeating the answer as originally filed. On demurrer, both general and special, the amended answer was also stricken; and this is assigned as error. A second amendment to the answer set up that the notes transferred to the plaintiffs before maturity were not due, and that the plaintiffs as sureties, being subrogated to the rights of the creditor, the Citizens' & Southern Bank, which was without power or authority to demand payment of the same before maturity, they could not declare the same due and demand payment thereon before maturity; that the relations between the plaintiffs and the defendant being that of principal and surety, and the sum sued for not yet due, said sum could not now be demanded by either the creditor or the surety, as the transfer of the notes was without the consent of the defendant, and the sureties could not recover thereon before legally called on to pay the sum; that, even if the transfer of the notes was valid, the plaintiffs were under no legal obligation to make payment until after maturity of the notes, and therefore could not recover for any of the notes not matured. This second amendment was demurred to generally, and also on the ground that the mortgage covenanted that the plaintiffs had a right to declare all the notes due in case of default as to any one of them, and that the facts presented by the answer contained an attack on the title of the plaintiffs which was not necessary to let in the defense claimed. The amendment was stricken, and this is assigned as error.

The plaintiffs by amendment struck the third count of their petition. Exception is taken to the allowance of the amendment. The pleadings are voluminous, but it is not necessary to set them forth more in detail; the foregoing statement being sufficient to present the substantial questions raised, and counsel for the plaintiff in error in their argument and brief not insisting before this court on any questions raised by the pleadings except those which involve the substantial merits of the case. On the trial the plaintiffs submitted the following evidence: The notes sued on in the first and second counts; all the notes made to the Citizens' & Southern Bank and indorsed by it, the mortgage executed by the defendant to the plaintiffs to secure them against loss on their indorsement; the notice given by the plaintiffs to the defendant, declaring default as to all the notes on failure to pay those due, stating their intention to bring the suit and claim attorney's fees. The defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that the notes and the mortgage sued on showed the plaintiffs to be sureties, and that they were suing for debts not matured, and that the suit was on notes, and not for money paid. The court overruled the motion, and the defendant accepted to this ruling. The defendant offered no evidence. The court directed a verdict for the full amount of the suit, and the defendant excepted.

R. L. Colding and Jas. F. Evans, for plaintiff in error. Wm. M. Farr and Edward S. Elliott, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Were all the notes sued on legally due when suit was brought? This question depends upon the right of plaintiffs to declare all the notes to be due on default in the payment of any one of them. The mortgage executed by Jones to the Nortons to secure them in their indorsement of his notes to the bank contained a covenant that if default was made in the payment of any of the notes made to the bank, and which were therein described, the Nortons would, at their option, have the right to declare the whole remaining indebtedness due and payable at once. In other words, only two things were necessary to mature all the notes, viz., a default in the payment of any one, and a declaration by the Nortons that the default matured all the notes. The default being admitted and this declaration duly proved, the question arises as to the validity of this provision of the mortgage. The provision is as follows: "And it is hereby covenanted and agreed, in further consideration of the premises, that if default should be made in the payment of any one or all of said notes, or any renewals thereof, or any interest thereon, in whole or in part, as and when the same may become due and payable, * * * it shall and may be lawful for the parties of the second part [the Nortons], their heirs or assigns, at their option, to declare the whole remaining indebtedness then unpaid to be due and payable at once." It is further provided that "in case of default in the payment of said debt, or any part thereof, * * * the parties of the second part shall have the right either to sell said property [described in the mortgage], or they may take such other legal proceedings hereunder as they may deem necessary and proper in the premises." To provide against any loss which might grow out of their suretyship or indorsement on the notes made by the defendant, Jones, the plaintiffs took the mortgage with the covenant in question. It cannot be doubted that such a provision in a mortgage is valid. The provision is one of general usage, and has been repeatedly held to be valid. In Shellman v. Scott, R. M. Charl. 380, a provision similar in its terms was first held in this state to be valid. In that case the covenant in the mortgage was in the following language: "And if default shall be made in the payment of the principal sum aforesaid, or in the payment of interest at any time when the same shall become due, then, in any such case, upon any such default, it shall and may be lawful for the said Benjamin S. Scott [mortgagee], his heirs," etc., "to grant, sell," etc. Similar stipulations providing for the acceleration of the maturity of unpaid notes on the failure to pay any one that is due, were passed upon by the Supreme Court in Kilcrease v. Johnson, 85 Ga. 600 (3), 11 S. E. 870; Smith v. Champion, 102 Ga. 92 (3), 29 S. E. 160; Stocking v. Moury, 128 Ga. 414, 57 S. E. 704; Harris v. Powers, 129 Ga. 76, 58 S. E. 1038. In the case of Sneed v. Wiggins, 3 Ga. 94, the contract was one to pay money in which it was expressly stipulated that the money should be paid by installments at specified times, and if one installment was not promptly paid, the whole sum should thereupon become due and payable. It was held that time was of the essence of the contract, and, if the party agreeing to pay failed to do so, he was not entitled to relief in equity. But the validity of such a provision is not an open question either in this state or elsewhere. 20 Amer. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 932; 27 Cyc. 1101. Certainly the plaintiffs, as the holders of the notes, had the right to sue on them. The defendant borrowed $3,500 from the bank, and gave his promissory notes therefor, each one of which was indorsed by the plaintiffs. In consideration of their indorsement, the plaintiffs required Jones to give his notes to them for $50 each, due in from 1 to 18 months; and, in order to protect them from any loss from the indorsements on the notes, they further required the defendant to give them the mortgage in question. This mortgage secured them in two things—against loss on account of their indorsements on the notes to the bank, and also in the payment of the $900 which they required of him for their risk as sureties. Either their liability on the notes as sureties or their indorsements constituted a good and valid consideration for the execution of the mortgage. The notes were negotiable. They were all indorsed in blank by the bank. The plaintiffs, as the holders of the notes, had the right to sue in their own names certainly on those notes which were past due at the time of the transfer, and it cannot be denied that the action is valid as to the four $200 notes, or $800 in all, which were past due when the transfer was made; and we do not understand that any defense was made as to these. It is true the defendant in his plea says that he does not believe that the transfer was for value, or that the plaintiffs had paid for the notes, and he demands strict proof of title. But, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the law presumes that the holder of a promissory negotiable note acquired the same before maturity and for value, and is a bona fide holder thereof, and his title cannot be inquired into, unless it is necessary for the protection of the defendant, or to let in some defense which he could not otherwise make. Civ. Code 1910, § 4290.

The plaintiffs, then, being the bona fide holders of the notes made to the bank, as transferees, and as such entitled to sue thereon, and being the holders of the mortgage based upon a valid consideration, it cannot be seriously questioned that they were entitled to the benefit of the stipulation contained in the mortgage, and which is shown to be a perfectly valid stipulation, that, in case of default as to one note, they had the right at their option to declare all the remaining notes due. But, even without any legal authority in support of this right, the contract itself expressly gave the plaintiffs the right, on default in the payment of one note, to declare all the others due, and, as this stipulation or covenant does not contravene any public policy or general principle of law, it is valid and binding. It is not denied that such a stipulation would be valid when made to the payee of notes, or by the holder of a mortgage made to secure notes. The question is whether such a provision is valid when made to protect a surety. Under section 3568 of the Civil Code of 1910, any surety who has paid the debt of his principal is entitled to be substituted in the place of his creditor as to all securities held by him for the payment of the debt. If, therefore, the bank had held a mortgage providing that, in case of default of one note, all the notes would become due, the transfer of the notes by the bank would carry with it to the transferee the right which the bank had as to this stipulation, for the transfer of a note secured by a mortgage carries with it the mortgage lien. National Bank v. Exchange Bank, 110 Ga. 692, 36 S. E. 265. Since, therefore, a valid transfer of promissory notes carries with it any covenant or stipulation which provides that the default in the payment of one note will give an election to declare all the notes due, we do not see why it is not competent and legal to make a direct covenant to this effect, for a valuable consideration with the indorser or surety on the note. "The right of the surety in these respects will be controlled by the terms of agreement between the parties, as where it is stipulated that the surety may enforce his security upon default of the principal or the contract is otherwise of such a nature as to give the surety the right to enforce his security before payment." 32 Cyc. 248. We conclude on this question that the mortgage made to the plaintiffs as indorsers of the promissory notes made by the maker which contained the stipulation that all the notes at the option of the holder of the mortgage could be declared to be due on failure to pay any one of them, and which was to protect them against the risk which they had assumed, was a valid contract and enforceable by them, and especially is this true in view of the fact that they had become the actual holders of the notes by purchase from the bank before the declaration as to the payment of all the notes was made and before the suit was brought.

[2] 2. It is insisted that the court erred in striking the plea of usury. It is not claimed that there was any usury in the notes made to the bank, but it is said that the notes made to the sureties for the bonus of $900 were usurious; it being insisted that these sureties were practically the lenders of the money to the defendant, as the bank advanced the money to him on their indorsement, and as they had taken an indemnity mortgage, not only for the sum advanced by the bank, but also to secure the payment of their bonus of $900, and that in this suit they were seeking to recover not only the principal sum borrowed, together with the highest rate of interest allowable, but also the further sum of $550, with interest thereon, for the use of the principal sum, which was usury; at least, it is said this was a question for the jury, and the court should have submitted to the jury the question as to what was the real truth of the transaction, and, if the jury found from the evidence that it was resorted to to evade the usury laws, the contract would be void, at least to the extent of the usury; but that, if the jury found that it was a bona fide sale of credit to enable the maker of the notes to borrow money from another, it was not usurious. The allegations as to usury did not leave this question issuable. It is admitted that the money was borrowed from the bank, and that the defendant made his notes to the bank for the money, and that these notes provided for only the legal rate of interest. The bank was unwilling to lend the money without an indorser; and, to procure the indorsement of the plaintiffs, the defendant agreed to pay them the $900, as well as to indemnify them against loss on account of their indorsement. It is clear that the $900 was paid as a premium, not to the bank, but to the plaintiffs as indorsers of the notes made by the defendant to the bank; not alone for securing a loan from the bank, though this fact would not taint the transaction with usury, but for their indorsement of the notes. The transaction was perfectly valid, and not tainted with usury. "Where the lender neither takes, nor contracts to take, more than legal interest, the loan is not rendered usurious by money paid, or agreed to be paid, by the borrower to others in order to obtain the loan." Civ. Code 1910, § 3437. Therefore, even if the facts showed that the $900 was contracted to be paid to the plaintiffs by the defendant as the borrower in order to obtain the loan, this would not make it usurious. But the evidence shows that the plaintiffs not only assisted the defendant in obtaining the loan, but made it possible for him to obtain it, in agreeing to become indorsers thereon. It is well settled in this state that, where the lender of money neither takes nor contracts to take anything beyond lawful interest, the loan is not rendered usurious by what the borrower does in procuring the loan and using its proceeds. Merck v. American Freehold Co., 79 Ga. 213, 7 S. E. 265; Hughes v. Griswold, 82 Ga. 299, 9 S. E. 1092. In this case it is not claimed that the Citizens' & Southern Bank ever took or contracted to take anything for the loan beyond the legal interest, and the fact that the borrower gave his notes for $900 to the plaintiffs as compensation for the risk undertaken by them in their indorsement and for their services in procuring the loan did not make the loan by the bank usurious, and it was a perfectly legal contract for the defendant to make. Blount v. Bowne, 82 Ga. 346, 9 S. E. 164. Indeed, the answer nowhere avers that the bank had any knowledge whatever of this contract which was made by Jones with the Nortons.

[3] 3. The next point urged by counsel for the plaintiff in error is that the suit was prematurely brought for the reason that the notes had not matured; that the transfer of the notes by the creditor to the sureties was entirely voluntary; that the sureties had no right to proceed until a judgment had been obtained against them and their liability as sureties had been fixed and determined in law by judgment or otherwise. In support of this contention, counsel cites section 3555 of the Civil Code of 1910, which is in the following language: "If the principal executes any mortgage or gives other security to the surety or indorser to indemnify him against loss by reason of his suretyship, the surety or indorser may proceed to foreclose such mortgage, or enforce such other lien or security, as soon as judgment shall be rendered against him on his contract." In so far as this section of the Code is applicable at all to the facts of this case, it simply provides a remedy for the indorser or surety in the absence of any stipulations in the contract between the principal and the surety on the subject. This section recognizes the right of the principal to give to his surety or indorser a mortgage or other security to secure and protect him on his indorsement or suretyship, and, if it is legal for such a mortgage to be given, it can be provided in the mortgage that it can be foreclosed or enforced in such way as the parties may stipulate, without reference to the statutory right referred to. In other words, in such a contract, it would be perfectly competent for the parties to stipulate in the mortgage that, on failure to pay one of the installments, all the balance of the debt would become due, and the holder of the mortgage would have a right to proceed to collect the whole debt. But, aside from all this, we do not see why it was not perfectly legitimate for the sureties on these notes made to the bank by Jones, who were apparently to be called on to pay them because of the default of the maker could not have bought the notes from the bank, and, after having bought them and becoming the holders thereof for a valuable consideration, have exercised the right given under the mortgage to declare that all the notes were due because of the default in the payment of the four which had matured before the transfer, and brought suit at once, for in this event no judgment could be obtained against the sureties as they had ceased to be sureties and were the holders of the notes, and were subrogated to all the original rights of the payee as against the maker. Of course, the notes for $550 which were given to the plaintiffs as a bonus for their services and as a compensation for their risk in becoming sureties for the defendant by the same stipulations in the mortgage were all due, and the plaintiffs, being the holders of all the notes made by the same maker, could bring suit thereon in the same action against him. In other words, the suit in this case was not one by a surety against his principal, based upon the fact that he as surety had been called upon to pay the debt of his principal, but it was simply a case where the surety had become the holder by purchase of the negotiable instrument on which he was a surety, and, as such holder of the note, was claiming that the maker should pay him, not because he had paid the note or was liable thereon as surety, but because he stood in the place of the original payee, and for that reason was entitled to payment. The whole contention, it seems to us, as to when a surety would have a right to bring a suit against his principal, is not germane to the facts set out by the pleadings, which are not in dispute.

[4] The foregoing constitute the only questions which are insisted upon by plaintiff in error before this court and which are embraced in his brief, many other questions raised by the record having been abandoned.

[5] The evidence for the plaintiffs, which was not controverted by the defendant, demanded the verdict which was directed by the court.

Judgment affirmed.

WRIGHTSVILLE & T. R. CO. v.
VAUGHAN. (No. 3,109.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§§ 46, 193*)—PETITION—DESCRIPTION OF PLAINTIFF—MARRIAGE—"MRS."

Where the plaintiff in a case is a female, and the question whether she is married or single is material to her right to recover, the petition should disclose the fact whether she is married or single. This is a formal defect, but it may be reached by special demurrer.

(a) The prefix "Mrs." before the name of a party, indicates that the party is a female, but leaves it doubtful whether she is married or single (using the word "single" in a sense broad enough to include a divorced person).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 101, 428; Dec. Dig. §§ 46, 193.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4615.]

2. PLEADING (§§ 207, 225*)—DEMURRER—SPECIAL DEMURRER—AMENDMENT.

The office of a special demurrer to a plaintiff's petition in this state, is to compel the plaintiff to set forth his charge or ground of complaint plainly, fully, and distinctly, where he has failed to do so. A petitioner cannot be required by special demurrer to set forth the evidence by which he expects to prove the allegations made in his petition; but by this means he can be compelled to give a plain, distinct, and definite statement of issuable and traversable facts, instead of general allegations of liability, or instead of vague, uncertain, or ambiguous recitals. The plaintiff, to meet a special demurrer, may amend as a matter of course, or may by order of court be compelled to amend, upon pain of a dismissal for failure to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 512, 575-582; Dec. Dig. §§ 207, 225.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§§ 209, 229*)—ACTION—RIGHT OF ACTION—PLEADING.

Ordinarily the earnings of a married woman are not a part of her separate estate, but belong to her husband. Hence, where she has received a tortious personal injury, permanently impairing or destroying her earning capacity, her husband, and not she, has the right to sue for the loss, so far as relates to the period of their joint lives. This is the ordinary rule, but there are exceptions, as where the husband has, expressly or impliedly, consented for the wife to have her own earnings, or where the wife is living separate from her husband.

(a) Where a married woman sues for personal injuries, and claims the right to recover for earnings or for loss of earning capacity, the defendant may, by special demurrer, compel her to allege in what right she claims the privilege of recovering them, whether by reason of her husband's consent, or by reason of the fact that she was living in a state of separation.

(b) The rule above announced is not in conflict with the recognized rule that the jury, in estimating the damages which a married woman has suffered as a result of a personal injury, may take into consideration, on the question of the degree of her pain and suffering, the fact that her earning capacity has been impaired.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 766-773; Dec. Dig. §§ 209, 229.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 229*)—ACTION—RIGHT OF ACTION—NECESSARIES.

Primarily the husband, and not the wife, is responsible for necessities, such as medicine and medical treatment furnished to the wife where she has sustained a personal injury; and if the married woman seeks to hold the wrongdoer through whose act the personal injury was inflicted responsible for such expenses, so incurred as a result of the personal injury, she should allege the facts essential to show an exception to this general rule, and by special demurrer may be compelled to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a special demurrer is well taken, and the court overrules it, the error is prima facie harmful, but not necessarily so. If the reviewing court can with reasonable certainty say that no harm or injury has resulted to the complaining party, a new trial will not be granted, notwithstanding an error of this nature may appear in the record; but in the present case this court cannot say that the error in overruling the special demurrers was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4089-4105; Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

6. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 210*)—ACTION—RIGHT OF ACTION—LOSS OF EARNING CAPACITY—"CHOSE IN ACTION."

Where a woman suffers a tortious personal injury, impairing or destroying her earning capacity, the cause of action arising therefrom becomes a "chose in action," within the meaning of Civil Code 1910, § 2993, and a part of her separate estate, notwithstanding her subsequent marriage, though the damages which under the law she would have been entitled to recover as a result of the tort may include compensation for loss of earning capacity, which the after-acquired husband would have been entitled to enjoy if it had not been previously destroyed by the tort. Hence in such a case it affords no defense to the action, based upon the loss of earning capacity, to show that she married between the date of the injury and the date of the trial.

Error from City Court of Sandersville; K. J. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by W. M. Vaughan against the Wrightsville & Tennille Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed, with direction.

Daley & Daley and Evans & Evans, for plaintiff in error. Minter Wimberly, Jesse Harris, and Hardwick & Wright, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Mrs. Vaughan sued the railroad company because of personal injuries received by her when a passenger on one of the company's trains, and recovered a verdict of $9,000. The defendant has excepted concerning a number of grounds of error; but there are many of them as to which it will not be necessary to rule, on account of the nature of the decision which is about to be rendered in the case. The petition is brought in the name of "Mrs. Willie Mae Vaughan"; but it is nowhere stated in the petition whether the plaintiff was a married woman, a widow, or a divorced person. Among other elements of damages, she prayed to recover for loss of salary and loss of earning capacity; it being alleged in this respect that she was employed as a traveling salesman, and as such she was earning $100 per month. She also asks for damages on account of hospital expenses, doctor's bill, and medicine, of about $1,000 in amount. In addition to this she sought damages for certain physical injuries which were inflicted upon her, and for pain and suffering.

At the appearance term the defendant filed demurrers to the petition, on the following grounds:

"Because said petition is filed in the name of Mrs. Willie Mae Vaughan, which implies that she is a married woman, but there is no distinct allegation in said petition showing whether petitioner is a single or married woman; therefore the petition is too vague and uncertain, for this reason."

"Because in the seventeenth paragraph of plaintiff's petition she alleges that at the time of said accident she was employed as a traveling saleswoman and was earning $100 per month in such capacity, but she does not allege whether she was thus engaged with the consent of her husband, or in her own right, nor does she allege any reason why she was dependent upon her earnings for her support."

"Because in the fourteenth paragraph of said petition certain expenditures are set forth for doctor's bill, hospital expenses, medicine, and loss of salary, without such allegations as would show petitioner's right to recover for such items and expenses incurred."

"Because, under the allegations contained in said petition, plaintiff is a married woman, and as such has no right to recover for loss of time and services and for medical bill and hospital expenses, as set forth in said petition."

The court overruled the demurrers, and exceptions pendente lite were preserved.

At the trial it appeared, from the plaintiff's testimony, that at the time of her injury the plaintiff was a married woman, and that she was living separate from her husband, whose name was Smith, and that with his consent she was receiving and keeping her earnings to her own use and benefit. A divorce suit was pending between her and Mr. Smith at the time of the injury. Between the date of the injury and the date of the filing of the suit the final verdict in the divorce suit was granted, and she was married to Mr. Vaughan, with whom she was living at the time of the trial. The marital status of the plaintiff is involved in a number of different ways in the course of the decision of the points raised in the case. Some of the points arise on consideration of the demurrers just mentioned, but in the motion for a new trial the point is also made that, inasmuch as she had remarried before the bringing of the suit, her second husband, and not she, would be entitled to recover for the loss of her earning capacity which the injury inflicted on her, unless, indeed, this right was in her first husband.

[1] 1. We have come to the opinion that the court erred in overruling the special demurrer by which the defendant sought to compel the plaintiff to state whether she was a single or a married woman at the time of her injury, especially in the light of the fact that the court also overruled a special demurrer which pointed out that she had not alleged whether she was engaged in business and receiving earnings of $100 a month with the consent of her husband, or in her own right, and overruled a special demurrer to the paragraph in which she alleged damages on account of doctor's bills, hospital expenses, and medicine, without further allegations to show by what right she sought to recover for these items of expense. The extent to which a woman may be damaged by personal injury usually depends upon whether she is married or single (using the word "single" in a sense broad enough to include a divorced person). The prefix "Mrs.," appearing in connection with the plaintiff's name, is ambiguous. Cf. Ballard v. St. Albans Co., 52 Vt. 325. This was an ambiguity which the plaintiff should have relieved in response to the special demurrer. However, in the light of the fact that she became Mrs. Vaughan after the cause of action arose, and in the light of what we are going to hold herein as to the materiality, or rather lack of materiality, of her marriage to Mr. Vaughan, we would not reverse the judgment for this delinquency alone.

The most serious objection to the petition was that pointed out by the other special demurrers to which we have referred—that in her petition she sought to recover damages because of the loss of her earnings, without alleging whether she was engaged in the business from which these earnings were received with the consent of her husband, or in her own right, and that she sought to hold the company liable to her for doctor's bills, hospital charges, and medicine, without stating further any reason how or why she, and not her husband, became liable for these items of expense, so as to authorize her to recover for them as a part of her damages.

[2] 2. This brings us to a consideration of the nature and use of a special demurrer in this state. This question was very ably treated in Kemp v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 122 Ga. 559, 50 S. E. 465, by Mr. Justice Lamar (whose recent and well-merited elevation to the highest court of the nation enhances even that high regard in which his opinions were formerly held by the bench and bar of this state). It is there pointed out that under our liberal system of pleading many technical rules have been abolished, and that petitions containing such incomplete and partial statements of facts as in many jurisdictions would be held bad in substance are not so regarded in this state, and if the petition contains enough to amend by the incompleteness of statement will be treated as a defect in form rather than a defect in substance; that general demurrer is the means of reaching defects in substance, while special demurrer is the remedy against formal defects or incompleteness of statement. It is pointed out that the Code (Civ. Code 1910, § 5538) requires as to form that the petition shall "plainly, fully, and distinctly" set forth, not only the plaintiff's "charge," but also his "ground of complaint and demand"; that any failure to comply with this requirement can be voluntarily cured by amendment, almost as a matter of course; and the learned justice pointedly asks: "And why should there be reluctance to cure the defect? The more liberal the right to make amendment, the more ready should the party be to make it, and the court to require it." Then, after adverting to the proposition that it is always easier to allege than to prove, and to the inexpediency of the court's going forward with the trial of a case as to which the plaintiff, in knowledge of his facts, cannot conscientiously allege enough to state a full definite cause of action, he continues: "In view of the liberality in holding defective petitions good as against a motion to dismiss, and the almost unlimited right to amend, but with a recognition at the same time of the defendant's right to a full statement, there has been a marked tendency in our decisions to magnify the office and importance of the special demurrer. And when the defendant calls therefor, he is entitled to a full statement of time, place, circumstance, and facts the plaintiff expects to prove, so that he may prepare his defense accordingly—whether that defense be by demurrer or by plea raising an issue to be passed on by the jury. He is entitled to a statement of issuable and traversable facts; not to general allegations of negligence or liability, which, at last, are more in the nature of conclusions than allegations of fact."

It is true that the marked tendency noticed by the learned justice "to magnify the office and the importance of the special demurrer" probably reached its acme when the case of Kemp v. Central Ry. Co., supra, again appeared in the Supreme Court sub nom. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Brandenburg, 129 Ga. 115, 58 S. E. 658, when the decision sustaining the special demurrers in that case was rendered by a divided court. The tendency of the Supreme Court and of this court is now somewhat in the other direction. Cf. Bittick v. Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry., 136 Ga. —, 70 S. E. 1106 (rendered in April), in which the views expressed by the dissenting justices in the Brandenburg case seem to have been recognized as controlling. Despite this tendency to somewhat modify the breadth of the scope which was formerly given to the office of special demurrer, there has been no tendency to diminish the general effect of the rule, so far as it allows the defendant by special demurrer to challenge the petition, if it fails to set out the basal facts definitely and without ambiguity. As Justice Lumpkin says in the recent case of Riley v. Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co., 133 Ga. 413, 421, 65 S. E. 890, 893, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379: "Useless detail and elaboration are not required. But there is no reason to permit vital facts in a case to be pleaded in vague, uncertain, or ambiguous terms, which may have the effect of not putting the adverse side on notice as to how to prepare the defense or to allow the pleader to fail or to refuse to amend as to such matters when called on to do so by appropriate [special] demurrer." It is true, as this court held in Cedartown Cotton Co. v. Miles, 2 Ga. App. 79, 81, 58 S. E. 239, 290, "the plaintiff is not required to set forth the evidence, either direct or circumstantial, by which he expects to establish the traversable facts alleged in the declaration, and a demurrer cannot properly be used to compel him to do so"; but, as was further pointed out in that case, there is a vast difference between setting forth the evidence and alleging specific facts upon the which the plaintiff bases his case.

[3] 3. When a woman seeks to recover for lost earnings, or even for lost earning capacity, it becomes basal and important to inquire whether she was married or single, and, if married, whether she was living in a state of separation from her husband, or was entitled to receive her earnings by reason of his consent, express or implied. Notwithstanding the general contractual emancipation of married women in this state by reason of the act of 1866, embodied in Civil Code 1910, § 2993, it is still the law that, in the absence of any contract or agreement, express or implied, on the part of her husband that the earnings of his wife shall be retained by her as her separate estate, they belong to him. Roberts v. Haines, 112 Ga. 842, 38 S. E. 109. It is true that by Civil Code 1910, § 2995, the acquisitions of a wife living separate from her husband belong to the wife, and it follows that, "when a married woman is injured by the wrongful conduct of another, two different causes of action may arise: The one in her favor for her own pain and suffering, and the other in favor of the husband for the loss of his wife's services and for expenses incurred as a consequence of the injuries to her. These causes of action are separate and distinct, and in favor of different parties." Ga. R. Co. v. Tice, 124 Ga. 459, 461, 52 S. E. 916, 917. It is further held in that case that the damages ensuing to the husband are not confined to the value of her services in the household; "but when at the time of the injury she is actually engaged in a business or calling or avocation which results in earnings for the husband, and there is nothing to indicate that there was any agreement between the husband and wife that this should terminate at any time in the future, we think that as against the wrongdoer the inference is to be indulged that the wife will continue the work for the benefit of her husband during that period of her life in which she is able to perform the services."

Therefore, in this case, when the plaintiff showed by her petition that she was a woman, and left it doubtful as to whether she was married or single, and whether she was living separate from her husband, or whether there was any agreement between her and her husband that she should have her own earnings, it left "vital facts in the case pleaded in vague, uncertain, or ambiguous terms," and as there was a special demurrer pointing out this very delinquency, and as the plaintiff failed and refused to amend in this respect, we are constrained to hold that the court erred in overruling the special demurrer. In ruling this we have not overlooked the fact that the wife, as well as the husband, has an interest in her earning capacity, and that she may show that she has lost that earning capacity, as proof tending to establish the degree of pain and mental anguish she has suffered, but this is a very different thing from recovering for loss of earnings or loss of earning capacity as such. Powell v. Augusta R. Co., 77 Ga. 192, 200, 3 S. E. 757; Atlanta Street Ry. v. Jacobs, 88 Ga. 647, 15 S. E. 825; Metropolitan R. v. Johnson, 90 Ga. 500, 508, 16 S. E. 49.

[4] 4. Taking up, now, the special demurrer which pointed out the indefiniteness and incompleteness with which the plaintiff has set up her right to recover for doctor's bills, hospital expenses, and druggist's bills: The only allegation as to these items is as follows: "Petitioner further shows that said defendant company is indebted to her in actual damages in the following bill of particulars: Doctor's bill, $870; hospital expenses, $168; medicine, $125." Primarily the husband is bound for all necessities furnished to the wife, whether she is living with him or separately from him, unless she is living in adultery with another man, or unless she has voluntarily abandoned him without sufficient provocation, and the husband has given notice that he will not be bound. Civil Code 1910, §§ 2996, 2997. While a married woman has such contractual ability that she can make a special contract to pay for necessities furnished to her, still where it does not affirmatively appear that she has so contracted, and it merely appears that the necessities were furnished, it is to be presumed that she contracted for them in the right of her general agency for her husband, and that he, and not she, is liable for them. Freeman v. Holmes, 62 Ga. 556; Rushing v. Clancy, 92 Ga. 769, 19 S. E. 711. Therefore, even if we should construe the petition as capable of asserting that the plaintiff claimed that, by reason of the infliction of injuries upon her, an expenditure for necessary medical attention and supplies in the sum named arose, still prima facie this would be a damage caused to the husband, and not to her. Lewis v. City of Atlanta, 77 Ga. 756, 4 Am. St. Rep. 106; Georgia R. Co. v. Tice, 124 Ga. 459, 52 S. E. 916. Before she could recover for these things, it would be necessary for her to show, and therefore to allege, if required to do so by special demurrer, that her husband had failed or refused to furnish her, and that she had contracted for them on her own liability. This she failed to do, even after special demurrer calling attention to the delinquency. It seems plain that the court erred in overruling this demurrer. As the Supreme Court states it in Roberts v. Haines, 112 Ga. 842, 38 S. E. 109: "While it is true that the act of 1866 has wrought many changes in the law with reference to the separate estate of a married woman, there is still imposed upon the husband the obligation to support his wife, with the corresponding right to her services and earnings during coverture." It is to be noticed, also, that under the Code sections mentioned above the prima facie liability of the husband for necessities furnished to the wife does not cease upon his consenting for his wife to receive and to have her earnings to her own benefit.

[5] 5. Having reached the conclusion that the court committed error in overruling these special demurrers, it becomes our duty to look somewhat further into the matter; for it is not every erroneous ruling upon special demurrer that will require the grant of a new trial. The error is prima facie harmful; but there are cases in which the record demonstrates that the error was in fact harmless, and no reversal will be granted for harmless error. After a careful examination of the present record, we cannot say that these errors were harmless. The record shows that the only witness who testified as to these basal facts upon which the plaintiff claimed the right to recover for her loss of earnings and earning capacity, the expenses of her medical treatment, etc., was the plaintiff herself. It is, of course, entirely possible—indeed, we may say very probable—that her statement as to these matters is the truth; but as she declined, in response to special demurrer, to give the information in advance as to what she expected to prove as to these things, she put the defendant to the disadvantage of being unable to prepare its defense, so far as the contradiction of the matters was concerned. It may be that, if the defendant had known in advance that she proposed to claim that her husband had consented for her to receive her earnings, it might have obtained the testimony of this husband and have proved the contrary by him, or might have proved that the husband was able and willing to have paid for her medical treatment. Indeed, it is impossible to say what the defendant could or could not have proved on this subject, if it had only known what the plaintiff was going to claim as to it. We seriously question that even under her own testimony she made out a case of liability so far as the medical treatment and other similar expenses are concerned; and we cannot say whether the jury allowed these items in the computation of the damages or not.

[6] 6. As there will likely be another trial of the case (for we assume that the plaintiff will amend to cure the delinquencies to which these special demurrers are directed), we feel that it is necessary for us to decide another point, which, if decided in favor of the plaintiff in error, would be controlling in the case. It is insisted that, since the plaintiff remarried after her injury, she cannot recover damages for the permanent loss of her earning capacity, on the ground that her new husband would be entitled to her earnings. We do not think that the point is well taken. When tort is committed upon a married woman, the right to sue for damages which ensue therefrom is one of those choses in action which by the act of 1866 (Civil Code 1910, § 2998) vests in and belongs to the wife as a part of her separate estate. City of Atlanta v. Dorsey, 73 Ga. 479 (especially at top of page 481 of the opinion). "If a right of action accrues at all on account of a personal injury, it arises immediately upon the occurrence thereof. The damages may continue for years or be permanent in character; but the right to sue arises at once." King v. Sou. Ry. Co., 126 Ga. 794, 795, 55 S. E. 965, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 544. The personal injury which the plaintiff received converted her earning capacity into a chose in action, represented by her right to sue for the impairment or destruction of her earning capacity; so that, when this second husband married the plaintiff, he married her, not as possessing an earning capacity of which he as husband might have taken the benefit, but as possessing a chose in action which, under the Code, remained her separate estate. When a man marries a woman in this state, he is entitled to her earnings, domestic and otherwise, so far as she is able and willing to exert herself to perform them for his benefit, and if a wrongdoer thereafter comes along and impairs the existing earning capacity, a right of action in the husband's favor arises because of the wrong which has thus been done; but if the woman he marries has already converted her earning capacity into cash, or into property, or into a chose in action, he takes only what is left of the earning capacity for his own, and she remains the owner of the cash, or the property, or of the chose in action as the case may be. This particular point is somewhat rare, but the Supreme Court of New Jersey in the case of Reading v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 52 N. J. Law, 264, 19 Atl. 321, had a very similar point, and took the same view as that which we are here expressing.

The judgment will be reversed, because the court erred in overruling the special demurrers, but with direction that the trial court give the plaintiff the privilege of saving the petition from dismissal by making an amendment adequate to cure the deficiencies pointed out. Cf. Riley v. Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co., 133 Ga. 413 (5), 65 S. E. 890, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. BRANCH.

(No. 2,833.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WORK AND LABOR (§ 9*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—NATURE AND FORM OF REMEDY—QUANTUM MERUIT.

One of the different remedies which accrues to a party to an indivisible contract when the other party wholly refuses to perform is the right to sue on a quantum meruit for his services, or for such money as he has expended, if he himself has done anything under the contract, or has paid out money in the execution of its terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 23, 24; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 188*)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where the value of property, or of a paper evidencing the legal title to property, is involved, the amount which the property or instrument in question has been treated by the parties in their transactions in relation thereto as being worth is of such evidentiary value as to authorize the jury to infer that it represents the true market value, especially in the absence of all evidence to the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 232*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.

The contention that the court did not treat the plaintiff in error fairly in the presentation of the issues to the jury is not well taken, as appears from an inspection of the charge as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 926*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTION—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

"An objection that a document offered in evidence was not admissible, because the execution of the same was not proved as required by law, being overruled, the presumption is that the execution was duly proved, unless the contrary affirmatively appears, either by an authentic statement that there was no evidence of execution, or by setting out such evidence on that subject as was adduced to the presiding judge. Mere preliminary evidence upon such a question is not for insertion in the brief of the evidence requisite to support a motion for a new trial. Consequently its absence from the brief does not warrant the conclusion that the overruled objection should have been sustained."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3735-3747; Dec. Dig. § 926.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. CONTRACTS (§ 324*)—ACTION FOR BREACH—NATURE AND FORM OF REMEDY.

Where a railroad company broke its contract to transfer to plaintiff a bill of lading on the payment of the value of the goods involved, the fact that the plaintiff acquired rights which he could have enforced in equity, or that the law gave him the right to use the name of the holder of the legal title to bring an action for use in his favor, does not impair his right of action against the railroad company for breach of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1549-1557; Dec. Dig. § 324.*]

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 40*)—GROUND—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION—HARMLESS ERROR.

Failure to charge more specifically as to the basis of damages is not ground for new trial.

where the jury found the right amount, and there was no request for further instruction.

Error from City Court of Baxley; J. P. Highsmith, Judge pro hac.

Action by E. Branch against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Bennet, Twitty & Reese and J. B. Moore, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Watson and Jas. R. Thomas, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Branch sued the Southern Railway Company, alleging: That he had been agent for the company at Baxley, Ga., and that a shipment of shoes came to that place by freight from A. W. Tedcastle & Co., of Boston, Mass., as shippers, consigned to themselves, "order notify" Mr. F. A. Morris; that is, that the goods were shipped with the bill of lading attached to a draft for $103.50, the price of the goods. That Mr. Morris failed to pay the draft, and, acting on what purported to be instructions from Tedcastle & Co., he, as agent for the railway company, reshipped the goods to Coggins & Brown, a firm of merchandise brokers in Atlanta. That Tedcastle & Co. afterwards filed claim for the value of the goods, insisting that they had not ordered them reshipped. That, when this claim was filed with the railroad company, the plaintiff was unable at the time to produce the written order of reshipment, and made an agreement with the claim agent of the railroad company that he would pay to the company the value of the goods, and that they might settle with Tedcastle & Co., with the understanding that the company would transfer and deliver to him the bill of lading and other papers under which title to the goods was held. That he paid the money to the railroad company, but that they had refused, over his demands, to transfer to him the bill of lading and other papers by which the title to the shipment was held. The answer of the defendant consisted merely of a denial of the salient features of the plaintiff's petition. The plaintiff introduced enough evidence to prove his case as laid, and the jury returned a verdict in his favor for the amount that he had paid to the railroad company, with interest. In its motion for a new trial, the railroad makes a number of assignments of error.

[1] The first point is that the verdict should be set aside on the general grounds, because it does not appear from the evidence how or wherein the transfer and delivery by the railroad company to the plaintiff of the bill of lading, papers, receipts, documents, etc., would have enabled him to secure judgment against Coggins & Brown, to whom the goods were finally delivered; that a formal transfer of these papers was not necessary to put the title in the plaintiff; that even if the legal title was not transferred by the mere fact of his paying the money, still that he had an equitable title thereby, and could have sued in equity to assert all of his rights; and that even if this was not so, still he could have used the name of the holder of the legal title as plaintiff for his use for the purpose of suing Coggins & Brown, or whoever it was necessary to sue in order to recover for the value of the goods. The plaintiff's suit, it must be remembered, proceeded on the theory that he had made a definite contract with the railroad company that, if he paid them this sum of money, they would transfer to him the writings by which the title to the goods had been held, and that the railroad company had breached that contract by refusing to carry out their portion of it in any respect. The Supreme Court in the case of Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 394, 36 S. E. 100, 101, in discussing the rights of one of the parties to an indivisible contract, where the opposite party had breached it by failing to perform, shows that the injured party has a number of remedies, one of which is stated as follows: "If he had done anything under the contract, or paid out any money in the execution of its terms, he had a right to sue on a quantum meruit and recover for the same, this being a cause of action distinct from the original contract, but based upon a contract created by law." The plaintiff in this case did not contract for the equitable title to the goods, but for the legal title, and the defendant company wholly failed to perform its contract in this respect; and under the ruling just quoted, the plaintiff because of this breach, became entitled to recover in an action ex contractu the very amount which he did recover—that is, the amount he paid over to the railroad company, with interest.

[2] Able counsel for the plaintiff in error are doubtless correct in the proposition that the transaction vested the plaintiff in this case with rights which he could have enforced in equity, just as effectively as he might have enforced those same rights at law, if the formal transfer of the writings had been made to him. But we do not think that this fact, or the fact that the law gave him the right to use the name of the holder of the legal title for the purpose of bringing an action for use in his favor, in any wise impairs his right to insist that the company's refusal to transfer the formal title is a breach of the contract. To say that the party is entitled to the one remedy is not to deny that he has the other also. For instance, if A. makes a contract with B., calling for a warranty deed to a certain piece of land, as to which B. holds the legal title, and as to which C. holds an illegal possession, and A. pays to B. the stipulated purchase price and demands the warranty deed, and B. retains the price, but refuses to make the deed, it cannot be questioned that A. thereby acquires the right to assert a complete equitable title to the land, as well as the right to use the name of B. as his lessor in ejectment, if the action be brought in the fictitious form, or as plaintiff suing for his use, if the action be brought under the code procedure, and that by a proceeding either at law or in equity he could thus recover the land from C. Still, notwithstanding all this is true, A. has the right to insist upon his warranty deed, and to treat B.'s failure to execute it as a breach of the contract, and may decline to proceed for the land itself, and many maintain a suit against B. for the amount which he has paid him; and the analogy between the case suggested and case at bar is so complete, it seems to us, as to answer fully the argument of counsel as to this point.

[2] 2. It is further insisted that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that the railroad company's breach of the contract had damaged him, and, further, to furnish to the jury definite proof by which they could measure the extent of this damage, and that there was a failure of proof in this respect; that it is not shown what the shoes were worth, or that, if the title papers had been transferred to the plaintiff, he could have collected anything under any judgment which he might have obtained against Coggins & Brown, because it was not shown that Coggins & Brown were solvent. We think the jury had before them facts and circumstances from which they could well have inferred the value of the shoes, and of the writings by which the legal title to them was held. Conceding that the measure of damage was not fixed at the amount the plaintiff paid the defendant, with interest, and that it was necessary for the plaintiff to show the value of the goods, or of the title papers by which they were held, we still think that there was enough evidence upon which the jury could have based an intelligent and accurate inference. The fact that the original shippers had shipped them out with a draft for this amount attached to the bill of lading, and the fact that the defendant, in settling with the plaintiff, recognized that a claim of this amount was proper, is certainly enough, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, to lead an intelligent juror to assume that the goods were worth this amount, at which they had been uniformly valued in the transactions of the parties. We further think that the fact that the plaintiff was buying and the defendant was selling what practically amounted to an account against Coggins & Brown, on the basis of 100 cents on the dollar, was sufficient, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to authorize the jury to assume that Coggins & Brown were solvent, and that a judgment against them would be good.

[3] 3. Another insistence of the plaintiff in error is that the trial judge was not fair in his charge to the jury, because he instructed the jury at undue length as to the contentions of the plaintiff, and made no corresponding presentation of the contentions of the defendant. An examination of the entire charge shows that it is a very concise presentation of the issues in the case and the principles of law applicable thereto. The judge stated the salient allegations of the plaintiff's petition, and then told the jury that the defendant denied these things, and that correctly states the status of the pleadings. He then instructed the jury that the burden would be upon the plaintiff to satisfy them as to these elements of the case (taking them up in detail) before there could be any verdict in his favor, and that, if they found that he had proved them, there might be a verdict in his favor. The fact that the contentions of the plaintiff were detailed at length was not a matter of special favor to the plaintiff, for they were thus detailed in connection with a statement that these were the things which the plaintiff would have to prove before he could recover. It may be noted in this respect that the court not only put upon the plaintiff the burden of proving these things, but of proving them by a higher degree of evidence than that required in civil investigations, for he told the jury that the plaintiff had the burden of showing these things to the satisfaction of the jury to "a moral and reasonable certainty," which, of course, is the rule in criminal, and not in civil, cases.

[6] It may be that the court should have instructed the jury more specifically as to the basis upon which they should calculate the damages, instead of charging them generally that they should return in his favor whatever amount they "might think that he was damaged by reason of the failure of the defendant to comply with the contract," in the event they found in his favor as to the facts upon which his right to recover was based; but as the jury found the right amount, and as the evidence did not admit of two findings on this issue, and as there was no request for further instructions, there is no reason to grant a new trial on this ground.

[4] 4. Some of the grounds of the motion for new trial complain of the admission of writings without sufficient proof of their execution, and of the admission of the secondary evidence of writings without a sufficient accounting for the absence of the original. These grounds themselves are not in proper form to present the question for consideration (Arnold v. Adams, 4 Ga. App. 56 [2], 60 S. E. 815); but, aside from this technical delinquency, we may say that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge in admitting this evidence, in the light of what was actually proved as to the execution of the writings and as to the inaccessibility of the originals. Besides, these writings related to a feature of the case which was immaterial, because the plaintiff's right to recover would have been the same, irrespective of what might have been the truth as to the particular matter to which these writings related.

Having carefully gone through the record, we find no reason for granting a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

MORSE et al. v. STATE. (No. 3,355.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 11*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSES—OBTAINING REAL PROPERTY.

While the particular statutes creating and defining the offense of cheating and swindling or obtaining property under false pretenses relate specially to personal property, or that character of property which is subject to larcenous asportation, the provisions of section 719 of the Penal Code of 1910, are broad enough to include real estate or any interest therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 12*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—OBTAINING POSSESSION.

To constitute an offense under section 719 of the Penal Code of 1910, it is only necessary to show that the owner of property of value was induced by deceitful means and artful practices to part with the possession thereof, and was thereby cheated and defrauded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 16; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 49*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

No error of law appears, and the evidence supports the verdict. There was no error in overruling the certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 13*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT.

That a contract obtained by defendants, accused of swindling and cheating, was defectively executed by the defrauded corporation, is immaterial, where the contract was one of the means adopted for getting possession of the property of the corporation through the fraudulent representations of accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

A. Morse and others were convicted of cheating and swindling. To a judgment overruling certiorari to review the conviction, they bring error. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Merritt and Geo. Gordon, for plaintiffs in error. Jos. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., Jas. Davison, Sol., and Brown & Shipp, for the State.

HILL, C. J. Plaintiffs in error were convicted in the county court of Greene county on an indictment charging them with the offense of cheating and swindling. Their petition for certiorari was sanctioned by the judge of the superior court, and on the hearing of the certiorari the same was overruled. To the latter judgment they excepted.

The indictment (omitting formal parts) charges that the plaintiffs in error "did * * * falsely and fraudulently, and with intent to defraud Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, represent to said Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, and to T. C. Crawford, president of said company, that they were stockholders of and largely interested financially in Rigbers Ice Cream Company, a corporation, that said Rigbers Ice Cream Company was capitalized at $20,000, all of which was fully paid in, and said Rigbers Ice Cream Company was worth the sum of $20,000, and did, on the faith of said representation, induce said Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, whereby the plant of said Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, including its property, was leased to said Rigbers Ice Cream Company for the term of three years beginning April 1, 1910, and was induced to turn over and deliver said plant and property to said Rigbers Ice Cream Company and to said F. H. Rigbers and A. Morse, representing said Rigbers Ice Cream Company; whereas, in truth and in fact, as the said F. H. Rigbers and the said A. Morse then and there well knew, said Rigbers Ice Cream Company was not then and there capitalized at $20,000, the capital stock of $20,000 was not paid in, and said Rigbers Ice Cream Company was not worth $20,000, or any other like large sum. On account of said false and fraudulent misrepresentation said Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company sustained loss in the sum of $1,000."

[1] A demurrer was filed to this indictment, on the ground that the property alleged to have been procured by the false pretenses set out in the indictment was real estate, was an interest in land, and was not within the purview of the penal statutes of this state defining the offense of cheating and swindling. It is urged with learning and ability that these statutes were intended to apply only to personal property and to protect the title of the owner thereof, and that they were never intended to apply to real estate or an interest therein, as this kind of property was not subject to larcenous asportation. In support of this view counsel cite the statute of 30 Geo. II, c. 24, which seems to be the first statute defining the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses, and the decisions in State v. Eno, 131 Iowa, 619, 109 N. W. 119, and People v. Cummings, 114 Cal. 437, 46 Pac. 284, where in this question is elaborately discussed, and the conclusion reached that statutes of this character do not include real property, however general in terms, and were undoubtedly aimed and designed solely for the purpose of protecting personal property. It cannot be doubted that these statutes originated in certain defects in the application of the laws against larceny, and from a failure of justice which frequently arose from the subtle distinction between larceny and fraud. Although property might be obtained from the possession of the owner by the grossest character of fraud, it would not constitute larceny if in fact it was obtained by the consent of the owner; and it was to cure this defect that these laws, defining cheating and swindling or obtaining property by false pretenses, were enacted. It is also true that under the English decisions these statutes do not apply to real property, the reason being that this class of property could not be carried away and dissipated like chattels, and that, although the owner might be deprived of his landed estate by means of fraudulent practices and deceitful means, yet the property was bound to remain stationary and accessible to law, and the civil courts furnished ample protection; and it is also true that some of the American courts have followed this view of the law in the application of these particular statutes, and it may be that in this state the offense of cheating and swindling would not apply to one who by deceitful means and artful practices obtained title to the land of another, for the very simple reason that the land could not be taken away, and any contract of sale obtained by such illegal means could be set aside either in a court of law or equity. But we are not prepared to say that this principle would apply to a case of a lease, especially if that lease included, with the interest in the land, personal property. "A lease for a term of years is not a freehold estate, but a chattel." Fleld v. Howell, 6 Ga. 423; 8 Enc. Digest of Ga. Reports, 559. One who by deceitful means or fraudulent practices obtains from another a lease of property, and thereby possession of the property, especially where such lease includes personal property, may not only be in a position to deprive the owner of his use of the property for the term of the lease, but may utterly destroy its value to the owner.

Without extending further the discussion on this line (as we deem it unprofitable), we are clear that, under the broad language of the statute of this state under which this indictment was framed, it is not subject to a demurrer on the ground stated. Section 719 of the Penal Code of 1910 provides that "any person using any deceitful means or artful practice, other than those which are mentioned in this Code, by which an individual, or a firm, or a corporation, or the public is defrauded and cheated, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor." Now, this indictment alleges that the defendants, by falsely and fraudulently representing that the Riggers Ice Cream Company was a corporation with a capital stock of $20,000 fully paid in did induce the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company to lease to the Riggers Ice Cream Company its plant and other property with intent to defraud the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, which in fact did subject the said company to a loss of $1,000. It is insisted that this general section of the Code does not apply; that the indictment was framed under section 703 of the Penal Code of 1910. We think the general section does apply, and that the indictment is properly framed on this section, and, if the allegations of the indictment are proved as set out, it would show a violation of this general section of the Penal Code.

[2] In the next place, it is said in support of the demurrer that at most it is charged in the indictment that the defendants by the false pretenses therein alleged obtained a three-year lease to the plant and property of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, and it is insisted that the law is well settled that to constitute an obtaining of property by false pretenses the owner of the property must have been induced by the false representations to part with the title of the property, and not merely with the possession or custody thereof. We do not think the statute under which this indictment is framed is subject to such a limited interpretation. This statute is very broad in its language, and so explicit in its terms as to do away with any necessity for judicial interpretation. "Any person using any deceitful means or artful practice, other than those which are mentioned in this Code, by which an individual, or firm, or corporation, or the public is defrauded and cheated shall be punished as for a misdemeanor. Under the language of this statute, if a person is induced by false and fraudulent representations which in character are deceitful or artful to part with the possession of his property, and the property while in possession of the one who thus gains possession of it is damaged or injured, the person so parting with the possession of his property would be defrauded and cheated to the extent of the damage or injury to the property. We do not think it necessary that the title to the property should be obtained to accomplish the fraud, but it would be sufficient if the possession was obtained for some length of time, and thus the opportunity was furnished for accomplishing the cheat or fraud.

If these defendants, by representing that the Riggers Ice Cream Company was a corporation with a paid-up capital of $20,000, secured from the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company its plant and its property, when in fact the Riggers Ice Cream Company was never organized as an ice cream company and none of the stock had been paid in, and if this property, while in the possession of the defendants, was damaged and depreciated in value by their own unlawful use, could it reasonably be said that they did not violate the terms of this statute? It would be no defense to the criminal act that the lease thus obtained could be set aside in a civil action as having been obtained by fraud. If the allegations in the indictment are true, unquestionably the Rigbers Ice Cream Company, as lessee, was not entitled to the possession of the plant or property of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, and took nothing by the lease; but this did not destroy the criminal character of the acts of Rigbers and Morse, who, by the fraudulent representations described, obtained possession of the plant and property of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company. We think the indictment was good as against the demurrer.

[3] It is insisted that the allegations of the indictment are not supported by the evidence. First, it is said that no complete contract of lease was made between the two corporations, and that the paper claimed to be the lease was incomplete, in that it was understood at the time of its execution that Rigbers, who signed as president of the ice cream company, and Morse, who signed as secretary of said company, would not be bound by the contract until it had also been signed by Kirkpatrick, the treasurer of the company. But this is denied by the state. It is contended—and we think properly so—that the contract was complete and was binding upon both corporations when it had been signed by the presidents of both corporations and the property therein described had been delivered by the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company to Rigbers and Morse as representatives of the Rigbers Ice Cream Company.

[4] It is also insisted by counsel for the plaintiffs in error that the president and secretary of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, who signed the contract, had no authority to make the contract for the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company; that to lease corporate property requires the formal action of either the board of directors or the stockholders. This may be true as a legal proposition; but we think it wholly immaterial whether the contract was legal and binding upon the corporation or not. If the execution of the contract was one of the means adopted by the defendants to carry out their purpose of getting possession of the property of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, and if in fact they did get possession of the property by reason of this contract, although it may have been incomplete and imperfect in its execution, this defect in the contract would make no difference. The question is: Did the contract induce the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, or the officers thereof, to turn over the property of the company to the accused as representatives of the Rigbers Ice Cream Company? In making an application of the evidence in the record to the allegations of the indictment, it is clearly shown that the representations charged in the indictment as being false and fraudulent were in fact made by the defendants to the officers of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company; and it is equally clear that these representations were false, and that the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company was induced by these representations to deliver to the defendants the possession of its plant and property in Greensboro, and the judge was fully authorized to infer, from the falsity of the representations and the conduct of the defendants, that their purpose was fraudulent.

The only question that remains for consideration is: Was the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company defrauded and cheated by these false and fraudulent representations made by the defendants, which induced it to turn over its plant and property to them? Unquestionably the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company was deprived of the use of its property for several months, and this was a thing of value. The individual losses of the stockholders of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company in failing to get pay for the milk which they had furnished to Morse at Greensboro cannot be called the losses of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company, although the contract contemplated that the Rigbers Ice Cream Company was to take the milk of these stockholders and pay for it; but the property of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company was delivered into the possession of Morse and Rigbers at Greensboro in pursuance of this contract, which their false and fraudulent representations had induced, and the use of it for some months lost to the creamery company. This property consisted of machinery, which was damaged in its use by Morse who had secured possession of it as the representative of the Rigbers Ice Cream Company. The evidence does not show how much in dollars and cents this loss amounted to, but that there was some loss in deterioration in the value of the machinery of the Greensboro Co-operative Creamery Company is clearly shown. The case was tried by a very able judge on both the law and the facts; jury having been waived. We do not find that he committed any error of law, and there is some evidence in the record to support his finding under the facts.

The testimony which it is insisted the judge illegally admitted in evidence, we think, was admissible, not only as illustrating the purpose of the defendants in making the representations which induced the making of contract, but also as illustrating the financial condition of the Rigbers Ice Cream Company. The evidence objected to was clearly a part of the res gestæ of the transaction.

Judgment affirmed.

BASHINSKI BROS. v. LAKE.
(No. 2,968.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)CONTRACTS (§ 10)—SALES (§ 22*)—ESSENTIALS OF CONTRACT—MUTUALITY—ACCEPTANCE OF OFFER.

A. and B. signed an instrument under seal, which recites that, for and in consideration of the sum of $1 cash in advance, A. agrees to deliver to B., at a designated time and place and for a stipulated price, 50 bales of cotton of a described grade. B. did not agree to purchase the cotton, or to receive and pay for it, or to assume any obligation in respect thereto. Held: (1) The instrument was unilateral, lacking in mutuality, and not binding upon either party, and was merely an offer or proposal made by A. to B. (2) The right of B. to demand an enforcement of the obligation, in the absence of any mutual agreement or promise contained in the contract itself, depended upon his doing some act prior to the time fixed for the delivery of the cotton, which would bind him to accept and pay for the cotton in the event of its delivery, and there was no allegation that B. had either actually or constructively done any act indicating an acceptance by him of the proposed sale of the cotton prior to the time fixed for its delivery.

Error from City Court of Dublin; K. J. Hawkins, Judge.

Bashinski Bros. sued Lake for damages for the alleged breach of the following contract: "Georgia, - Laurens County. This agreement, made and entered into this 19th day of May, 1909, between E. P. Lake, of the county of Laurens, state of Georgia, of the first part, and Bashinski Bros., of the county of Laurens, state of Georgia, of the other part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of one ($1.00) dollar, cash in advance, the said E. P. Lake agrees to deliver to the said Bashinski Bros. fifty (50) bales of cotton averaging not under 500 lbs. per bale, at the price of 10 cents per pound, basis of good middling, standard Savannah classifications. The differences of grades other than good middling to be the official differences as quoted by the Savannah Cotton Exchange during the month of delivery of said cotton to said Bashinski Bros. at Dublin. No cotton to be delivered to the said Bashinski Bros. on this contract under the grade of middling; no damp, sandy, gin-cut cotton to be delivered on this contract. No bales under 320 lbs. weight to be received. The tare of said cotton not to exceed 24 pounds per bale, said cotton to be delivered not later than November 1, 1909. Cotton to be delivered in lots of not less than one bale at a time. Said cotton to be delivered at Lovett, Ga. In case of disagreement as to weight or grade, or the proper interpretation of this contract, the same to be arbitrated promptly, said E. P. Lake selecting one arbitrator, and Bashinski Bros. selecting the other, and these two arbitrators, in case of disagreement, to select a third arbitrator, whose decision will be binding on both parties, except as to grade. In case of disagreement as to grade, either party to this contract may have the option of referring the matter to the classification committee of the Savannah Cotton Exchange, whose decision will be final and binding on both parties to this contract. Signed in duplicate this 19th day of May, 1909." This contract was signed by each party and was under seal.

The petition alleges that the defendant, Lake, fails and refuses to deliver the 50 bales of cotton as he contracted and agreed to do, by reason of which plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $1,093.74, being the difference in the price contracted for and the price of the cotton on the day when the same was to have been delivered under the contract. The court dismissed the petition on oral motion of the defendant, on the ground that the contract sued upon was unilateral, and was of no binding force or effect in law, and that there was no cause of action set out in the petition; and to this judgment exception is taken.

J. E. Burch, for plaintiff in error. Hines & Jordan and J. S. Adams, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court construing instruments similar in character to this contract, it was held that they were unilateral and lacking in mutuality, and therefore were not binding upon either party. The contract does not contain any obligation on the part of Bashinski Bros. to take the cotton, if tendered by Lake at the time and place specified in the contract. Lake, in consideration of $1 cash in advance, agreed to deliver the cotton, but the Bashinskis did not agree to accept it when delivered. The instrument alleged to be a contract is very similar in terms to the instrument sued upon in Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 168, 46 S. E. 67. In that case the contract was under seal, and therefore imported a consideration, yet the Supreme Court held it to be unilateral, because, although Sivell had signed the contract agreeing to deliver to Hogan, at the time and place stated and at a price named, certain cotton therein described, Hogan did not agree, in the contract or otherwise, either at the time the alleged contract was signed or thereafter, to receive and pay for the cotton, and that the right of Hogan to demand an enforcement of the obligation depended upon his doing some act prior to the time fixed for delivery which would bind him to pay in the event of delivery. See, also, Simpson v.

Sanders, 130 Ga. 265, 60 S. E. 541; Mallet v. Watkins, 132 Ga. 700, 64 S. E. 999, 131 Am. St. Rep. 226, and many cases cited in both of these opinions. We are clear that under these rulings the instrument sued upon was, for the reasons stated, unilateral, and not enforceable as an executory contract of purchase and sale. It is true that the contract in this case was signed by both parties, but this fact of itself does not make the contract one of mutuality. The instrument, to be a valid contract and mutually binding, must contain mutual agreements, or mutual promises, or a mutual consideration. In the cases of Harrison v. Wilson Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 6, 45 S. E. 730, and Cooley v. Morse, 123 Ga. 707, 51 S. E. 625, the instruments alleged to be contracts were signed by both parties. In the latter case the Supreme Court says: "It is true that the instrument sued on begins with the words, 'This agreement, made this day between A. J. Morse and J. L. Cooley,' and is signed by both parties. But Cooley nowhere agrees or promises to do any act, or binds himself in any way. He does not agree to take the lot, or to pay the purchase price"—just as in the present case Lake agrees to deliver, but Bashinski Bros. do not agree to receive or to pay for, the cotton.

The instrument sued on in this case was simply an option. It bound Lake, in consideration of the sum of $1, to sell the cotton; but it does not contain any counter obligation to buy on the part of Bashinski Bros. In other words, it amounted to no more than an offer or proposal of sale. There is no allegation in the petition that this option was exercised by Bashinski Bros. If Bashinski Bros. had accepted the option, it would have been binding upon Lake, and as an option it was irrevocable until the expiration of the time agreed upon by the parties thereto for the performance of the contract, and if, before the date of performance, it had been accepted by Bashinski Bros., or they had done any act indicating an acceptance by them of the contract, it would have made the contract complete. Of course, suing on the instrument after the expiration of the time for acceptance was not sufficient for this purpose, because the suit shows that the defendant, Lake, had abandoned the contract or violated it, and a suit for damages could not amount to a closing of the contract alleged to have been already rendered impossible of performance by the defendant. Cooley v. Morse, supra. The allegations of the petition in the present case are so clearly and fully controlled by the decisions of the Supreme Court above cited, especially the decisions in Simpson v. Saunders and Sivell v. Hogan, the contract in these cases being almost identical in terms with that under consideration, that it renders any further discussion of the question unnecessary; and we therefore conclude that the court did not err in dismissing the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

WARFIELD et al. v. SANBURN.

(No. 2,863.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

NEGLIGENCE (§ 101*)—COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—EFFECT OF FELLOW SERVANT'S NEGLIGENCE—ACTION FOR INJURIES—INSTRUCTION.

The suit was for damages on account of injuries received through a wrongful movement of a locomotive by one of the railroad company's engineers. The plaintiff relied upon two theories: (1) That he himself was a servant of the company, and had been injured in the course of his employment by negligence of the engineer, who was a fellow servant, and that he (the plaintiff) was without fault, and therefore the company was liable to him under the law as it existed in this state prior to the act of 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 160) regulating the liability of railroad companies for injuries to their employes; (2) that if he was not a servant, but was a trespasser, the engineer had injured him through a willful and wanton act, wherefore the company was liable to him. Held, that it was error for the court to instruct the jury that if they believed that the plaintiff was negligent, and the defendant company, through its servant, was also negligent, and that the plaintiff, after being negligent and after seeing his danger, could not prevent the injury to himself, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, but that his recovery should be reduced in proportion to the extent his negligence contributed to the injury.

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by C. O. Sanburn against S. D. Warfield and others, receivers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

E. A. Hawkins, for plaintiffs in error. R. L. Maynard, R. L. Berner, and J. A. Hixon, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The petition in this case was not subject to general demurrer on the ground that it set out no cause of action, but it would have been subject to a demurrer pointing out the fact that it was duplicitous, because in a single count it attempted to set up liability resting on two inconsistent theories: (1) That the plaintiff was an employé of the company, and was hurt through the negligence of a coemployé, but hurt under such circumstances of negligence on the part of the coemployé and of freedom from fault on his own part as to make a case of liability under the law as it existed in this state prior to the passage of the act of 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 160) regulating the liability of railroad companies to their employes; (2) that even if the plaintiff was not an employe, but was a mere volunteer in attempting the work he was doing at the time of his injury, and was therefore to be considered as a trespasser, the engineer had willfully and wantonly injured him, whereby the company was liable. Since there was no timely demurrer complaining of this formal defect, it was permissible for the plaintiff to introduce evidence along both lines, and to take advantage of both theories before the jury; but under neither of these theories was a case for the application of the doctrine of comparative negligence and of diminution of damages presented.

The court instructed the jury very properly that, if they found that the plaintiff was a servant and was injured by the negligence of a coemploye, he could not recover unless he was free from fault; but in this same context, and without in any wise informing them that he was referring to any other theory of the case, charged the rule as to diminution of damages in the event that they found that both were at fault. It has been repeatedly held that the rule in this state by which damages may be proportioned in accordance with the comparative negligence of the parties does not apply to cases arising under the law requiring a servant to be free from fault in order to recover on account of the negligence of a coemploye in railroad service. The present charge would also have been erroneous if, under the context, it could have been considered as able counsel for the defendant in error so ingeniously argues that it should be; that is, as applying to the other theory of the case, because it omits all reference to willfulness and wantonness. Furthermore, the rule is that, if the defendant commits the injury willfully and wantonly, contributory negligence of the plaintiff is no defense at all. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Moore, 5 Ga. App. 562, 63 S. E. 642. While in such cases the principle embraced in the maxim, "volenti non fit injuria," may be so far applied as to prevent a recovery where the plaintiff has actually or constructively consented to his own injury, still the doctrine of contributory negligence is not applicable. The charge, as given, was not appropriate to any theory of the case, but was a charge which was erroneous, whether considered abstractly or in connection with the particular facts to which the court may have intended to relate it.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by James J. Cline against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Wyndham Stokes and J. Graham Sale, for plaintiff in error. Cook & Howard, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. The Norfolk & Western Railway Company constructed two fills or embankments on one side of Tug river for a second track, invading the river. One of these fills was just across the river from a tract of land owned by James J. Cline. In 1907 and again in 1908 high water came in Tug river and washed away a considerable quantity of Cline's land and the trees thereon. Cline sued the railway company and obtained a verdict and judgment for $150, and the company brought this writ of error.

One defense of the action presented for our consideration is that the railway company built these fills on its own right of way, and in doing so did the work in the most approved manner, and was not guilty of any negligence in construction, and therefore, though damage came to Cline, there could be no recovery. Such a legal proposition cannot be sustained. There seems some confusion yet prevailing touching this matter so well established in law that it seems hardly necessary to restate it. When the Constitution provided that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," the law was that a railroad company or other corporation having authority from the Legislature was not liable when land was not actually taken, or so damaged that it amounted to that, for damages to the land merely consequential from the work. Spencer v. Railroad, 23 W. Va. 418, 427, 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1175, 1185; 15 Cyc. 653; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 1103. But if the work was done negligently, if the power was not prudently and carefully exercised, damages could be recovered. Taylor v. Railroad, 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. 29. Some cases held that damages could be recovered even under such provision using only the word "taken"; that a grant of authority from the Legislature could not exempt for property merely damaged, but not taken. Trenton Co. v. Raff, 36 N. J. Law, 335. But this has become an immaterial question, because our Constitution of 1872 (article 3, § 9) inserted the word "damaged," making it read: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." Therefore, no matter whether the property is actually physically taken, or so badly damaged as to amount to a taking, or be merely damaged to a substantial, not speculative, extent, damages may be recovered, and the legislative authority for the work matters not. Pickens v. Coal R. Co., 66 W. Va. 10, 65 S. E. 865; Guina v. Railroad, 46 W. Va. 151, 33 S. E. 87, 76 Am. St. Rep. 806; Gillison v. Charleston, 16 W. Va. 282, 37 Am. Rep. 763; Watson v. Fairmont, 49 W. Va. 528, 39 S. E. 193. This provision of our Constitution came from Illinois, and construing that Constitution the United States Supreme Court held in Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 8 Sup. Ct. 820, 31 L. Ed. 638, that: "Under the provision in the state of Illinois adopted in 1870 that 'private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation,' a recovery may be had in all cases where private property has sustained a substantial injury from the making and use of an improvement that is public in its character; whether the damage be direct, as when caused by trespass or physical invasion of the property, or consequential as in a diminution of its market value." So, if damages came to Cline from those fills, he is entitled to recover.

Another ground of defense is that in fact the fills or embankments did not cause the damage. On this question the evidence is conflicting. There is a large amount of evidence going to show that though there had been in 1901 and 1902 higher rises in Tug river, yet they did not wash the land away, and that these fills changed the current of the stream from the railway side of the river to the other side and threw the current against Cline's land, and that the washing away of the land was directly attributable to these fills. There is some evidence to the contrary. The question was one of fact for the jury. We shall not detail the evidence. The verdict and the action of the circuit court must be in this respect final. Else what efficacy has a verdict upon conflicting oral evidence?

It is complained that the court allowed witnesses to express an opinion that the damage to Cline's land came from those fills. The witnesses giving such opinion were well acquainted with the stream and the fills, had been acquainted with the stream for years before, and spoke from observation of river and fills. Opinion evidence is not always to be rejected. When it is based on practical and actual observation of things, which cannot be brought into court to be seen by the jury, it is admissible. This matter had been often discussed. Walker v. Strosnider, 67 W. Va. 39, pt. 17, 67 S. E. 1087; Kunst v. Grafton, 67 W. Va. 20, 67 S. E. 74, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1201.

Complaint is made of the refusal of instructions. Some of them are based on the proposition of law above stated, and are not sound in that respect. One asserts that it was the duty of Cline to build a defense of his land against the water, and thus prevent damage. Plainly this cannot be so. The work changed the channel and current, and Cline as a riparian owner was entitled to have the river as by nature it was. We need not incorporate those instructions, as the case does not go back for retrial, and as they involve no principle of law not above stated. We need not further discuss the case.

Judgment affirmed.

DENNY v. AMERICAN CAR & FOUNDRY CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 16, 1911. Rehearing Denied
June 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 124*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

The master is liable for an injury to the servant resulting from the master's failure reasonably to inspect and keep safe an appliance with which the servant must work, unless the servant himself failed to exercise due care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 235-242; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 235*)—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—INSPECTION BY SERVANT.

There is no duty on the servant to inspect closely and make sure of the condition of the appliance with which he must work. He has the right to rely on the duty of the master to keep the appliance reasonably safe, except when the defect is known to him or is such that in reason he should observe it.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Richard Denny against the American Car & Foundry Company. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Strother & Hughes, for plaintiff in error. Jean F. Smith, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. Plaintiff, while employed by the defendant company in its car manufacturing establishment, was severely injured.

He sued for damages, alleging that the injury was caused by defendant's failure to provide him reasonably safe machinery and appliances with which to work. Through the verdict of a jury, he has judgment for three thousand dollars, as to which defendant has prosecuted a writ of error.

The injury resulted from the tilting of a steel rail on a track in the yard of defendant's establishment. Plaintiff was assisting several other laborers in pushing a heavily loaded truck. The truck was being pushed off a movable section of the track, which movable section was made so as to transfer cars or trucks from one track to another. Each of the two rails on this movable section rested on a timber laid lengthwise with it. There were no cross-ties. When the hind wheels of the loaded truck were at the end of these rails, over one of which plaintiff walked as he pushed, the heavy weight caused the spikes to pull out and the rail to tilt and strike plaintiff between the legs and on the back. The severe character of the injury inflicted is fully established.

Plaintiff's evidence clearly establishes that the track was defective, unsafe and insecure, and that defendant should have known this condition. One of defendant's own foremen testifies that the spikes pulled out and allowed the rail to tilt on its end because of the wear on the track by constant use. It was the duty of defendant to keep the track safe for the employees that were made to walk over it in pushing loaded trucks. Defendant is chargeable with knowledge of its bad condition; for by reasonable care defendant could have observed the defect. The circumstances prove that defendant did not observe care in looking to the condition of the track. Defendant offered no evidence. There is no showing that defendant at any time ever inspected the track or took care to keep it safe. The fulfillment of defendant's duty reasonably to inspect and repair does not appear anywhere in the evidence; but, on the other hand, the fact plainly appears that if there was any inspection at all, the track was left unrepaired. The defect is sufficiently proved to have been there. It was one that reasonable diligence could have guarded against; but no diligence in that particular on the part of defendant appears. This lack of diligence caused plaintiff's injury. The performance of a reasonable duty enjoined on defendant would have prevented it.

[1] This case is controlled by the well known principle that the master is liable for an injury to the servant resulting from the master's failure reasonably to inspect and keep safe an appliance with which the servant must work unless the servant himself failed to exercise due care. The loose and peculiarly laid rail on the movable section of the track was certainly an unsafe appliance.

The master violated its duty when it knowingly used the appliance, or used it without reasonable care to know its condition.
